done that she always felt herself bound in honour to make good the promises which, at all events, were implied in the advice which she had given. It appeared to him that for the purposes of this war, if such were to arise, it was of all things necessary that the understanding between the Imperial Government and the Government of Canada should be perfect. He could not but think, therefore, that the suggestions of his hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Mr. Buxton) were of great value. His hon. Friend would endeavour to elicit from the Canadian people some explicit declaration of their desire to have Canada defended in Canada, without regard to the consequences which they knew must result from such a war. He did not think, however, that a mere declaration on the part of the Canadian people would suffice for such a purpose, and the necessary test for proving that the Canadians were in earnest in this matter would be their willingness to resign—of course, for a time only, and for the purpose of providing against an apprehended war—the power which we on our part had willingly conceded to them. He did not suppose that there was any Member in the House, or any man in the country, who desired to revoke the concessions which we had made to the colonies; but it was of the utmost importance that two countries acting together for the purposes of war should act together as one and the same country; and unless such a state of things existed between this country and Canada he should despair of our conducting a war to anything like a successful issue. In the suggestions of his right hon. Friend the Member for Calne there were but two things objectionable. He did not at all believe that the policy shadowed forth by his right hon. Friend was at all less resolute than that suggested by any other Member of the House—indeed, he should be disposed to regard the policy advocated by his right hon. Friend and by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) as more formidable in the eyes of an enemy than the plan of defending Canada by a war upon the spot. He believed it would be a mistake unnecessarily to limit the theatre of war in the way suggested by his right hon. Friend the Member for Calne. If his view were acceded to, they would without any necessity be giving to the supposed enemy the advantage of knowing in what part of the world no resistance would be made. At the same time, he argued that the suggestions of the noble Lord and of the right hon. Gentleman had been of the greatest value, as they very much tended to guard against the very error which was most likely to be committed. There could be no greater error at the beginning of a war than unnecessary seeking a theatre of war in the ground upon which the quarrel had arisen. It was one of the common mistakes of belligerents to confound the cause of quarrel with the business of the war, while, in point of fact, they were quite distinct things. The moment that a cause of quarrel had ripened into actual war, which it would do if Canada were invaded, then the one thing a belligerent had to think of was how best to conduct the war. He thought that some injustice had been done to Colonel Jervois, not by laying his Report before the House, but by using it as an argument for the defence of Canada in Canada. The question put to Colonel Jervois had been how best to defend Canada. If that gallant officer had been asked what, in the event of war between England and the United States, would be the best policy for England, his Report would perhaps have contained different matter, and would have led to a very different conclusion. His (Mr. Kinglake's) opinion was that we should do all we could to raise such fortifications as would secure the British troops in Canada, but that we should disentangle ourselves as much as possible from any arrangement with Canada until we knew that Canada would, in the event of war, place the parent State in full control over her resources. Without such arrangement the position of Canada towards England would be rather that of an independent State than that of an independent colony.

MR. J. R. SMITH said: I believe every Gentleman who has yet spoken this evening voted for the fortifications; I voted against them, and am desirous of shortly stating my reasons for so doing. The right hon. the Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Cardwell) deprecates further discussion on this question, but I think the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) has rendered a public service by bringing the subject again under the notice of the House. We have committed so many blunders in our policy towards Canada that we ought to be particularly cautious to escape errors for the future. Some thirty years ago the people of Canada were dissatisfied with being governed by a colonial Minister sitting in London, and prayed for the right to govern themselves. This prayer was denied, and a rebellion broke out in that country, which was only put down at the cost of several millions of money. No sooner, however, was the rebellion quelled, than we granted all that Canada asked for. Now if it were just to grant the Canadians self-government at all, was it not a gross blunder not to have granted it before they were driven into rebellion, and thus have saved the expenditure of millions of treasure and the loss of precious lives? But our blunders did not end here. When we granted to the people of Canada the right of self-government we also gave them all the public lands and all the public revenues, but we neglected to provide that Canada should do what is done by every free country in the world—namely, make the national defence the first charge on the national revenues. Notwithstanding, however, that we gave up to Canada the legitimate sources from which such expenditures should be derived, we have continued, to the present time, to provide her with military and naval armaments without any charge to her; and, moreover, we took upon ourselves to pay the charges of her ecclesiastical establishments and the expenses of the Indian Department. Hon. Members will see among the Estimates delivered yesterday a Vote to be proposed for the ecclesiastical establishments and the expenses of the Indian Departments in Canada. The course we have pursued in not requiring Canada to bear the expenses of her own military establishments is a gross injustice committed on the people of England, because it has forced us not only to pay our own taxes but also the taxes of Canada. Now the working classes of Canada are as well, if not better able than the same classes here to pay taxes, and it is on their labour that the chief taxation falls. But have we benefited the people of Canada by this course? No; on the contrary we have inflicted a serious injury upon them by destroying their self-reliance, which is the distinguishing characteristic of the English race; we have demoralized them, and created among them a pauper spirit, just as a parish is demoralized by giving parish relief to able-bodied labourers. Only the other day we called upon Canada to provide militia to guard their frontiers against American raiders; but it was not until they were dragooned into the duty by the threat of the United States to enter their territory, and by the withdrawal of our troops from the frontier and the threat of withdrawing them from the country altogether, that they raised the necessary force to prevent confederate raids upon our allies—the United States. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Adderley) has this evening given us another evidence of the demoralization of our North American Provinces. A plan has been proposed for forming the whole of these provinces into one Confederate Government. Some of the provinces, however, object to this union; and what does the right hon. Gentleman assign as the reason? He says—

“He has not the slightest doubt that what made New Brunswick and Nova Scotia hang back from the union was partly because they would be swamped by the greater provinces of Canada, but still more because they could not make up their minds to give up the good things which they were accustomed to get from England, and they feared they would be thrown on their own resources.”

Why should they not be thrown on their own resources? They are able-bodied labourers, and would be all the better by the withdrawal of parish relief. Why do we make all these sacrifices to Canada, seeing that they are equally injurious to us and to them? It is surprising to find the amount of ignorance which exists in this country on the subject. Some think we should make sacrifices in consideration of the value of our trade with Canada; but the fact is, we derive no benefit whatever from our trade with her more than we should if she ceased to be a colony. In the first place Canada, in return for our liberality to her, imposes higher rates of duties on our manufactures than France does. Second, as she is permitted to buy what she wants wherever she pleases, she only buys of us because ours is the cheapest market. Third, our trade with Canada, instead of being important, is insignificant. The return of our total exports of manufactures to all countries for the year 1863 shows the amount to have been £146,487,368, of which our exports to Canada amounted to only £2,938,201, or just 2 per cent of our whole exports—an amount which, if it were to cease altogether, would scarcely be felt. Our military and naval expenditure on account of Canada during the last four years cannot have been much less than £2,000,000 per annum. Surely it must be admitted that the fewer we have of such customers the better. Having committed such mistakes in past times it behoves us to exercise more than usual caution in our future

Georgia and Carolina? Our base of operations in respect of the defence of Canada must, of course, be on the other side the Atlantic. Our base of operations would be at Halifax, where our stores would be collected. Some hon. Members had told the House that war could be made in Canada during winter. But when one of our regiments had been obliged to march there in winter, the men were obliged to have their muskets enveloped in straw and flannel. They could not have carried them otherwise. We were told that Colonel Jervois ought not to have reported on the defences of Canada, or that the Government ought not to have produced his Report. But what had Colonel Jervois been sent to Canada for but to make a Report on the best means of defending that colony? He was to report, not on the question of our making war there, but on the best means of defending Canada. The most eminent officers in the army and the navy would have to give advice to the Government as to the way in which we should conduct a war; but Colonel Jervois had been sent out for a specific object, and he had accomplished that object in a manner that did honour to himself, and reflected credit on the corps to which he belonged. The argument that had been used as to the base of operations for the defence of Canada did not apply at all—it was a mistaken phrase. Our base of operations, in the case of hostilities in the summer, must necessarily be at Halifax and Bermuda. In case of a war with America we should have a fleet in the St. Lawrence; and if, as the hon. Member for Stockport said, our navy was inferior in numbers to that which the Americans could bring there, the sooner that state of things was altered the better. He was glad to see the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty in his place, because he would be able to tell the House whether our navy was or was not inferior to that of the Americans. The Government should be urged to proceed with the defences of Canada quickly, for delay was dangerous upon two grounds. In the first place, an enemy might be tempted to take advantage of the weakness of Canada; and in the next place, if we delayed with our works of defence, Canada might think us lukewarm in these matters, and neglect those precautionary measures which, on her part, were so necessary. We should do our part; and we should give any assistance that we could give to the colony from Imperial funds if there was a certainty of our advances being repaid by Canada.

MAJOR ANSON said, that he would undertake for every one officer which the hon. and gallant Member opposite could produce in proof of Canada being defensible to bring forward ten who would state that Canada was indefensible. In the remarks he was about to address to the House he should express this opinion. He had taken great pains to ascertain the views of experienced officers who had been out in Canada since the affair of the Trent; and he thought the House would be astonished at the concurrence of opinion against the notion that Canada could be defended. He did not think he had met with one officer who did not answer the question he had put to him to the effect that Canada was utterly and hopelessly indefensible. And the officers who expressed this opinion were soldiers in every sense of the term—men distinguished by their efficient and active services in the field, and not mere theorists who could make anything appear defensible upon paper. Why had Colonel Jervois been sent to report on the defences of Canada? Colonel Gordon had been previously sent out to examine into the condition of Canada. Now, no man stood higher than Colonel Gordon in his profession—he was one of the best Engineer officers in the army. And what was the nature of his Report? Colonel Wetherall and Colonel Mackenzie, whose equals in the service could scarcely be found, had also investigated this subject. They formed the best staff of officers that were ever sent out on any expedition. Well, did not all these able and experienced men report upon the defences of Canada? He believed that they did, and that they rather astonished the War Office by the Report which they gave. Why was not their Report produced to Parliament? Why was Colonel Jervois sent out to Canada after they had come home? Now, the whole of this question turned upon the point whether Canada was or was not defensible. By the answer to that question the House ought to be guided in coming to a decision on the course to be taken. If Canada were not defensible, we ought to withdraw our troops to-morrow. The Government had not brought forward a single military authority to show that Canada was defensible. It was true that Colonel Jervois was sent out to Canada to report upon the able Report, in which he (Major Anson) had no doubt he recommended the very best means of defending Canada so far as engineering operations went. The only two authorities quoted by the Government in favour of Canada being defensible were Mr. Rose and Mr. Galt—no doubt two excellent gentlemen, but certainly no great military authorities. It was said that it was easy to defend Montreal by keeping up our communication with that place and Quebec if we retained our supremacy on the St. Lawrence. But he should just like to ask hon. Members what chance had we of doing that? Just let them look into the question. He believed that there was no portion of the American system of attack so highly organized as the numerous gunboats which swarmed on the American coasts and rivers. We had not got at the present moment, he believed, one single iron-clad gunboat which could navigate the St. Lawrence. Did we know whether we could build iron-clad gunboats capable of crossing the Atlantic, and of then entering the St. Lawrence and standing the fire of the heavy guns planted on the south side of that river—for he supposed we were not going to hold the south side of the St. Lawrence. Could we build such boats here and send them out ready for service? Could we build them in pieces here and send them out to be put together at the other side of the Atlantic in sufficient strength to stand against the American batteries? The hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir Frederic Smith) objected to the phrase “base of operations.” Well, we had no dockyards or arsenals in Canada, and therefore when they talked of the base of operations, that must of necessity be in this country and not in Canada, from the want there of any resources of that kind. England, he contended, was, and must be, the base of operations. The chances were, so far as he could judge, that instead of our having the preponderance on the St. Lawrence the Americans would have it. With regard to the fortifications of Canada, he had received a letter from one of the best officers in the British service upon the subject. That gallant officer said, that—“If the proposal is carried out of fortifying Montreal and other places no advantage will be gained; as, though such fortifications may afford shelter, an invading army could have its own way in Canada, particularly in the west, by simply avoiding the few strongholds. I do think that the British soldiers, who in all parts of the world face cheerfully danger and disease, would be placed in a false position, far apart, with no support but a militia force, which as yet we know very little about; while the Americans can at any time, and without difficulty, convey any amount of men and warlike stores by the railways, which lead to so many vulnerable points along the frontier. This question about the defences of Canada is a common-sense one, which in my humble opinion can best be decided by officers of experience, who know not only what an army can do, but also what it cannot do.

He thought the latter question was lost sight of when we talked about the easy way in which Canada could be defended; and those who argued that Canada could be defended as well as any other country could have read but little of military history, or studied the question at all. Now, with regard to the winter, there was little doubt but that the severity of the weather would stop active military operations in that country. But so far from the winter assisting in the defence of Canada, it would be much more fatal to our garrisons imprisoned in fortifications and cut off from communication with the world than to the enemy, who, by means of their railways running into their camps, would be able to carry off their wounded to a more genial climate, and be able also to get any amount of stores and supplies forwarded to them. So far as the military question was concerned, he regretted to state that he had not heard on the part of Her Majesty's Government any attempt to meet it in argument. All they said was that Canada could be defended, and there was an end of it. But they gave no proof that she was practically defensible.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, although the hon. and gallant Gentleman who has just spoken is a young Member of this House and is a young officer—one, however, who has gained reputation in every quarter of the world—it is impossible to deny that whatever falls from his lips on a subject of this nature is entitled to respectful attention. The impression made upon my mind by his statements this evening is to strengthen the feelings I before entertained, that we have great reason to complain of Her Majesty's Government in relation to this delicate and difficult question. In the first place, so far as I am informed, we have reason to complain of the manner in which they have produced the Report of Colonel Jervois. The hon. and gallant Member has adverted to the Report which he supposes—for he goes no further—has been made by Colonel Gordon and Colonel Wetherall. I do not know whether there is such a Report—at all events,

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that although he entirely agreed with what had fallen from the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington) towards the close of his remarks, he could not concur in his earlier observations. The first charge which the right hon. Baronet made against the Government he should leave to be dealt with by his noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington); but this he must say, that whatever military advice Her Majesty's Government might have received from Colonel Jervois, Colonel Gordon, or others, which they had not produced, they were in possession of none which was inconsistent with those opinions of Colonel Jervois which they had laid before the House. The right hon. Baronet made a second charge which had been answered over and over again, and accused the Government of proposing to contribute no more than the paltry sum of £50,000 towards the defences of Canada. Only the sum of £50,000 was asked for this year, because, according to the professional advice given to the Government, that was the largest sum which could properly be expended upon Quebec and Point Levi during the next twelve months. The right hon. Baronet did not quite correctly represent the substance of what was said by that eminent person Mr. John A. Macdonald in the debate of the 7th of March. That gentleman supposed that the sum voted was £30,000, and not having heard the explanations of Her Majesty's Government, he expressed surprise at the smallness of the amount, and suggested that it must be a mistake for £300,000. Oddly enough Mr. John A. Macdonald had hit upon the exact amount which the Government were asking the House to vote—namely, £200,000 for works at Quebec, and £100,000 towards their armament. The taking of a small sum this year was merely a question of time and arrangement. But Mr. John A. Macdonald went on to say that—

“ He had every reason to believe that these negotiations would result most happily in defences being provided which would secure the protection of Canada without pressing too heavily on the resources of the country.”

In the third place, the right hon. Baronet complained that his right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Colonies had misled the House by the statement which he made the other night, and which induced them to vote by an overwhelming majority the first instalment of the grant towards the defences of Canada. He entirely denied that either his right hon. Friend or his noble Friend at the head of the Government said anything which could have had the effect of misleading the House, or inducing them to assent to a Vote which they would otherwise have rejected. His right hon. Friend never for a moment pretended that he was in possession of official documents which would show a detailed arrangement between the Home Government and that of Canada, as to the contribution which each was to make towards the defences of that country. The hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck), indeed, alleged it as a serious charge against him, that he produced no such arrangement. His right hon. Friend merely assured the House of the general confidence which he entertained as to the part which the Canadian Government were prepared to take in this matter. But, more than that, he did not rest the justification of the Vote which was then before the Committee upon anything which was to be done by the Canadian Government, but maintained that even if they did not fortify Montreal, it was right and proper that the Imperial Government should fortify Quebec. Her Majesty's Government were indeed convinced that the Canadians were prepared to take upon themselves a share of the expense of providing their own defences, and that conviction had since been confirmed by the fact that the Canadian Parliament had voted 1,000,000 dollars for that purpose; but what they said was, that independently of the fortifications of Montreal, it was right and expedient that the Imperial Government, thinking it their duty to maintain a considerable force in Canada, should fortify Quebec in connection with that force. He, therefore, denied that the right hon. Baronet had established any of the charges which he had made against the Government. He was, however, happy to agree entirely with everything which the right hon. Baronet had said in the latter part of his speech. He had never listened to any debate in which it was more difficult to make out what was the real meaning of the speakers. He did not at that moment comprehend what was at the bottom of the mind of his noble Friend who introduced the question. Did he mean that Canada was to lay down her arms? because that was the only true and logical conclusion from his arguments. After all these dreary, dispiriting, and, if they had any effect at all, most mischievous proclamations to the people of Canada

—after telling them that they were indefensible, how could we have the face to urge them, as we had for years past been doing, to make preparations for their defence? The fact was that our military authorities had concentrated all their attention and interest upon our own gallant troops; but the Canadians had the same interest in their gallant forces, and if we were continually proclaiming that it would be folly and madness to expose our troops to destruction in Canada, the Canadians would draw their own inference from that doctrine; and it would be unpardonable in us to continue to exhort them to organize their militia, to increase the number of their Volunteers, and to engage in war, when at the same time we told them that the task which we sought to impose upon them was a hopeless one. Let us be consistent in this matter, and if we held these views with regard to our troops, let us—though we should be applying to the New World a rule which had never been accepted in the Old one—tell the Canadians at once that their only safety was to be found in laying down their arms and inviting no attack. His belief in regard to these matters was that common sense—he was almost ashamed to use the word, they had heard so much about common sense on both sides—was of more use than military knowledge, and that the rules of common sense on the other side of the Atlantic were much the same as they were on this. When he saw that in Europe a comparatively weak Power believed that its true safety lay in disarming in the presence of a superior Power, he should be ready to recommend the adoption of such a course by Canada. When, for instance, he saw Belgium dismantle the fortifications of Antwerp and disband her army, he should be prepared to concur with his noble Friend (Lord Elcho), who, if he was consistent, ought to recommend Canada to adopt such a measure. Belgium, however, though infinitely inferior to Canada in natural means of resistance, was doing her best to play a gallant part in her own defence—not, of course, expecting that she was to defend her territory unassisted, and for ever, against a superior Power—and who expected Canada to do that?—but knowing that she would make herself, as Canada would, a very tough customer to any assailant, and that she would be assisted, as Canada would be, by powerful allies both within her territory and without it. When he saw Belgium taking that course, he was convinced that that was the one which ought to be followed in the New World. A good deal had been said in the course of the discussion about a supposed dilemma, which in reality was no dilemma at all. It was contended by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne that the question at issue involved the alternative of defending Canada either in Canada or elsewhere; but to the Government there was no difficulty on the point, for they were of opinion that Canada should be defended both in Canada and elsewhere. And he thought that the majority of the House had shown plainly enough that they concurred in this view of the matter.

GENERAL PEEL: I have already given my opinion as to the policy of defending Canada, and I do not intend to trespass upon the time of the House for more than a few minutes on this occasion. I regret that anything should have occurred to render necessary a renewal of the debate on this subject, or which should have the appearance of weakening in any way or producing any misunderstanding with regard to the unanimous decision of the House of Commons that if Canada should be attacked on our account it was our duty to defend her. Even the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne, I think, went that length; and although he, as well as my noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire, says it is not possible to do so—[Lord ELCHO: Not in Canada]—still they admit that it is our duty, if possible, to defend Canada if the Canadians are prepared to assist in defending themselves. Now, I do not at all wish to speculate as to the power which might be brought to bear either in attacking or defending Canada. The Canadians themselves, I imagine, ought to be the best judges whether they would be able to resist attack or not; and, for my own part, I can only say that if they are prepared to display the same devotion and energy as the Americans of the South have exhibited they may hope, with our assistance, to be able to resist any attack which may be made upon them. I recollect having heard it said within the last twenty-five years that it was impossible to defend this country, and that if England were invaded the best thing the Guards could do would be to march out of London and leave it to take care of itself. But what was the answer of the Minister of that day to those statements—of a Minister who could not be accused of being warlike—the late Sir Robert Peel? He said—

“In the first place, the Guards would not march out of London; and, in the next place, if they did they would be pelted by every old woman whom they met.”

Such, too, I cannot help thinking would be the fate, and deservedly, of the Members of this House if they came to the conclusion that in the event of Canada being prepared to defend herself we should afford her no assistance. There is not, I believe, a single hon. Gentleman—not even the hon. Member for Birmingham—who goes further than myself in approving the policy of not interfering in the affairs of other nations, or who would more deprecate any measure tending to drag this country into a war with America or any other State, unless our honour was involved. There is, however, a great difference between not fighting another person's battle and not fighting our own. It would be no question of our going to war for Canada; but, that if war should be declared against us, and that Canada was attacked on our account, and was defending herself, and fighting in our battle, that we should assist her to the utmost of our power. This is said to be “fair weather policy” and “tall talk;” but I know of no policy so deserving of being designated “foul weather policy” and “small talk” as that of those who proclaim to the world that we do not intend to defend ourselves. If, indeed, we are in such a state of helplessness as to warrant that conclusion, what has become of the £185,000,000 which, including the Estimates of the present year, have been voted by the present Parliament for the naval and military service of the country? We may well be asked whether we did not divide the money among ourselves. I believe that if any foreign Minister were to take up our Estimates he would imagine us to be a great military nation. We have 220,000 regular troops in a state of great efficiency; we have 120,000 militia, and 150,000 Volunteers, besides the Yeomanry and the Pensioners; which form a very formidable array. But, then, there is another force with respect to which, I am sorry to say, I was indiscreet enough to put a question to the Government the other evening; we have got an army of reserve, which is formidable exactly in proportion to the mystery observed with respect to it. No army is so much to be feared as that about whose movements or numbers you know nothing, and which, for all you can tell, may be in your rear, or on your flank. Indeed, my own opinion was that this army of reserve must have been in the backwoods of Canada, for we never see it in this country. I only hope that the gunboats about which we have heard so much are not of quite so mythical a character. But, be that as it may, I may, in confirmation of what has fallen from my right hon. Friend near me (Sir John Pakington), say that I, too, was under the impression that some understanding had been come to between Her Majesty's Government and that of Canada on this question of defences; because I inferred from the replies of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, in answer to repeated questions as to whether the defences of Montreal and those of Quebec were to be carried on at the same time, and whether our fortification of the latter depended upon the Canadians taking upon themselves the defence of the former place, that there was between the two Governments some sort of agreement on the subject, and I believe the House concluded that there was a proper understanding between the two Governments. I do not now wish to draw any comparison between the force which might be employed in attacking Canada and that which ought to be engaged in defending the province. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Lichfield (Major Anson), than whose authority as a military man I am willing to admit there is no higher, has given it as his opinion that Canada cannot be defended; but I, for one, am not prepared to relieve the Government from the responsibility which attaches to their carrying out that policy which they deem to be right. I cannot consent to act on the opinions of military men, however distinguished, who are not responsible for those opinions. I prefer leaving the matter in the hands of the Government, whose duty it is to carry into execution those measures which have been sanctioned by the House of Commons. I hold in my hand a letter in which it is stated that it is perfectly possible to defend Canada; but, for the reasons I have just mentioned, I should not lay any stress upon it. The hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Smith), I may add, in speaking of America, said she was in a very different position from that which she some time ago occupied. In that statement I perfectly concur with him. Four years ago America had no standing army; and what is it that she has since done? Why, she has raised an army second to none, whether you take into account the bravery of the men of whom it is composed or the merits of some of the officers. Am I alarmed by this fact? Not at all; because I see no reason why we, with all our resources, with the standing army which we have ready at hand, and the number of experienced officers which we possess, should not in a short time be enabled to cope with America or any other country. I sincerely trust we may not have occasion to enter into a war, but if such a misfortune should happen, it must be no little war, or must England ever submit to any humiliation that the last man, or last guinea she has got, can save her from.

MR. CARDWELL wished to say, in explanation, that he never said anything intended to confirm the impression that any agreement had been made between us and the Canadian Government with respect to these defences. He always understood that we acted on our own responsibility; and when the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) put questions on this subject he (Mr. Cardwell) stated twice, in order that there might be no mistake, that no despatch had been received which would justify him in giving a positive assurance on that point.

GENERAL PEEL said, his complaint against the right hon. Gentleman was rather that he had never answered explicitly the questions which had been put on the subject than that he had made any positive statement.

MR. LAIRD said, that as the House was of opinion that Canada should be fortified, the sooner the fortifications were commenced the better. The hon. and gallant Major who recently spoke (Major Anson) seemed to doubt the possibility of sending out armour-clad vessels in pieces; but such a proceeding was very practicable. When a difficulty arose some twenty-five years ago in the East Indies with respect to Russia, he was instructed by the Government to send out several armed vessels in pieces, and they arrived at their destination, and were afloat on the Euphrates before people in this country knew that they had been ordered. There was no doubt, then, that it was possible to send out armour-clad vessels in pieces, and put them together in Canada. He had sent out a vessel to Savannah in pieces, and had no doubt that it had since been adopted as a gunboat and used in the present wars. In reply to the question, whether this country had any armour-clad vessels fit to go up to Montreal, he could state that four capable of reaching that point were now ready. They were the Scorpion, Wyvern, Research, and Enterprise. Two other iron-clad vessels were building—the Viper and Vixen, which could get up to Montreal, and from thence, through the locks, to Lake Ontario. They might be ready for sea by the next summer; and there were no other iron-clads able to go beyond that point. If it were thought desirable to send out other iron-clads, there would be no difficulty in building them so that they could pass through the locks between Lake Ontario and Lake Erie, or they might be sent out in pieces. With respect to the defences of Canada, the basis of operations was an important consideration. That basis must in winter be Halifax and Bermuda; but both those places were deficient in means for repairing vessels, and until the Government brought forward a scheme for remedying this deficiency, this country would stand at great disadvantage in time of war. In the event of a war with America, he hoped the Government would not only be prepared to hold their own, but to carry on offensive operations by sea if necessary. We ought to be prepared with the means of offence as well as defence, and the Government ought to lose no time in making their preparations.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply to some observations which fell from the hon. and gallant Member for Lichfield (Major Anson), said, it was true that Colonel Gordon and other officers had been sent to Canada at the time of the Trent affair, and had made a Report, which was in the possession of the War Office; but he denied that there was anything in that Report implying that, in the opinion of those officers, it was not possible to defend Canada. On the contrary, they drew up a plan of defence resembling in many particulars the scheme of Colonel Jervois. It was true that Colonel Gordon's plan for defending the Western Provinces differed from that of Colonel Jervois; but in Colonel Gordon's Report there was not one word showing that Canada was not defensible. The hon. and gallant Member said that the conclusion of the great majority of military men was adverse to the opinion that Canada was defensible. Now, he thought, with the right hon. and gallant

Gentleman opposite, that while according all possible deference to the judgment of the hon. and gallant Member for Lichfield, very much value should not be attached to opinions given by those who were not responsible. It was very strange, if there were such unanimity in the army against attempting to defend Canada, that every one of the officers whom the Government felt it their duty to consult expressed a contrary opinion. Not only Colonel Jervois, but also Colonel Gordon, Sir William Fenwick Williams, and other military officers, held sentiments at variance with those expressed by the hon. and gallant Member for Lichfield. But even if military opinions were against the Government he should deny that this was a question on which military men alone were able to give an opinion. He had always admitted that it would be impossible to preserve intact the whole frontier of Canada, as it was impossible to preserve intact the frontier of any continental country having on its border a great military Power; but a point on which civilians were competent to give an opinion was, that by the expenditure of a certain sum, and by raising a certain number of men, it was possible to defend certain points; and if those points could be held, it would not, the Government thought, be worth while for an enemy to attack that country at all. The Government anticipated that they would be able to hold Quebec, if Canada, as they had every reason to believe she would do, performed what she had promised. If the Canadians would defend Montreal, it would be possible to defend the line from Quebec to Montreal; and if Canada were willing to expend a larger sum, and raise more men, it would be possible to defend the line of the Upper Province, and maintain an intrenched camp in Western Canada. There was one other observation he wished to make. The right hon. Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) remarked on the smallness of the proposed Vote. Now, it had been repeated over and over again that in fixing the sum for the present year the Government acted on professional advice, and they were told that the sum proposed to be voted was all that could be usefully expended during the year. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Government ought to have asked for a larger sum; but no useful end could be answered by attempting to delude the House or the world into the notion that Government were going to spend a larger sum within the year than they really intended to do. The right hon. Baronet opposite, had he been in office himself, would not have asked for a larger amount. In the first year of commencing a work it was not easy to spend profitably a large sum of money, although much had to be done in preliminary matters. He considered that the Under Secretary for the Colonies had completely answered all the other questions; and there was no ground for saying that there was such a diversity of opinion among military men as had been stated.

LORD ELCHO, in withdrawing his Amendment, said, he desired to offer an explanation with respect to two points on which he had been misunderstood by some hon. Gentlemen. What he had said with regard to Quebec was that he thought this country ought to fortify it; and with regard to the honour of England, while admitting that England could not be too jealous of her honour, he nevertheless was of opinion that in fighting Canada's battle it was not necessary for the honour of England to fight it on Canadian soil.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked whether the Government would postpone the War Office Vote till after Easter. If money were required in the meantime, he supposed there would be no difficulty in obtaining a small Vote on account.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said the Vote had already been postponed as late as possible, and every exertion had been made to place the Reports relating to the War Office in the hands of Members in time for that discussion. It was very desirable that the discussion on the subject should be taken that night, as it had occasioned considerable amount of excitement in the War Office.

GENERAL PEEL thought that was a reason why the matter should not be hurried over that night.

COLONEL GILPIN said, there could be no reason for hurrying on the Vote, as it could not come into operation before the 30th June.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, that when he opposed the Vote late the other night he then felt, as he felt still, that, however irregular the proposal of the Government might be, it was impossible to resist it without inconvenience to the public service. He had no wish to carry his opposition any further; but he earnestly appealed to right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench to take some steps to avoid placing the House in what it must feel to be the humiliating position of professing to regulate an expenditure which it was not allowed to discuss in detail. If the effect of the Report of the Committee, as stated by the First Lord of the Treasury the other night, was that Votes on account must take place of that enormous amount, because the balances left upon the Votes of the previous year had to be paid back into the Exchequer, then there would be no other means of restoring regularity to the financial business of the House than by fixing the financial year to begin on the 1st of July instead of on the 1st of April. If the present system continued, they would have large Votes on account for all the items of charge, without giving the House an opportunity of determining whether the expenditure was politic or not.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, the noble Lord was mistaken in supposing that a Vote on account precluded the most detailed discussion by the House of each head of charge to which the Vote applied. A Vote on account being only a portion of the total sum to be voted, enough remained under each head to enable the House to discuss in the greatest detail the separate items under those heads, and to stop, if it thought fit, any further expenditure upon them. Whenever the House, on going into the Estimates in detail, determined that any given Vote should cease, it would cease of course, and no further expenditure would be incurred after the date to which the Vote on account would carry the particular service concerned. The practice of voting on account was inevitable, owing to the balances being paid back into the Exchequer.

MR. WALPOLE said, he did not understand his noble Friend (Lord R. Cecil) to wish now to stop the Vote on account, but to urge that in future years, when Votes on account were likely to be taken before Easter—a practice which, though resulting from the change that had taken place in regard to the balances, had yet put the House in a somewhat new position—the Government should lay on the table the particulars relating to these Votes.

MR. CARDWELL thought it would often be extremely inconvenient to lay the Estimates so early on the table. The present proceedings originated in a reform resulting from an inquiry made by the Public Moneys Committee, and when the practice was adopted it was clearly understood that the Vote on account would not preclude discussion when the remainder of the sum was asked for.

Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

GENERAL PEEL said, that if the Government now insisted on taking the discussion on the War Office Vote, he should move that the Chairman report Progress. Only that morning four different Reports had been put into the hands of Members; and he defied any man, however conversant with the duties of the War Office, to tell what would be the effect of those Reports upon the clerks of that Department. If there was that commotion in the War Office which the noble Marquess alleged, it was the worst policy not to allow those gentlemen to be fairly heard. He was not sure that he might not entirely agree with the proposal of the Government; but, as those gentlemen said their interests were deeply affected by the plan, he appealed to the Government to postpone the discussion of those Reports till after Easter.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(General P.)

that the Reports delivered to him that morning. He had been engaged all day in a Committee; and he had had scarcely time to turn over a page.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, the effect of taking the Vote and the discussion that night, with insufficient information, so far from quieting the commotion in the War Office, would only increase the already prevalent feeling of discontent, besides which some other Returns bearing on the subject for which he had moved had not yet been laid on the table of the House. He, therefore, thought it would be advantageous to the public service that the Vote should be postponed.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he did not think that the excitement in the War Office was in the least owing to the Report of the Committee—he believed, on the contrary, that the recommendations of the Committee were on the whole well received at the War Office. It was owing to the known fact that a discussion was about to take place in that House, and the idea which was entertained that changes might result therefrom in the position of some of the officials. As the hon. Baronet had said, such a state of things must be injurious to the public service, and therefore the sooner it was terminated the better; but as it appeared to be the general wish that the discussion should be postponed, he would yield to that wish. Perhaps, however, there would be no objection to their going on with the non-effective Votes to-night.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(2.) Original Question again proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £33,200, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of Chelsea and Kilmainham Hospitals, and the In-Pension thereof, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1866, inclusive.”

COLONEL DUNNE called attention to the necessity of making some change in the pensions and position of soldiers. Until the position of the soldier was improved, and till every man entering the army could feel assured that after a certain time, unless his conduct disentitled him, he should receive such a pension as would support his existence, any alteration in the time of service would be of no avail. In every case pensions were given in the most niggardly and unfair way. The papers were filled with cases of hardship from that cause. He held the War Office responsible for the present state of things. The warrant should be revised. The pensions were too small; 7d. and 6d. per day was too little for a man who had lost his health in the service. After serving twenty years 1s. a day was as little as any man should receive. The smallness and uncertainty of the pensions acted most prejudicially upon the army; and he trusted that the Government would, by an additional expenditure, which would not be large, wipe away this blot upon the administration.

COLONEL NORTH felt bound to compare the pay and allowances of the Major of Chelsea Hospital with those of the two senior clerks of that establishment. He did not mean that the latter were too high. Mr. Talman, who had been nearly half a century in the important office he filled with great credit to himself, received not one farthing more than he was justly entitled to. The pay of the second clerk began at £350, and rose to £450 per annum, at an annual increase of £15. The first clerk had an unfurnished house, and received eight tons of coals, 100lb. of candles, and 15,000 cubic feet of gas. The pay of the Major of the future establishment was to be £350, including his half-pay, or his half-pay with so much salary in addition as would make up £350 a year. He might also receive a pension for wounds; £10 per annum in lieu of clothing—namely, the Windsor uniform. He was allowed unfurnished apartments, coachhouse, and stabling for three horses, twelve tons of coals, 150lb. of candles, and 25,000 cubic feet of gas. What were the military services of Sir John Wilson? He had served the country for sixty-eight years. He served as midshipman in the navy for nearly six years. He was employed on the coast of Ireland during the rebellion in 1798; in the expedition to the Helder in 1799, and Egypt in 1801, where he received a medal from the Capitan Pasha for having saved the lives of a boat's crew belonging to a Turkish man-of-war. He received three wounds while a midshipman, and the last was a severe wound on the head, which produced total deafness, in consequence of which he was invalided, and quitted the navy in 1803. His health being restored he entered the army in 1804, and served in the 3rd Battalion Royals at Walcheren in 1809, where he was twice wounded during the siege of Flushing. He afterwards served in the Peninsula, and was in the battles of Busaco, the retreat to the lines of Torres Vedras, and at the actions of Pombal, Redinha, Condeixa, Casal Nova, Foz d'Aronce, and Sabugal, the blockade of Almeida, and battle of Fuentes d'Onor. In 1812 he joined the 2nd Battalion Royals in Canada, and was in the attack made on Sackett's Harbour, and Great Sodus (where he received a severe bayonet wound). He was also in the actions at Black Rock, Buffalo, and the battle of Chippewa, in which he received seven wounds, and being left on the field of battle, he fell into the hands of the enemy. During his career in the two professions he received thirteen wounds, and has two balls still lodged. The brevet rank of Major and that of lieutenant-colonel was conferred upon him for his conduct at Buffalo and Chippewa. Sir John received the war medal with two clasps for Busaco and Fuentes d'Onor. This officer, he was bound to say, in no way complained of his allowances. He was allowed to receive the good service pension and his half-pay, besides £350 a year. He was also allowed to waive his rank in order to remain at Chelsea Hospital. But the reason why he drew particular attention to the subject was that the result of every movement of the War Office was that some reduction was made in the allowances to these old distinguished soldiers; and Sir John's allowances were to be diminished to his successor. Sir John Wilson received seventeen tons of coals; his successor was to receive only twelve. Anything more miserable than the change could hardly be conceived. Then the idea of a man of his services being allowed £10 a year in lieu of clothing! Why did they not make his salary £400 a year at once? Stabling for three horses was allowed, but no forage. The house allowed was formerly furnished, now it is unfurnished. Formerly there was a garden attached, and the house not subject to be rated; it is now rated at £175 a year. On one side of the road were the barracks occupied by the Guards; on the other side were the houses of these distinguished officers. In both cases residence was compulsory; the duties in each were analogous, and it was difficult to understand why the residences should be rated in the one case and not in the other. At Hampton Court Palace there was no doubt a beneficial occupation, and rates were properly payable; but he did not see how there could be any such beneficial occupation where officers were compelled to live in certain quarters for the performance of certain duties. It was a gross breach of faith with the officers to make them pay rates, for they entered the army on the understanding that they were to receive certain pay, allowances, and free quarters. When he had asked on previous occasions questions as to the payment of rates and taxes by officers on duty he was informed that no decision had been arrived at. After Easter he should again refer to this subject, and hoped his noble Friend would then be prepared with some satisfactory answer.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply to the hon. and gallant Member for the Queen's County (Colonel Dunne), said he had never denied that the War Office were responsible for the pension warrant; what he said was that the pensions were considered by the Chelsea Commissioners, acting under the warrant issued by the Horse Guards, and that they were granted on more liberal terms than formerly. He understood the hon. and gallant Member to say that after a twenty-one years' service a soldier might receive 6d. a day. But in such a case the lowest pension was from 8d. to 1s.; if the soldier was discharged at an earlier date from inability to serve, he might receive a pension of 6d. He did not mean to say that these were liberal terms, but the men had enlisted under these conditions; and where men had not served their full time the Chelsea Commissioners, with the concurrence of the Secretary for War, might make the temporary pension a permanent one. In many cases, moreover, a soldier who might be incapacitated for further service in the army, might not be permanently incapacitated for earning his living. As to the subject brought forward by the hon. and gallant Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel North), he was not aware that there was any intention to make a change in the pay and allowances of Sir John Wilson's successor; but the pay of all these officers must be proportionate to the duties they had to perform, and these duties were of no very onerous character. No case had been made out for raising the pay of any one of them. If any change took place in the pay of the Major, a change would be necessary in the pay of the Governor and Lieutenant Governor. The Governor received £500, the Lieutenant Governor £400, and the Major £350, and he did not think it necessary to increase the pay of these officers. As to the question of rates and taxes, that was not under the control of the War Office—it was for the consideration of the Treasury. With reference to the general question of rates, the Government had decided to allow matters to remain in the same position as they had hitherto been. Under the Ordnance regulation a great number of officers did pay rates, but they were considered to have a beneficial occupation. Those officers who reside in houses in which their duties compelled them to remain were not liable to pay rates.

COLONEL NORTH said, that nothing could be more miserable than the pay of the Governor and the Lieutenant Governor. The Field Marshal received £500 a year, and another General of the army of seventy-one years' service received £400. The reason why he called attention to the pay of the Major was that the £350 a year granted to him included his half-pay. Sir John Wilson had £350 a year in addition to his half-pay, and he wanted to know if Sir John Wilson's successor, who would be sure to be an old and deserving officer, would have the same amount. It was within the last few years only that the officers had been called upon to pay rates. The navy officers did not pay rates, and the same exemption should be made in favour of the officers of the army.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the gallant Officer seemed to think that some sacred principle was involved in this matter of rates, and that he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had been guilty of some disrespect to those gentlemen in saying that their case ought to be considered rather as that of civilians than as that of officers of the army. He abided by that opinion; as an establishment like that of Chelsea Hospital was not connected with any military duty. It was not a case of principle at all, but one simply of so much money. If the salaries were too small let them be re-considered.

COLONEL NORTH said, that when these officers entered the army it was with the understanding that they were to have certain pay, certain allowances, and free quarters; but if they were made to pay taxes that could not be called free quarters. It was only in that day's paper that he saw eight or ten officers of Woolwich summoned for taxes and rates.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER declined to allow that it was a question of free quarters at all.

Question put, and agreed to.

(4.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £131,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charges of the Superannuation Allowances, &c., which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1866, inclusive."

COLONEL DUNNE drew attention to the case of barrack masters. They were a class of men who entered as barrack masters late in life because they had served in other capacities, and the difficulty of providing them with any remuneration when they left the barrack department was so great that they were obliged to retain in office men utterly incompetent. The number of superannuations in the War Department was, as he saw by a paper on the table, so considerable, that they must really greatly augment this Vote, and he trusted therefore it would be postponed.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he could see no possible advantage in such a postponement. The clerks in the War Department were superseded at their own request, and discussion would make no difference whatever in this Vote.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he was surprised that the noble Lord had never heard of the complaints made on the subject, as the attention of every Secretary at War for the last few years had been called to them. He should move that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Colonel Dunne,)—put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(5.) £29,000, Non-Effective Services, Disembodied Militia, and Yeomanry Cavalry.

COLONEL DUNNE hoped that care would be taken that the same allowances, at least, would be held out to officers going into the militia as were given to officers going into the Volunteers.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, it would be irregular to discuss the question now, but could assure the hon. and gallant Member that he was under a wrong impression as to the meaning of the circulars which had been issued on the subject.

Vote agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow;
Committee to sit again To-morrow.

BILL—[BILL 82.]—CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he desired to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board to the clause which he had moved in his (Lord Robert Cecil's) absence and in his behalf, but which he thought the right hon. Gentleman had materially altered. He did not complain of that, because the clause, as it originally stood, would not, perhaps, have been capable of practical administration. His desire was to place upon the statute book by means of that clause a declaration that the guardians of each parish were bound to admit the destitute poor for whose benefit the Act was passed, and that it should not be a matter of discretion whether they received them into the workhouse or not. If such a declaration were inserted in the Bill, then the authorities would be bound under a penalty to admit the poor man whenever he should apply; whereas, at present, public opinion was the only influence that was brought to bear for the relief of the poor in the way which legislation prescribed. He did not mean to impugn the conduct of the guardians in the London parishes as a whole—he believed that they desired to do their duty—but he feared that a good deal of cruelty was practised by the inferior officials, and that there was great suffering among the poor of the metropolis in times of severe weather or distress in consequence of the hardheartedness of those in whose hands the practical administration of the law was placed. He had been informed on good authority that more than once poor persons had been sent away from workhouses on the plea that the wards were full; and yet Returns had been made to the House of Commons from those very workhouses by which it appeared that not a single applicant had ever been rejected. He would not name the workhouses in question for this reason, that the charge depended upon the statement of poor persons, who, having left the neighbourhood, could not now be brought forward to verify it; but he had heard on authority which he could not question that those persons were trustworthy, honest men. What he desired now was to bring this failure in the operation of the law—and a very serious one it was—under the notice of the right hon. Gentleman with the view that the attention of the Board might be turned to the subject, and that hereafter, if it were possible to do so by legislation, measures might be taken to provide a remedy. At present he did not intend to move any Amendment to the clause; but he desired to obtain from the right hon. Gentleman the assurance that he would establish some practical supervision of the operation of this Act, and enforce as far as he could upon the workhouse authorities the necessity of their admitting all destitute persons who applied within the time prescribed by the Act, unless there were some good ground for their non-admission. He wished also to allude to one other point. The Return laid upon the table of the House exhibited an enormous difference in the amount of diet allowed to the paupers. In some workhouses a ridiculous amount of relief was granted; while in others the allowance was comparatively liberal. Such a state of things, however, tended to create between the different parishes a competition of parsimony; because guardians would endeavour to reduce their scale of relief to the amount afforded by their neighbours, in order to prevent an influx of paupers into their parish. In the clause of which he had originally given notice he had inserted a provision relating to this matter, but it had been struck out by the right hon. Gentleman. He hoped, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman would, at all events, exercise the powers which he already possessed to secure a uniformity of diet.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, he was glad that the noble Lord was satisfied with the course which he had pursued on the previous day, because, according to the noble Lord's admission, he had accepted the practicable portion of the Amendment suggested by the noble Lord, and omitted only that portion which, according to the noble Lord's own statement, it would have been impossible to carry into effect. The noble Lord said he desired to put on the statute book a declaration that the guardians were bound to relieve every destitute person who applied for relief. That duty existed now. By the state of the law at present the guardians were obliged to admit everybody seeking relief, and the Poor Law Board already had power to enforce this course upon them, as far as they had any authority at all to interfere in the proceedings of the guardians. The noble Lord had fairly admitted that he had never that the duty in this respect, nor had any proof upon this point been adduced by any one else. That was the case with the Poor Law Board. Charges to that effect had undoubtedly been made, but no proof had, in any instance, been forthcoming. His hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) had, on the previous day, mentioned a case which had come under his own notice. His hon. Friend had been told by a man who asked him for relief, that he had been to the workhouse, but had received nothing, and that the wards were full. Anxious to test the truth of the statements, his hon. Friend accompanied the man to the workhouse, and not only found that the story was untrue, but that the man himself was an arrant impostor. It was in the absence of such inquiry that letters, reflecting upon the conduct of Boards of Guardians, were written to the leading journal of the country. He believed that the guardians were desirous of providing adequate accommodation, and for this reason they desired that this Bill might be made permanent. In answer to his inquiries, he learned that the police had refused about seventeen or eighteen persons; but their reasons for so doing were, that in all the cases the applicants for relief were drunk, disorderly, riotous, or had money in their pockets. He did not, however, believe that any really destitute person had been refused; and now that the Act was made permanent, even better provision than existed hitherto would be made for the relief of paupers. He was not aware that any further improvement could be effected by this Bill.

[BILL 100.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2 (Power of Secretary of State in Council to purchase Land.)

SIR GEORGE BOWYER rose to object to the system of the Chairman in calling out simply the number of the clauses, instead of following the old practice of reading the main notes of each clause.

SIR VANSI

ART observed, that the clause gave power to the Secretary of State for India to purchase lands with money derived from Indian revenue. He wished to know what had become of the £200,000 received from the sale of the old East India House, Haileybury and Addiscombe Colleges, and Warley? He had looked over the accounts and could not find those sums charged to the credit of the Indian Government. Probably they had been handed over to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to enable him to produce a popular Budget on the eve of a general election.

SIR CHARLES WOOD assured the hon. Member that if he would look back to past accounts he would find the sums received from the sale of the properties mentioned duly credited to the Indian Government. The object of the Bill was not to purchase a site, but to take compulsory powers with respect to the land required for the building.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON observed, that the Secretary for India had stated on a previous occasion that nothing would be charged to the Indian revenue for the objects of this Bill.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the object of the Bill was to obtain possession of property in order to widen the street, and the surplus land would probably be sufficient to meet all the expense.

LORD ROBERT CECIL thought the hon. Baronet near him (Sir George Bowyer) was justified in calling attention to a departure from the old practice in Committee; inasmuch as it now appeared that when asked upon this very clause what had become of certain moneys the Secretary of State could only tell the hon. Member who put the question that if he looked through the accounts for five years he would find it all entered in them. He hoped that the old practice in Committee would be adhered to in future.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the term "old practice" seemed to imply an innovation on the part of the present Chairman of Ways and Means. From his own experience he could only state that he was not aware of any innovation. The practice had always been to adapt the rate of progress with the Bill to the importance of the Bill itself. He himself had introduced a Bill consolidating all the laws relating to the duties upon spirits, which contained 400 clauses, which Bill passed through Committee in five minutes. Members were supposed to have the Bill in their hands and to be able to call attention to any clause upon which they had any remark to make.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER disclaimed any intention to impute blame to the Chairman, who had only followed the practice of his predecessors; but he still maintained that the old and the proper practice was for the Chairman to read the marginal note of each clause. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the rate of progress of a Bill depended upon the importance of the Bill; but that was not a question that ought to be left to the discretion of any officer of the House, however high his authority might be.

MR. VANSITTART observed, that although the Secretary of State for India told them that the clause only gave power to purchase land, yet there was a charge for the cost of such land upon the Indian revenues.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he did not anticipate any loss, but if there were, it would fall on the revenues of India.

PUBLIC HOUSE CLOSING ACT (1864) AMENDMENT BILL—[BILL 22.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. COX, in moving the second reading of this Bill, complained that he had been represented as desiring to re-instate the orgies of the Haymarket. No man was better pleased than himself with the result of the Public House Closing Act upon the neighbourhood in question; it had put down scenes which were a disgrace to the metropolis; still he would again assert that the measure was directed against that locality, and he was borne out in this view by the language of the Home Secretary in introducing the Bill. When that speech was made every Member understood the right hon. Gentleman to apply his observations to the Haymarket and Coventry Street. Yet, while he freely admitted that the result of the Act had been beneficial in those quarters, it had also inflicted very great detriment and injury upon many of Her Majesty's subjects. He alluded to persons who were in the habit of attending the public markets of the metropolis. One petition in favour of the present Bill was signed by 400 persons attending the Metropolitan Cattle Market. Another was signed by 895 gardeners, salesmen, and green-grocers attending Covent Garden Market. Petitions for the Bill were also signed by 691 persons attending Newgate Market, and 150 persons attending Farringdon Market. There had also been a petition signed by 1,187 persons engaged in the offices of the morning newspapers and on the printing establishments of the metropolis. They had to commence business at 7 p.m., and when they came out of their places of business between 2 and 3 o'clock a.m., they were unable to obtain any refreshment. Why should not these persons be able to take a cup of tea or coffee? A petition had been presented against the Bill, which was signed by a person who called himself the Chairman of the West London Association for Suppression of Public Immorality. He (Mr. Cox) was as anxious as the chairman who signed the petition to suppress public immorality; but the Bill before the House had nothing to do with morality at all. His Bill simply proposed to give a discretion to the Home Secretary, to the Lord Mayor of London, and the mayors of boroughs where the Act had been adopted to give licences for opening not only public-houses but also coffee houses. The Bill gave power to the local authorities, on evidence being produced of the necessity of accommodating any considerable number of people attending markets or being otherwise engaged within the prohibited hours, to grant occasional licences for the sale of refreshment. A great deal of hardship was suffered, under the present law, especially in regard to markets. For instance, all the people who were obliged to be at the Islington Cattle Market by eleven or twelve o'clock on Sunday night, arriving, perhaps, from distant parts by railway, were unable to obtain any refreshment until four o'clock in the morning. This was a great hardship, and during this inclement weather was a very serious thing. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading, and expressing his readiness to receive any suggestions for its Amendment which might be tendered in Committee.

COLONEL EDWARDS had great pleasure in seconding the Motion of the hon.

Member for Finsbury. He was, however, extremely sorry that this Bill should be brought on at this late hour (a quarter to one o'clock), because he knew that on that (the Opposition) side of the House there were many Members absent who approved of the measure, and would have wished to take part in the discussion. He wished it to be perfectly understood that, whilst advocating this Bill, he did not wish to interfere with the Public House Closing Act of last Session, which had been such a great boon to the metropolis, but simply to grant one or two licences to houses for the use of the night workers, to be placed under the control and surveillance of the local authorities, near the markets and morning newspaper offices, to relieve from a great grievance and most meritorious and important class, to whose labours during the midnight and early morning hours not only the United Kingdom, but he might add the whole civilized world, were indebted for rapid information of all occurrences in all countries, whether political or social. He alluded to the compositors who supplied the formes for the press, and they were bound to do all in their power to promote the comfort and well-being of these people. It might be urged by the Home Secretary that the leading journal had already provided for these in their employment upon their own premises, which was most commendable, but there were other proprietors, whose premises were more limited, and so circumscribed, that it was impossible to afford space for a canteen where the night workers could obtain refreshment. When at two or three o'clock in the morning they left their work, where they had been engaged in an artificially heated atmosphere, there was no place open in which they could find those refreshments which were absolutely necessary for them, and, from the arduous nature of their employment, a certain amount of stimulant was essential. Some of them, after these long hours of toil in this unwholesome air, had long distances to walk before they reached home without having any resting place. Under these circumstances he thought the Bill absolutely necessary, and the hon. Member for Finsbury was entitled to much credit for having introduced it. Although the House was small, he trusted the Bill might be allowed to be read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. )

Wm. OLIVER. [THIRD READING.]

Mr. LAWSON opposed the Motion. The Bill of last Session had proved itself a most useful measure, and had effected a wonderful improvement in the appearance of the streets of London at night. The Vestry of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, had petitioned against the Bill. There were thirty-one towns under the operation of the Act, besides the metropolis, with a population of upwards of 2,500,000, and the Act worked well in all of them; and he, therefore, thought that any alteration would be imprudent. The hon. Member might have established some cases of grievance, but they were entirely local—confined to the metropolis. What The Times could do for its employés the other London journals could do for theirs. ["No, no!"] It was an insult to the proprietors and managers of those other papers to say that they could not. He admitted it was a grievance to market gardeners and others whose business required them to be out at a late hour of the night or very early hours of the morning to include the sale of ordinary refreshments with that of spirituous liquors in the prohibition under the Act of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Home Department. He thought the sale of liquors not spirituous might have been permitted ["No, no!"]; but if as regarded the sale of spirits an exception was made in favour of compositors, drovers, and gardeners, the public in general would come in, and the Act of last Session would be inoperative. There was a grievance, but it was so small a one that he thought it would not be well to accede to the proposition of the hon. Member. He, therefore, moved, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Mr. FINLAY seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now" and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Lawson.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Mr. HENLEY said, the hon. Gentleman who had moved the rejection of the Bill ought to have been the first to second the Motion for the second reading, for the measure was a very moderate one, and, he thought, calculated to advance the peculiar views of the hon. Member. To put down the assembly of loose men and looser women in a particular quarter of the town the Bill of last Session had been passed.

The hon. Member (Mr. Lawson) would open coffee houses, and let the loose men and loose women assemble in those houses. If something were not done to relax the provisions of the Act of last year there would be a re-action. The Members of that House had their refreshment rooms open up to any hour at which the House might adjourn. In those rooms they could have their wine or beer. How, then, could they reconcile it to their consciences to refuse to allow hardworking people an opportunity of purchasing a glass of beer when, if people were working, they most required refreshment? It was all very well to say that The Times had established a club. People were going about endeavouring to get the humbler classes to form clubs; and if they did form clubs, how could the House prevent them from drinking in those places? There was no use in the Members of that House cocking up their noses. If the humbler classes were not permitted to have their refreshments openly, they would have them secretly, and perhaps under much more dangerous circumstances.

SIR GEORGE GREY should be sorry to sanction any measure which would materially interfere with the operation of an Act which had worked so beneficially as the one passed last year for the closing of public-houses within certain hours. He must observe that the beneficial operation of that Act had not been confined to the Haymarket. There were places in the East End also in which much disorder had prevailed, and the Act had worked well in that quarter of the metropolis as well as in the West End. The hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Lawson) appeared to think that refreshment houses ought not to have been included in the Bill of last year; but if the hon. Gentleman was in possession of the facts which had been laid before him in respect of many of those houses, he might, perhaps, be disposed to change his opinion. He was bound, however, to say that he had received many representations of the inconvenience felt by a portion of the community, especially persons having business in the markets of the metropolis, in consequence of the operation of the Act; and he thought those persons were entitled to have their case fairly considered. He believed that, without injuring the beneficial operation of the Act, or destroying any of the restraints imposed on disorderly houses, it might be possible to effect the object which his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury had in view. The case of persons attending the markets was not so difficult to deal with as that of other parties from whom representations had been received, because generally there were public-houses within the precincts or in the immediate vicinity of the metropolitan markets. But with respect to public-houses scattered in other localities, it was not so easy to make a selection of public-houses without imposing an invidious duty on the police. He should have already given notice of Amendments to his hon. Friend's Bill, but he had been seeing deputations on the subject from day to day. Only that day he had received a large one from the neighbourhood of Covent Garden. Those whom the deputation represented were not anxious that the Bill should be relaxed, and asked that if a relaxation of its provisions were decided on it should be to the least extent possible. He should not oppose the second reading of his hon. Friend's Bill; but he should have certain Amendments to propose in Committee, and of these he should give an early notice.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that the hon. Member for Finsbury did not pretend to give additional means of refreshment to particular classes, but merely allowed the authorities to extend the hour for closing refreshment houses.

MR. AYRTON hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not give power to the police to give certain tradesmen liberty to keep open beyond the usual hours. This was a point for the consideration of the magistrates only. It was impossible to open certain houses for the accommodation of certain classes—if open to any one, they would be open to all. He thought it would be better to repeal the Bill of last Session altogether rather than to amend it in the way proposed.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, the local authorities of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, dreaded the public-houses in that place being opened while those in the surrounding neighbourhood were closed, as the consequence would be that all the improper characters would congregate there.

MR. LAWSON said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

THE CURRAGH OF KILDARE.

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, it was commonly reported in Ireland that the Department of Woods and Forests were about to transfer the whole care and management of the Curragh to the War Office, and there was a very strong feeling upon the subject, for the Irish public seemed to think that if such a transfer were made, that great plain would be greatly damaged. It was certainly announced at the time the military went there that the occupation would not be made permanent; but however that might be, it would be a very serious thing if the whole of the Curragh was handed over to the military authorities and the office of the Ranger abolished. Whether the Crown had a right to dispose of it in that way might be a legal question, but at all events there were considerable interests involved. There had been proprietary common rights in existence for a long period, and at one time as many as 30,000 sheep grazed there, though at present there were scarcely 12,000, if so many. That was no light matter to the farmers of the neighbourhood. He wished then to ask, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to transfer by lease or otherwise, the Care and Management of the Curragh of Kildare from the office of Woods and Forests to the War Department, and to abolish the Office of Ranger of the Curragh?

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, that the War Department occupied the Curragh only on the licence of the Woods and Forests; but as considerable difficulties had arisen from that state of things, the Woods and Forests had for some time been anxious to hand over the Curragh, on lease, to the War Office. Of course the Woods and Forests could hand over only that to which they had a legal right. With respect to the position of the Ranger, nothing would be done during the life of the present holder of the office; but upon his death, or on his ceasing to hold the office, it would become a matter of consideration with the Government what should be done. If his noble Friend or any others had any suggestions to offer they would be sure to receive every attention.

EAST INDIA (GOVERNOR GENERAL'S POWERS, &amp;c.) BILL.—(No. 57.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee on the said Bill read.

LORD LYVEDEN wished to ask, Whether the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for India could furnish the House with any information as to the actual state of our relations with Bhootan? Their Lordships would remember that the Queen's Speech at the opening of the Session contained a paragraph with reference to this subject, in which it was stated that a force had been despatched which, it was hoped, would procure reparation for the past and security for the future. But the force had done neither, for it appeared that they had turned back in consequence of a flight of arrows or some such proceeding on the part of the Natives. The whole affair was simply this:—We sent an ambassador to a savage tribe by whom he was ill-treated, as might have been expected; and the consequence was the war which was now being waged. An opinion was pretty generally entertained that the territory of Bhootan was to be annexed. We had made many annexations which had been profitable, and for those the robber's plea might be admitted; but he could conceive nothing more worthless than the annexation of Bhootan. Now there were three questions which he wished to ask in connection with this subject—namely, whether there was any intention to annex the whole of Bhootan or a part of it; if so, what number of troops had been sent for that purpose; and what provision had been made to secure the troops against the severity of the climate?

LORD DUFFERIN deprecated, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, any discussion about the war in Bhootan until their Lordships had had an opportunity of examining the papers on the subject, of which a part had been laid upon the table, and the remainder was in preparation. As their

Lordships were aware, for a long series of years the people of Bhootan had been in the habit of carrying their depredations over the frontiers of Her Majesty's dominions. Before the outbreak of the Indian mutiny the Government of India had it in contemplation to insist on some reparation; but in consequence of that event the intention of doing so was postponed. As the inhabitants of Bhootan, however, continued to carry off, not only the goods of British subjects, but also British subjects themselves in great numbers, it became obvious that some decisive measures must be taken. It was thought advisable to send an Envoy, in the first instance, for the purpose of making representations to the Government of Bhootan. That Envoy, as was well known to their Lordships, had been subjected to gross ill-treatment; but that circumstance only rendered it the more necessary that some decisive course should be followed. Accordingly, it was determined to organize a military force for this special purpose, and to despatch it into Bhootan. Bhootan consisted of a long, narrow territory, principally of a mountainous character, but it was bordered by a flat strip or riband of very fertile soil; and it was considered that by pushing our frontier a little further north—some fifteen or twenty miles—and getting possession of this strip, we should be able to put an effectual check upon the depredations of the people of Bhootan. Accordingly, four columns marched towards the hills, which they occupied without any opposition worthy of mention, and four forts were taken possession of by our troops. Three of those positions were still in our hands, and there was no doubt, from the information we had received, that they would be held with success. The fourth of these positions we had been compelled to give up, but the reason of that was the difficulty which was experienced in procuring water. There was no doubt, however, that in a short time we should be able to occupy the whole of the territory we considered necessary for our purpose. With regard to the question as to the permanent occupation of Bhootan, he could assure the noble Lord that no intention of the kind had ever for a moment been entertained by Her Majesty's Government. Any noble Lord who should read the papers would be of opinion that the course adopted by the Government of India was one which their Lordships ought to approve. The force to be sent forward would consist of a regiment and a half of European troops, two batteries of artillery, and three regiments of Native levies.

LORD LYVEDEN inquired, whether it was by the orders of Sir John Lawrence that the expedition had been undertaken?

LORD DUFFERIN said it was.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords, when this expedition was sent forth it should have been considered that the country which it was about to enter was exceedingly unhealthy, and every possible precaution should have been taken to secure the health of the troops. I think the time at which it must have moved was unfortunate. It could not have moved before the 25th of March, when the season required that troops should go into cantonments. My Lords, I confess I have read the accounts of this expedition with very great alarm—an alarm proceeding not only from the apparent want of discretion in the arrangements made for the purpose of carrying on the campaign, but also from the evident weakness and incapacity of the new regiments formed and officered as they now are for the conduct of the operations. The same error was committed last year that was committed the year before. A force was sent into an enemy's country without any reserve being at hand to support it in the event of disaster. A force of 5,000 men was sent against the enemy at the end of 1863. They advanced three miles into the enemy's country; but they had not been there twenty-four hours before they sent for 5,000 more to protect their communications; and these 5,000 could not arrive until after the lapse of six weeks. That is not the way in which we can carry on war with the chance of success. The same want of foresight occurred in the present instance. Three or four weeks elapsed before the European and Native troops ordered up as re-inforcements could move. That is not the way in which we can carry on war with advantage. The noble Lord says it was not quite so bad as that, and that they were obliged to retreat for want of water. But did any man ever hear of such an occurrence as was stated to have happened in this instance? It is incredible. I do not understand how any man who ever wore a red coat could carry on a war without making due provision for supplying his men with water. It was impossible that these troops, without water, should hold their position against an enemy. I tell your Lordships that at a very early period you will be compelled to give your most earnest consideration to the whole question of the expediency of maintaining that new organization of the Indian army which was established four or five years ago. It is the first time since the introduction of standing armies that an attempt has been made to maintain an army without regimental organization. These regiments are officered from time to time by gentlemen from the Staff. I have looked through the list of officers of one of those regiments—the 43rd. I find that the commanding officer has been for a long time at the head of that regiment. In its former condition it might be considered rather as a body of police than as a regiment, and I regret extremely that there has been given to it the name of one of the noblest regiments of the Indian army. They are nothing but a parcel of police. Looking at the list of the other officers, I find it most unsatisfactory. One of the officers who joined in November went into the field with the troops in December. Others joined only at the beginning of the year. It is impossible to expect discipline and efficiency in the field if you send new officers to join a regiment just as it is going into the presence of the enemy. You cannot do that safely with your own European troops; how then can it be done with Native troops, who look to European officers to take them into action? I trust that no long time will elapse before the attention of your Lordships will be called to this subject. It is one that has occupied my mind seriously for a very considerable period. There are no means of filling up the ranks of that Staff—none whatever—when the old officers of the East India Company's army are gone. The Queen's army does not offer recruits to that service. You are within a few years of having no officers whatever to command the Native troops of India. It is absolutely impossible to carry on the present organization, and it is time for the Government, without regarding the discredit of so doing, seriously to consider, if not the expediency of going back to what was, at all events to make a material alteration in what is, and to establish a real regimental organization of the Indian army.

PRIVATE BILLS.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he had been requested by his noble Friend the Earl of Shaftesbury, who was unavoidably absent, to submit to your Lordships the Motion of which the noble Earl had given notice for the Amendment of Standing Order No. 191. The Amendment of his noble Friend had for its object to impose upon railway and other companies the obligation of submitting their Bills with a very accurate statement of the number of houses which the Bill proposed to take, and which were inhabited by the labouring classes; the number of persons who would be driven from their houses; and whether any provision was made in the Bill for affording those persons the accommodation of other dwellings. The matter was brought before their Lordships a few evenings ago, and it was then allowed to stand over in order that certain difficulties which were suggested should be duly considered. He had endeavoured to insert words, with the approval of the noble Earl, which would, he thought, meet the difficulty. He proposed to make it requisite to include in the Returns, not only the number of tenants in the houses, but of those also who lodged therein, and who might only be temporary residents. He proposed, therefore, to strike out the words "inhabited by the labouring classes," and insert the words "occupied either altogether or partially as tenants or lodgers by persons belonging to the labouring classes." That would insure the Return of the actual dwellers of the houses in whatever capacity, and whether they resided as tenants or lodgers.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he understood that the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) had proposed to go further than obtaining a mere Return; he wished that the occupants of these houses should have notice of the intention to take the houses. He required that all the persons proposed to be displaced, whether tenants or lodgers, should have notice served upon them separately and individually before they were displaced. At present it was only necessary that notice should be served on the actual tenant.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said; it was found that there would be a difficulty about personal notice upon each occupier—it would often be found impossible. The latter part of the amended Standing Order of his noble Friend contained a stringent provision requiring that the companies should, by notices placed in public view, upon or within a reasonable distance of the houses proposed to be taken, make known their intention of taking them; and that they should not actually take them until they had obtained a certificate of a justice that this provision of the Standing Order had been satisfactorily complied with.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH suggested that the words requiring personal notice to heads of families should be omitted from the Standing Order, and that the notice by placards, handbills, or other public notice should be alone insisted on.

LORD REDESDALE said, that when the subject was under the consideration of the House a few days ago, he had suggested that, after the words "fifteen houses" in the proposed Order, the words "in any parish or place" should be inserted. He was now, however, of opinion that it would be better to substitute for those words the words "in any city, town, or place." By that means a fuller Return might be secured, while there would be no objection to the increase of the number of houses with respect to which the Return was to be made from fifteen to twenty.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY thought the words "in any city, town, or place" somewhat too vague. He suggested the substitution of the word "parish" for "place," and the expediency of fixing the number of houses named in the Order at thirty.

LORD CHELMSFORD also objected to the word "place" as being indefinite, observing that, in a case which had been tried under the Gaming Act a short time ago, the foot of a tree in Hyde Park where certain persons had assembled for the purposes of betting had been held to be a "place."

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he was anxious, on the part of the clergy, to express the great interest which they felt in the question under discussion, and their desire that the conditions of the proposed Order should be made as stringent as possible. The devastation occasioned by the public improvements undertaken in the metropolis was more extensive than their Lordships were probably aware. He was informed by a clergyman that in one parish in the City of London, in which one-third of the houses had been swept away, there was still no perceptible diminution in the number of the poor inhabiting the parish; while in another parish, in which the proportion of houses destroyed was even greater, the rates continued to be as high as before—thus showing that the number of poor who inhabited the remaining houses was as large as ever. How that state of things came to pass it was difficult to say with any degree of accuracy; but, speaking on behalf of the clergy, he was extremely desirous that the subject should not be allowed to rest even at the point to which their Lordships were now bringing it, inasmuch as they were convinced that if the humbler classes were, by overcrowding their dwellings, reduced to that condition which had been so graphically described by the noble Earl who brought the question forward on a former evening, any efforts to provide for their spiritual wants or their education must be altogether unavailing. It seemed very difficult to find a remedy for the case. Much good, it had been said, could not be expected to be done by improved lodging-houses; although much, it was true, had been done by private individuals in the way of improving the dwellings of the poor, yet when all that had been effected in that direction at a great sacrifice was compared with the misery which was to be contended with, it would be at once seen that no adequate remedy had as yet been provided. In the immediate neighbourhood of their Lordships' House a wealthy merchant, greatly to his honour, had spent a large sum of money in the erection of model lodging-houses capable of accommodating some 800 persons; but then the number of poor removed at one stroke, owing to a slight improvement which took place after those houses were erected, was double that which he found himself able to accommodate. In another part of London a lady well known for her benevolence in carrying out works of that description had expended a large amount in improving the dwellings of the poor; yet those dwellings bore no proportion to the number of poor who were removed. Among the Returns which had been placed in his hands was one stating that the corporation of the City of London had taken up the subject, and had erected certain houses for the poor. Their example, he trusted, would be followed by other corporations. There were other bodies which had large funds that might be made available for the purpose. For example, the vestries of parishes in the City of London were, in some cases, so rich that they literally did not know what to do with their money; and as that money had been placed at their disposal for the benefit of the poor they could not better expend the money than in erecting such model lodging-houses as those to which he had alluded. He desired to say another word on the subject. It was not only the spiritual interests of the poor of the metropolis for which the clergy were anxious; they were also alive to the necessity of taking care that considerations of health should not be neglected—especially at a moment when, if what was stated in the public journals were true, a mysterious disease which had passed from village to village had inflicted itself on a great capital, its ravages being aggravated, it would seem, by the circumstance that 40,000 had been added to the population, and a large number of houses therefore overcrowded. It was surely most desirable that before such a scourge visited this country—if, unfortunately, it should visit us—we should not have a vast army of poor displaced from their habitations and compelled to overcrowd the wretched abodes to which they were driven for shelter.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that in the absence of the noble Earl on whose behalf he had risen to move the present Order, he could not agree to the proposal for increasing the number of houses mentioned beyond fifteen. He had no objection, however, to the insertion of the words, “in any city, town, or parish,” which would, he thought, render the returns to be made more definite. He was also prepared to assent to the suggestion that the words “either by personal notice to heads of families inhabiting the same at the time of giving such notice” should be struck out, and that the words should be retained rendering it obligatory on Companies to give notice by placards and handbills publicly exhibited in the vicinity of the houses about to be pulled down, with the further provision having reference to the certificate of a magistrate being necessary to show that the Order had been complied with.

Motion agreed to: Standing Order No. 191 amended as follows:—

“That in the Case of any Bill for making any Work, for the construction of which compulsory Power is sought to take in any City, Town, or Parish Fifteen Houses or more occupied either wholly or partially as Tenants or Lodgers by Persons belonging to the Labouring Classes, the Promoters be required to deposit in the Office of the Clerk of the Parliaments on or before the 31st Day of December a Statement of the Number, Description, and Situation of the said Houses, the Number (so far as they can be ascertained) of Persons to be displaced, and whether any and what Provision is made in the Bill for remedying the Inconvenience likely to arise from such Displacement, and that such Statement be referred to the Committee on the Bill, and that the said Committee do inquire into and report thereon; and that in every such Bill a Clause be inserted to enact that the Company shall, not less than Eight Weeks before taking any such Houses, make known their Intention to take the same by Placards, Handbills, or other general Notice placed in public View upon or within a reasonable Distance from such Houses, and that the Company shall not take any such Houses until they have obtained the Certificate of a Justice that it has been proved to his Satisfaction that the Company have made known their Intention to take the same in manner required by this Provision.”

THE REVISED CODE. EXAMINATION OF CHILDREN.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, he desired to draw the attention of the noble Earl the Lord President to a recent Order of the Education Committee by which children under six years of age were required to attend their respective schools on the day of inspection in order to entitle themselves to claim a portion of the public grant. He had on a previous occasion deemed it to be his duty to state his opinion as to the impolicy and harshness of that Order, according as it was brought into operation in summer or in winter, and his noble Friend the President of the Council had informed him that instructions had been issued with the view of meeting certain cases. Now he thought it was extremely desirable that a public statement should be made by his noble Friend as to the precise course which the Government were about to pursue in the matter, in order that all persons might know how things really stood. This was retrospective action on the part of the Privy Council, and he hoped that his noble Friend's sense of justice would prevent his supporting such an act of injustice. No notice whatever was given to the schools that the Inspector would require the attendance of these young scholars; and therefore he should like to know what were the exact instructions under which the Inspectors were now acting.

EARL GRANVILLE was understood to say that the rules now acted upon had substantially been in force ever since the Revised Code came into operation. It was necessary that these children should be present in order that the Inspector might ascertain what was the general system of the school.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY observed, that for that purpose it was not necessary that all the children should be present.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that if the presence of all the children was not required, picked examples might be presented to the Inspector, so as to deceive him as to the real condition of the school.

LORD REDESDALE thought that to require "extraordinary circumstances" to be given for the absence of such young children was a little too stringent. He would suggest that the report of the Inspector should be of "the circumstances" instead of "the extraordinary circumstances" which might have prevented the attendance of the children. Snow upon the ground might be a good reason why these young children should not go to school; but in winter time that could hardly be considered an "extraordinary" circumstance.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that if a wet day was to be a sufficient excuse for the non-attendance of children they would hardly ever go to school.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, that at all events the allowance to the schools for last year ought not without notice to have been made to depend upon the attendance of these young children.

LORD REDESDALE thought it was unreasonable to require children of a tender age to attend school in case of bad weather, and thus to compel them to sit all day in wet clothes. He approved on the whole what the Government had done up to the present time with regard to the educational question; but he trusted they would in future exercise generosity towards these little children.

THE EPIDEMIC AT ST. PETERSBURG. QUESTION.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD: My Lords, before the House rises for the recess, I should wish to ask the noble Earl the Lord President, Whether he can give the House any further information than it already possesses on the subject of the epidemic at St. Petersburg mentioned by my right rev. Brother (the Bishop of London)? The noble Earl has no doubt noticed in one of the leading papers of to-day a telegram from St. Petersburg purporting to give details of the symptoms of that epidemic which tend to identify it with the disease commonly known as the plague. As Parliament is about to rise for the recess, and as the northern ports will shortly be open, no doubt great anxiety will arise with regard to this epidemic, which would be considerably allayed by an intimation from the noble Earl that Her Majesty's Government are quite alive to the importance of the subject, and are instituting inquiries into the extent and nature of the disease.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, it is quite true that a telegram has been received to-day from Berlin which gives a worse account of the epidemic than we had previously received from St. Petersburg. A medical officer of great experience has been sent to St. Petersburg, and another gentleman of equal professional attainments has since been sent to the valley of the Vistula to ascertain the real character of the disease. I am not aware that we can take any further steps in the matter.

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, to Thursday, the 27th Instant, a quarter before Five o'clock.

METROPOLIS SEWAGE AND ESSEX

CONSIDERATION.

As amended, considered.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be read the third time."—
(Sir William Russell.)

MR. AYRTON said, that he felt it his duty to bring under the consideration of the House some circumstances relating to the Bill. It having been thought desirable to appropriate the sewage of the metropolis for agricultural purposes and for reclaiming some portions of the seacoast, the Metropolitan Board of Works advertised in 1860 for any scheme by which the sewage might be disposed of in such ways for the benefit of the ratepayers. The various projects were ultimately reduced to two—one by Mr. Ellis, and the other by Messrs. Hope and Napier. The terms of the advertisement published by the Metropolitan Board for tenders notified to every one that the projects were to be carried on at the sole risk of the projectors, and the ratepayers generally were satisfied that the matter should be proceeded with on that footing. After some delay and consideration the Metropolitan Board of Works determined to avail themselves of the project of Messrs. Hope and Napier, which seemed to combine in itself the elements of other projects, and applied to the House for a Bill to carry it into effect. There was a great deal of agitation in the metropolis on the subject of the concession, and to pacify the inhabitants he had moved that the Bill be referred, not to an ordinary private Committee, but to one of a more public character, which should, in the interest of the ratepayers, ascertain what was the best scheme for the utilization of the sewage of the metropolis. When that Committee met he found, to his utter astonishment, that instead of the terms of the advertisement being carried out, an agreement had been entered into between Messrs. Hope and Napier and the Metropolitan Board three days before the second reading of the Bill, which agreement was of a most extraordinary character, for its effect was to give to the Secretary of State, in the event of the failure of the projectors of the scheme, the power of compelling by his mere fiat the ratepayers to pay every shilling of the expense. This agreement was to take effect only if it received the sanction of Parliament, and in this way the Metropolitan Board of Works threw the whole responsibility on Parliament. Again, there was a clause in the Bill which was perfectly illusory, for, though it allowed the Board of Works to look at the accounts in connection with this project, it did not permit them to look at the vouchers. This was a matter also requiring attention. The contractors applied to the Committee to extend the time for the completion of the works, and they were allowed by the Committee the enormous period of ten years. He consequently proposed a Resolution to the Committee, declaring that the Committee were bound in the interest of the public to watch over the transaction; but that Amendment having been rejected, it became necessary for the House to deal with the question. The Committee also declined to give the ratepayers the power of examining the accounts of the company. What course ought they to take? He was not anxious to defeat this Bill. On the contrary, he thought that the Bill might be carried on with great advantage to the ratepayers, provided that they were not made to bear all the loss, and that they saw they were honestly treated by those who were projecting this Bill. He was anxious that the House should understand that this was no ordinary application to Parliament. It struck him as being one of the most unusual that could possibly be imagined. This was not an application to Parliament by a responsible body, who undertook to carry out these works. When a Railway Bill was being promoted, there was a subscription and a deposit which was to be impounded and forfeited if the works were not carried out. But this was a Bill promoted by certain gentlemen who especially declared that they were not acting under any deed or agreement of partnership, and that no capital had yet been created; and it was upon such grounds that they asked that House to give them power to take all this land by compulsion, and to hold this power for ten years. But that was not all. The promoters had actually put in the Bill clauses by which they were to be enabled to raise £2,000, to be increased to £3,000 if necessary, and sell the Act of Parliament as soon as it was granted for whatever sum they could obtain. He thought that when the House was dealing with people who came to them upon such a footing, without being a company, without capital, and who boldly asked to be allowed to sell the Act of Parliament, it was its bounden duty to see that the Act of Parliament was one which was consistent with good faith towards the ratepayers of the metropolis, and that all the risk and failure should not fall upon them in case the promoters were unable to carry their project into effect. He had deemed it his duty, under these circumstances, having moved for the Committee on behalf of the ratepayers, to call the attention of the House to the failure that had taken place in the performance of the duties of the Committee, and to ask the House to defer the further consideration of this Bill until after Easter, in order that the promoters might be able to take into consideration the propriety of bringing up clauses to protect the ratepayers, on the one hand from being liable for the loss in case of failure, and on the other to give the ratepayers power to look into the accounts and dealings of this company with a view of satisfying themselves that all these transactions were fair and aboveboard. He moved that the further consideration of the Bill be deferred until after Easter.

To leave out from the words "That the" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "further Consideration of the Bill be postponed till this day three weeks,"—(Mr. Ayrton,)—instead thereof.

MR. KNIGHT said, that having sat on the Committee he wished to say that they had looked on the work as one of public and national utility. The promoters undertook to get rid of the sewage of the north of London beyond Barking Creek without the probability of its returning. Its success or failure as an agricultural operation was a secondary point with them, although they had every reason to believe that it would succeed in that respect extremely well. The only opposition was brought forward by a Mr. Ellis; and his opposition greatly confirmed the probability of success from the proposed mode of using the sewage. Messrs. Hope and Napier's plan combined all the benefits offered by Mr. Ellis, together with a great outlet for the sewage into the sea where it would be quite clear of the Thames. As to no capital being subscribed for the scheme, the House should recollect that very many railway Bills were passed without there being any bond fide subscription, except that some engineer put his name down for a large sum. He trusted that the House would not allow the Bill to be put aside.

MR. HEADLAM said, that as he was Chairman of the Select Committee to which this Bill was referred, he would state to the House as clearly as he could what took place. In the first place, his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets had imported into this discussion a great deal of matter of which he (Mr. Headlam) did not think that that House could take cognizance. The hon. Gentleman had stated certain circumstances against the promoters of the Bill—namely, that they were not a company, and that they had made no deposit. Now, although the City of London opposed this Bill before the Committee, no objection on that ground was taken by them against it, and the Committee had every reason to suppose that this company was constituted in the regular form, that everything requested by the House in the nature of deposit had been performed, and certainly nothing took place before the Committee to lead them to suppose that any irregularity of that description had taken place. His hon. Friend supported the Bill, and he (Mr. Headlam) fully expected that he would have given them every assistance afterwards in passing it. He voted with the Committee on the preamble of the Bill, and he also voted with them, and they carried unanimously the Report which spoke in the most favourable terms of the plan now submitted to the House. When that particular Article, No. 15, came before the Committee no objection whatever was taken to it, nor was the attention of the Committee particularly directed to it, and it was only after the Committee had passed the agreement that his hon. Friend for the first time brought up the two clauses which were upon the paper, and which the Committee by a majority of five to two rejected, and, as he (Mr. Headlam) thought, rightly rejected. He now understood the object of his hon. Friend to be to get those two clauses which the Committee rejected inserted in the Bill. The first clause related to an auditor to be appointed by the Metropolitan Board of Works with extraordinary powers, the practical effect of which would have been that although that Board declined the responsibility of having a director, they would have had an auditor who might have objected to almost anything done by that company. He (Mr.

Headlam) voted against that clause, as he considered it would be an improper clause to insert in the Bill. He considered that the Metropolitan Board of Works were the guardians of the ratepayers, and that they need not go beyond them in considering the ratepayers' interests. He also objected to the other clause—that relating to an absolute forfeiture—as being too strong and arbitrary, and he consequently voted against it. He was perfectly willing to admit that Article 15 as it now stood was also objectionable, and ought to be altered. It left a power in the hands of the Secretary of State which it would be inconvenient for him to exercise. With this exception he did not think any alteration ought to be made in the Bill, and he should certainly object to the insertion of the clauses of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets.

MR. HENLEY said, the statement of the right hon. Gentleman seemed to confirm the necessity for postponing this Bill till after Easter, because from that it seemed there was a section in the agreement—Article 15—which was really objectionable and ought to be altered. In the meantime parties might lay their heads together and put the contract into an unobjectionable shape. He believed the general feeling was in favour of the Bill; but the House had to deal with a very grave question which the right hon. Gentleman had not touched. He said the Metropolitan Board of Works, who represented the ratepayers of the metropolis, were parties to the bargain, and the promoters of the Bill were the other parties; but the right hon. Gentleman did not tell them whether it was within the competence of the Metropolitan Board of Works, under the Acts of 1855 and 1858, to enter into speculative works, intrusted in the first instance to somebody else, to fertilize some barren waste bordering on the German Ocean; and if they had not strictly that power the ratepayers of the metropolis might be called upon by the arbitrary fiat of the Secretary of State to recoup to these speculators no less a sum than perhaps £3,000,000. How was that to be raised? It seemed to him that the Board of Works had no power to enter into these speculations, and bind the ratepayers to recoup the money, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Committee had not ventured to say whether it was strictly within their power or not. Then it should be remembered that the Gazette notice was as vague as possible. No one could have dreamed that under such a notice it was possible that the Metropolitan Board of Works were going to take on themselves this liability. The agreement itself had not been deposited; it was signed some time in February, and made its appearance only a few days ago. He gave no opinion as to whether the Bill should go on or not; but he hoped the hon. Gentleman who had charge of it would consent to what he considered the reasonable proposal made by the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets, in order that all parties interested might know what was coming on them; and the House would no doubt do what was right when the Bill next came up for consideration.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that he had stated to the promoters of the Bill the objections he entertained to this article of the agreement. The Bill provided that certain main culverts should be executed by the concessionaires within four years, and if they were not completed within that time the deposit of £25,000 to the Board of Works should be forfeited. It was quite possible the non-completion of the main culverts within the time specified might be accidental, without any fault of the concessionaires; but Article 15 provided that the Secretary of State should in such case certify whether the concessionaires should forfeit all their rights and privileges. That was a power which the Secretary of State would find it extremely difficult to exercise. But the Article went on to provide, if the Secretary of State determined that no forfeiture should take place, well and good; but in case of forfeiture, then he was to prescribe the terms, and those terms were to be final and binding. He thought the power to determine whether forfeiture should take place ought not to be intrusted to one Member of the Government, still less should the power of fixing the terms. Some other provision should be substituted for the 15th Article, probably some mode of arbitration; and as there was no opposition to the scheme itself he hoped the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir William Russell) who had charge of the Bill would agree to its postponement till the 25th of April, by which time the parties might come to some satisfactory settlement as to Article 15.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, he thought it was the desire of the House that the Motion for the second reading should not be pressed. The Metropolitan Board of Works took no responsibility in connection with this Bill. They said the works must be risked without any cost to the Board. They repudiated all responsibility in connection with the scheme, which would probably involve the ratepayers in an expenditure of two or three millions. The postponement was very desirable, as it would not affect the rights of the concessionaires or the public.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he supported the Amendment. The 15th clause was entirely inconsistent with the principle recognized by the House in all private Bills affecting the property of the ratepayers. They should have a chance of being heard on the matter.

SIR WILLIAM RUSSELL said, after the expressions of opinion by the right hon. Gentlemen the Secretary of State (Sir George Grey) and the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), and of the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Wilson Patten), he would agree to postpone the Bill till after Easter, giving due notice of the clause he intended to propose.

MR. BRADY said, that as a Member of the Committee, he wished to state that the concession to Messrs. Napier and Hope was kept a secret from the Committee until after three days' examination of the members of the Board, though they had been repeatedly pressed to produce it. He was glad the postponement had been agreed to, otherwise he should have divided the House.

Amendment, and Motion, by leave withdrawn.

Further Consideration of the Bill deferred till Tuesday 26th April.

BRISTOL AND NORTH SOMERSET RAILWAY (SOUTHERN EXTENSION) BILL.
(by Order).—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Gore Langton.)

MR. GREAVES said, the Bill had already received its death-blow elsewhere. He moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Greaves.)

MR. GORE LANGTON said, as his name was on this Bill, he had thought it right to move the second reading, but he had had no communication with the promoters, and therefore as the Bill was opposed he should not put the House to the trouble of a division.

Question, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Words added. Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

QUESTION.

MR. MONSELL said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the Bill for recording Titles to Land in Ireland will be introduced?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, in reply, that the Bill for the Registration of Titles in Ireland had been laid on the table of the House of Lords on the previous evening by the Lord Chancellor.

PIRACY IN CHINA.—QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Mr. Consul Swinhoe has made a Report that the British Merchant Steamer Elphin, while loading sugar at Takao, was hired by the Local Mandarin to go out of port and attack junks said to be piratical on the agreement that captured junks should belong to the captain of the Elphin and crew; that the steamer went out and attacked a junk pointed out, which did not make any resistance; nevertheless she was fired into and one of the crew killed, and the remainder of the crew, twenty-one in number, taken prisoners and lodged in the Hong of Messrs. Lealer and Co., and the junk carried into Takao; that Mr. Consul Swinhoe tried the Captain, a Prussian subject, and condemned him to a penalty of 600 dollars, afterwards reduced to 400 as sufficient penalty for the murder; and, in case Consul Swinhoe's Report has not been received, whether it will be sent for, and whether the Hong Kong Ordinance, No. 1, of January 1856, which prohibits British Subjects from giving military aid to the Chinese Government and the Rebels, will or will not be enforced, and Commanders of British Merchant Vessels, or other offenders, be suitably punished for shedding blood for profit?

MR. LAYARD said, in reply, that no notice upon the subject mentioned by his hon. and gallant Friend had been received at the Foreign Office, nor did he think it necessary to send to Consul Swinhoe for a Report. It was that gentleman's duty to report only upon matters requiring special attention. No doubt if this subject had demanded any unusual notice it would have been duly reported upon. With regard to the latter part of the question of his hon. and gallant Friend, he could add nothing to what had already been stated on two occasions by the hon. and learned Attorney General. The law would, of course, be enforced if proper evidence were adduced and proper proceedings laid before the Consular Courts in China.

SALMON FISHERY ACTS.—QUESTION.

MR. KNIGHT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When Her Majesty's Government intend to introduce the Bill for the Amendment of the Salmon Fishery Acts?

MR. T. G. BARING said, that the Bill had been deferred until the Reports of the Inspectors of the Fisheries had been presented to the House. Those Reports had been printed and would at once be put into circulation, and the Bill would be introduced immediately after Easter.

THE EPIDEMIC IN RUSSIA.

QUESTION.

MR. ONSLOW said, he would beg to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether they have considered the propriety of placing vessels from the Baltic in quarantine, with a view to prevent the introduction of a contagious fever said to be raging in those parts?

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, Her Majesty's Government have received no information upon this subject in addition to what was laid upon the table of the House yesterday. That information is not such as to induce us to think of establishing a quarantine at present.

METROPOLIS—PARK LANE.

QUESTION.

MR. SCULLY said, he rose to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Has his attention been called to the Report of the Referees on the Piccadilly and Park Lane New Road Bill, and has he given a "distinct intimation" that a portion of the Crown Land, valued at £6,577, will be given up to the Metropolitan Board of Works without any payment?

MR. COWPER said, in reply, that no obstacle had been thrown in the way of the scheme of the Metropolitan Board of Works on the part of the Crown as regarded the rights of the Crown in the Park. It was true that the Metropolitan Board of Works had, from motives of economy, preferred the inferior plan of prolonging the narrow street to the better plan of widening Park Lane, and thus providing for the use of the public a broad and spacious thoroughfare. Yet he thought the Board deserved all credit for having recognized the responsibility that rested on them of doing something to remove the extraordinary inconvenience of the present state of Park Lane. It was, therefore, intimated to the Metropolitan Board of Works, that if they succeeded in passing this Bill through both Houses of Parliament, they would receive the consent of the Crown to their making a road through Hamilton Gardens, which is a portion of the Park. If the hon. Member had read the Report of the Referees he would have seen that the legal estate in land had not been given to the Board but was retained in the Crown.

IRELAND—THE FENIAN BROTHERHOOD.

QUESTION.

MR. WHITESIDE said, in rising to ask the Question of which he had given notice, he would previously read a passage which occurred in the letter of The Times' correspondent on the previous day—

"So recently as the 14th of March, 1863, fifteen years after the ignominious collapse of Mr. Smith O'Brien's rebellion in the widow's cabbage-garden, it was stated in the official address of the Fenians 'that the Fenian Brotherhood was instituted some years previously as a secret society; that it had ceased to be secret; that its object was the invasion of Ireland by an armed force of at least 100,000 men; and that the Brotherhood had the secret countenance among others of W. H. Seward, the Secretary of State.' On the 6th of March, 1864, a report of the meeting of the Executive Committee of the Fenians at Chicago appeared in the Sunday Mercury, which circulates largely among the Irish in this city, which stated that 'the Committee had received letters of encouragement from hundreds of prominent men in the country, including the Postmaster General, Mr. Montgomery Blair, Secretary Seward, Governor Yates (of Illinois), Mr. Speaker Colfax (of the House of Representatives), Colonel Mulligan, and hundreds of officers in the army and navy of the United States.' On the 26th of December last a great meeting of the Fenians was held at Chicago, at which it was resolved, nem. con., 'that it was the duty of the American Government to declare immediate war against England,' and pledging the Chicago Circle of the Brotherhood to raise immediately 5,000 men, upon the sole condition of being ordered forward at the earliest possible moment and by the shortest route to meet the common enemy of Ireland and America."

He would, therefore, ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Foreign Office has received despatches or any information relative to statements lately published in this country to the effect that encouragement has been given by eminent political individuals in the United States to a confederacy of Fenians, designed to attack Canada, to invade Ireland, and to make war, when required, upon England?

Mr. LAYARD said, in reply, that the attention of Her Majesty's Government had been called to meetings lately held by the Fenians in the United States, but there were only two facts mentioned which required official notice on the part of Her Majesty's Government. One was that a certain Colonel J. H. Gleason had obtained leave of absence from the Army of the Potomac for the purpose of attending a meeting; and the other was that the Attorney General of Louisiana was also present upon the same occasion. Mr. Seward's answer was that leave of absence had been granted to Colonel Gleason, though certainly not for the specific purpose of attending the meeting referred to. That officer simply obtained the leave of absence to which he was entitled. Mr. Seward further stated that the Attorney General of Louisiana was not responsible for his acts to the Government of the United States, but only to the particular State of which he was Attorney General.

THE INDIAN BUDGET.—QUESTION.

Mr. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether he has received any information to the effect that an Export Duty had been placed upon Jute, Coffee, and various other articles in India, and that the Income Tax had been continued in that country?

SIR CHARLES WOOD: Sir, one of the inconveniences attending the use of the telegraph is the imperfect information it oftentimes affords us. I must, therefore, say that I am not at all certain of the answer which I have to give to the question of the hon. Gentleman. It is true that I have received a telegram, but I do not know from whom it has come.

Mr. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he wished to explain. The statement to which he referred had not reached England by telegraph, but had appeared in the letter of The Times' correspondent.

SIR CHARLES WOOD: It is perfectly impossible that any information can have reached England by letter from Calcutta giving an account of what was said or done on the 31st of March last, at which date the financial arrangements for the year had been determined upon. Whatever may have appeared in the newspapers or elsewhere, must, therefore, have been sent by telegraph. I received a telegram on the 3rd of April, stating that the income tax had not been renewed, but that export duties had been placed upon certain articles of produce in India. I can hardly doubt the correctness of the telegram, but it is so totally opposed to everything I had reason to expect, that I scarcely knew whether to believe it or not.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he wished to know, whether the principles upon which taxation proceeds in India are supposed to be in harmony with the principles of taxation in this country, and whether the Government in India is empowered to act independently of any principles laid down in this country?

SIR CHARLES WOOD: I think that is, with all deference to the hon. and gallant Gentleman, not a question which I ought to answer.

QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO said, that as there was reason to believe that a deputation was coming from Canada in order to consult Her Majesty's Government as to the defences of that country, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Parliament will be consulted before any engagement is made by Her Majesty's Government tending to pledge the Imperial credit for the execution of those defences, and before any engagement is entered into by the Imperial Government for the defence of Canada on land, lake, or river, beyond that already notified to Parliament—namely, an expenditure of £300,000 for the fortifications and armament of Quebec?

Mr. CARDWELL: Sir, the sum of £300,000, to which the noble Lord has referred, is made up of two sums—£200,000 for the defence of Quebec, and £100,000 for the armament of Quebec and Montreal. When we communicated to the Government of Canada our intention of including in the Estimates a Vote for improving the defences of Quebec, we expressed our trust that we might rely with confidence on their constructing the works necessary for the defence of Montreal, and we expressed our readiness to furnish the armament both for Montreal and Quebec. With respect to the Question of my noble Friend, I received the day before yesterday an official Minute of the Executive Council of Canada appointing four of their number—

“To proceed to England to confer with Her Majesty’s Government (among other things) upon the arrangements necessary for the defence of Canada in the event of war arising with the United States, and the extent to which the same should be shared between Great Britain and Canada.”

In the conference to be held between Her Majesty’s Government and these gentlemen it will not be in the power—and if it were in the power it would not be the wish—of Her Majesty’s Government to bind Parliament without the full knowledge and consent of Parliament. We shall not exceed the province which belongs to the duty and responsibility of the executive Government, and when the conference shall have arrived at a result it will be my duty—and I shall have much pleasure in discharging it—to take the earliest opportunity of making that result known to Parliament.

THE WAR IN NEW ZEALAND.

QUESTION.

MR. WESTERN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether any intelligence has been received of a renewed outbreak of hostilities in New Zealand?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the following telegram has been received by the War Department, and has been communicated to the Colonial Department:—

“Hostilities commenced in the Whangaura district on the 24th of January. Lieutenant General Cameron advanced with a force of 800 men towards the Whaitolara River. On the same day a skirmish took place with the rebels in posting a picket at Nukumtrar, near which village the troops had encamped. On the 25th the rebels attacked the camp in force, and were repulsed with a loss of seventy killed; number of their wounded unknown. Our loss in the two days was Lieutenant Johnson, 40th Regiment, Deputy Assistant Adjutant General, mortally wounded (since dead); Lieutenant Wilson, 50th Regiment, severely, and Ensign Grant, 50th Regiment, dangerously wounded; fifteen men killed, and thirty wounded. On the 5th of February we crossed the river and encamped on the left bank.”

COURT OF CHANCERY (IRELAND) BILL QUESTION.

MR. VANCE said, he wished to ask, Whether Mr. Attorney General will consent to postpone the Committee on the Court of Chancery (Ireland) Bill, which is fixed for May 11, as that day would be very inconvenient to Irish Members. The Dublin Exhibition was to be opened by the Prince of Wales on May 9, and therefore it would be very convenient to postpone the Bill until the following Monday.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that he should be willing to accede to the hon. Gentleman’s suggestion if it should be consistent with the progress of public business, but he would undertake not to proceed with the particular clauses to which the hon. Gentleman wished to call attention.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON moved that this House at its rising adjourn till Monday the 24th of April.

EXEMPTION FROM POSTHORSE DUTY. QUESTION.

MR. CAVE said, he wished to put a Question upon a subject of considerable interest to Volunteer Artillery Corps. Under the 26 & 27 Vict. c. 65, s. 42, persons lending horses gratuitously for the service of the Militia, Yeomanry, or Volunteers are excused from payment of the Assessed Taxes upon such Horses, but persons licensed to let horses under the 16 & 17 Vict. (the Post Horse Act) are allowed no exemption in case they lent their horses gratuitously. As the animals which such persons could lend would be better adapted for drawing guns than the carriage or riding horses of private individuals, it was for the advantage of the Volunteer service that persons licensed under the Post Horse Act should be encouraged to lend their horses. He would submit that it would be easy to grant a proportionate reduction of the Post Horse duty to those persons who lent their horses. The question he should ask was, Whether the exemption from the Assessed Tax granted to persons gratuitously furnishing horses during six days within the year for the Volunteer Service, under the 26 & 27 Vict. c. 65,

s. 42, might not be extended to those persons who pay duty on licences to let horses for hire under the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 88 (the Post Horse Act)?

MR. PEELE said, in reply, that persons licensed to let horses for hire did not pay Assessed Taxes upon their horses as well, and it would not be reasonable to exempt them from the payment of the Post Horse Duty, which was much heavier than the Assessed Tax, because they lent their horses gratuitously for six days. The Question of granting any abatement from the amount of the license duty proportionate to what was allowed in the case of persons liable to the Assessed Tax was a very fair Question to be considered.

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, were it not for exceptional legislation in each particular case, the greater part of the offices held by Members of Her Majesty's Government would not come under the category of "new offices or places of profit under the Crown," which, according to the provisions of the 6 Anne, c. 7, disqualify the holder from sitting in the House of Commons; and, whether it be desirable or consistent with the principles of modern Constitutional Government that one particular office, and that having a seat in the Cabinet, should be allowed to remain under a rule which has been abrogated by special legislation in the case of every other important office of the Government? The Act of Anne was passed soon after the Union, when the House was apprehensive of being overwhelmed with a flood of Scottish placemen; but circumstances were now altered, and the House was extremely anxious now-a-days that persons representing important departments should have a seat there. What he would like to hear from the noble Viscount was the constitutional point of view by which the Government justified the anomaly of retaining the exclusion from the House of Commons of one only of the officers of Her Majesty's Government—namely, the Postmaster General.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: If I understand the hon. Gentleman's Question rightly, he wishes to know whether it is the intention of the Government to propose to this House a Bill to enable the Postmaster General to sit as a Member of the House of Commons. In reply, I have to say that we do not see that there is any sufficient necessity for such a Bill, and therefore it is not our intention to introduce it.

Motion agreed to.

House at its rising to adjourn till Monday, the 24th April.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

RAILWAY SYSTEM (IRELAND).

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. MONSELL rose to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the railway system of the United Kingdom may be instructed to direct their inquiries, in the first instance, to the Irish railway system, with a view of ascertaining, with as little delay as possible, such facts as may enable this House to determine whether the provisions of the second clause of the general Railway Act of 1844 should be applied to such Irish railways as are subject to its provisions."

He thought the subject one of very great importance, and trusted the House would give it the most serious consideration. A Commission had been appointed to inquire into the railway system of the United Kingdom, he asked that the Irish railway system should be considered by itself and without delay. The definite object of his proposition was to bring into play the provisions of the Act of 1844, which gave power to the Government, with the sanction of Parliament, to purchase the railways whose Acts were passed after 1843. He was aware that the case of Ireland had been frequently brought before Parliament in the present Session, but he was convinced that the House would look with an indulgent eye on any proposal which could be clearly shown to be for the benefit of that country; and it was his belief that this question was one of that character. First, did his proposition in any way interfere with the self-reliance of the people of Ireland; and secondly, was it a measure which would confer benefit on one class in Ireland, or would it benefit the whole people? His proposition, instead of interfering with the self-reliance of the Irish people, would extend and develop it, and, unlike any other measure which could be submitted to the House, would benefit all classes in Ireland, and, like a fertilizing flood, penetrate into every nook and cranny of the land. The reduction of the price for the transit of passengers and goods would benefit every class and every individual. In order to justify his Motion, he was bound to prove that there were certain special circumstances appertaining to Ireland, which demanded the separate consideration of the Irish railway system; and that the benefits which would result from his proposition would be felt by the whole people. With regard to the first point, it was, unfortunately, not necessary to say many words. Whatever the cause, there existed vast resources in Ireland undeveloped, and consequent misery among a large portion of the population. It must be obvious to every one that though the strong shoulders of Great Britain might support the incubus, high fares on railways, which constituted the only means of transit for a large proportion of the population and merchandize, crushed the industry and prevented the development of the resources of a country like Ireland. Another reason existed for regarding Ireland as an exceptional case in respect to this matter. In the year preceding 1839 there were various public meetings in Dublin, attended by the most eminent men of all parties in the country, and they urged the adoption of a system of railways for Ireland analogous to the system which generally prevailed on the continent. Among others a meeting was held in Dublin, when a resolution was passed, declaring—

“That railways in the hands of individuals or chartered companies, however valuable and important might be the facilities they gave, were necessarily monopolies, and as such were irreconcilable with the public interests; while, if such establishments were the property of the State, they could be altered and dealt with at any time, without injury to any party.”

A measure in accordance with their views was submitted to that House by Lord Morpeth, then Chief Secretary for Ireland. The Duke of Leinster, Lord Kingston, and many other great Irish proprietors engaged that if this measure passed they would give the land for railways that passed through their properties for nothing. The year 1839 was one of great party contests, and anything proposed by one party met with no favourable reception from their political opponents. The consequence was that Lord Morpeth's measure fell through, the English system was introduced into Ireland. A circumstance which distinguished the Irish from the English and Scotch system, was the smallness of the amount of capital invested in the railways of the first country. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was not one to “rest and be thankful,” but even he might feel appalled at the idea of undertaking to touch the English and Scotch railways, with their £300,000,000 or £400,000,000 of capital, but in Ireland the value of the railways—according to Mr. Dargan—was less than £20,000,000. Their capital was £22,500,000. The original shares amounted to a little more than £13,000,000, and bonds and preferential shares to a little more than £9,000,000. The gross receipts for 1863 amounted to £1,518,000, against £30,000,000 in England and Scotland, and the working expenses were £750,000. The gross receipts from all the Irish railways last week were £26,800, whereas the receipts of the London and North Western Company alone for the same week were £101,000; those of the Great Western Company were £63,000; those of the North Eastern Company were £56,000; those of the Midland Company were £44,000; and those of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Company were £36,000. Therefore it must be obvious to the House that the comparative smallness of the Irish railway question gave the House a practical control over it, which they could hardly expect to exercise over the English and Scotch railways. What were the complaints made against the Irish system. The charges made for passengers on the Irish railways were as high, and the charges for goods in many cases were considerably higher, than the corresponding charges in England. Heavy goods, for instance, cost more from Dublin to the Limerick junction, a distance of about 100 miles, than from London to Manchester, a distance of 187 miles; and yet the railway fares in England were the highest in the world. Notwithstanding the poverty of Ireland, the Irish railway directors seemed to be enamoured of the English system of very high fares. He was not making an attack on the directors of the Irish railways. A railway director was a person to whom a certain number of shareholders intrusted their capital in order that he might make the most money for them he could with it; and if by carrying thirty passengers he conceived that he could make more profit than by carrying 200 passengers, he was bound to carry the thirty in preference to the 200. But it was singular that the Irish railway directors should take such a different view of the effect of high prices from that acted on by all other persons who made money in Ireland. Let them look, for instance, at the monster shops. Did they sell enormously expensive articles, such as diamonds or rubies? Not at all. They sold a large number of ordinary articles at a low price, turning their capital over frequently, and thus earning a large aggregate profit. Then there was the great unendowed Church in Ireland. What great sums were spent upon churches, convents, and schools — sums so great that he was afraid almost that he should startle some hon. Gentlemen if he were to mention their amount. Were those sums made up of the hundreds or thousands subscribed by a few rich individuals? Not at all. They were raised from the pennies, the sixpences, and the shillings of the great body of the people. Was it not wonderful, that, with these examples before their eyes, Irish railway directors should still persevere in the system of high charges? No doubt by lowering rates they might lower their dividends for a short time—but for a very short time only? The extent of the infatuation under which they laboured in that respect was illustrated by a story which he heard only the other day. Lord Clancarty, being anxious to establish on the Midland Great Western Railway a system of low fares between, he believed, Athlone and Galway, went to the directors and offered to guarantee them against any loss they might suffer; but the directors refused the proposal, and said they would continue to pursue the course which had reduced their shares to a considerable discount in the market. He would mention another evil of the present system. A small amount of railway capital in Ireland was divided among a great many companies. Between Belfast and Dublin there were 113 miles of railway divided among three distinct companies, with three separate sets of directors, three separate sets of officials, and three separate sets of proprietors; and all these different bodies in their dealings with one another were actuated by that amount of charity which generally distinguished railway boards in their dealings with one another. That state of things operated most injuriously on the various interests of the country. For example, in the neighbourhood of Limerick there were large mines affording an opportunity for the development of a considerable mineral traffic. A railway company was asked simply to put a station in a convenient place for that traffic; but they absolutely refused to do so, in the fear that another company might share the profits, leaving the minerals to be transported at a rate so high as to put a practical estoppel on the development of the resources of the district. Again, the cheap and expeditious conveyance of cattle was a matter of paramount importance, especially to the South of Ireland; but the exorbitant charges of the railway companies precluded the graziers from using that mode of transport. He had received many letters from different parts of Ireland, all testifying to that effect. A gentleman of great intelligence, Mr. Cooper, writing from the South of Ireland, stated that Kerry sent annually thousands of cattle by road that would never walk a mile if the railway rates were sufficiently low. In Meath and Carlow, and every other county, the same sort of exclusion was practised. The graziers either walked their cattle or sent them by canal. The same observation applied to flour and corn — no pound of corn or flour ever passed by railway to the great flour mills at Croom in the county of Limerick. He might give another illustration of the present system of railway management. In order to facilitate the traffic between Limerick and Dublin Parliament passed the Bird Hill and Roscrea line, but not a single passenger went on that line from Limerick to Dublin, and this all because a few miles of the line belonged to a company with which the Great Southern and Western did not agree. Thus the intentions of the Legislature had been completely frustrated. Now, it was not quite fair to talk about self-reliance when the people were deprived of the simple and cheap means of carrying their cattle to market. This was by no means carrying out the principle of free trade. These small monopolizing companies had all the vices of despots; they apparently did all they could to thwart the development of the traffic; and how anybody could say that they must be maintained for the sake of free trade he could not understand. If the cost of transit could be abolished surely that would promote free trade. If the products of different hemispheres and zones could be brought together without cost of transit that would be the very realization of the idea of free trade; and so also in a proportionate degree would any measure that tended to reduce the expense of conveying cattle and other produce to market. If the railway charges in Ireland were brought down to the Belgian scale, or to something less than one-half of their present amount, the effect upon the trade and prosperity of the country would be like the touch of a magician's wand. If a farmer sending his cattle to market was enabled to do for 10s. what now he could not do under 30s. what an advantage that would be to the Irish producer! Then take the case of manufactures. One of the difficulties in the way of establishing manufactures in Ireland was the price of coal; and if they could reduce the price of coal and the cost of carriage of it to the same rate as it was in Belgium or Westphalia, they would do more to develop manufactures in Ireland than they could do by any other single step they could take. The Irish system of railways was capricious in regard to the cost of carrying coal. The cost to Bray was 1½d. a ton, to Wicklow somewhat less, to Athy 1d., while to Maynooth it was no less than 2d. What crime the Duke of Leinster, or the inhabitants, or the College of Maynooth had committed to subject them to this high impost he did not know. One of the German railway companies which had reduced the rates to one half-penny per mile per ton had raised its dividend from 7 to 12½ per cent. The bondholders and preference shareholders in Ireland had about 5 per cent on £10,000,000. If the Government took up the railways in that country they could get the money at 3 or 3½ per cent; and in that way alone a saving of about £150,000 a year would be effected. Mr. Dargan stated his opinion that if the railways were placed under a central management a saving in the working expenses might be effected of £200,000 a year; and, at all events, there could be no doubt that it would produce a considerable saving—Establishment charges now amounted to 49 per cent. Mr. Dargan further stated that a reduction of rates would not be attended with loss as the traffic would be increased. These statements Mr. Dargan was prepared to substantiate before a Committee. He should now show the House from an experiment tried on a small railway—the Foynes line

—what effect an increase of charges had upon the traffic of a railway. In 1862 the Foynes Company raised their rates from 3s. 10d. to 4s., from 2s. 9d. to 3s., and from 1s. 8d. to 2s. for the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd class respectively. In the year ending in 1862, before the increase took place, the total number of passengers was 87,256; in 1863, after the change took place, it was 71,383; and in 1864 it fell to 63,046. Let them observe the effect of this very small increase of fares. The experiment had also been tried in Great Britain. Mr. Galt, who had written a very able book on railways, stated that at the time of the Manchester Exhibition, when the London and North Western and the Great Northern Companies were competing, first-class passengers were carried to Manchester and back for 7s. 6d., and second-class for 5s.; the whole expense of the train was 50 guineas, while its receipts were £174. The contest lasted with great benefit to the public all the summer, and the dividends only fell ½ per cent. The contest between the South Eastern and the Great Western Railways to Reading lasted about a year and a half. While it continued passengers were carried a distance of 67 miles at 3s. first-class and 2s. second, ten times as much being charged in proportion of other parts over the lines, yet where the fares were lowest there was an average profit of 250 per cent upon the cost of running every train. When the Edinburgh and Glasgow and Caledonian lines quarrelled they carried passengers between Edinburgh and Glasgow, a distance of 46 miles, for 1s. 9d., and 6d., and the Caledonian line only suffered a loss of ½ per cent dividend by the reduction, which was equal to one-eighth of the ordinary charge, though there was a division of traffic at the same time that the reduction was in operation. He asked that the experiment which had been made in Belgium and Germany should be tried in Ireland. In 1838 the population of Brussels, Malines, and Antwerp was 232,960, the population of Liverpool, Manchester, and Warrington was 523,000. The number of passengers between Liverpool and Manchester before the railway opened was 164,250 per annum; the number that went by railway in 1836, at 6s. and 4s. fares, was 523,000, being an increase of 218 per cent. The number of passengers yearly, before the opening of the railway between Brussels and Antwerp, the fares of the Belgian diligences being about one-half those of the English coaches, was 80,000. The number of railway passengers between those two towns, excluding those who stopped at Malines, was 781,250, showing an increase of 876 per cent, the railway fares being 2s. 6d. and 1s. Here was a comparison between Belgium and the busiest part of the United Kingdom. It might be said that in Belgium there was a population of 420 to the square mile, while in Ireland it was only 185 to the square mile; and therefore that the analogy of Belgium did not apply to Ireland; but he would take a country—Prussia—in which it was still lower, namely, 156 to the square mile, and he would take a railway which ran through agricultural districts, in which the wages of the people were not very different in amount from those which were paid in Ireland. In that country the whole of the people availed themselves of the railways—even the poor market women carried their fruit by railway. It might be said that Irish railways were made at a greater cost than foreign railways, although obviously the original cost of the railway did not touch the questions they were considering, but that was not so. The railway from Cologne to Minden, which with its branches was about 330 miles long, cost £28,000 per mile. The Belgian railways cost from £18,000 to £19,000 per mile, and the Irish railways £13,000 per mile. On the Cologne Railway the charge by the first-class, which was used by Princes and Englishmen only, was 1½d. per mile. The charge by the second-class—used by those who in this country would use the first-class—by the Cologne line was 1d. per mile, and by the third-class, answering to our second, the charge was only three farthings per mile. Our lowest class was 1d. per mile, whereas the fourth-class fare on the German line was only three-eighths of a penny per mile. That railway in 1858 paid 7 per cent. There was then a considerable reduction in the charge for the transport of goods, and the result had been a dividend of 12½ per cent. It might be argued that this increase of traffic arose in a great degree from coal, and that the Westphalian railways abutted on a coal field, while there was but little coal in Ireland; but it should be remembered that, practically, the Irish railways abutted on the English coal fields, and that just as Westphalian coal at low transit prices flowed into the agricultural districts of Prussia and Holland, English coal would certainly be sent in immense quantities into Ireland, where turf was now scarce, and was certainly in most places dearer to burn than coal would be with low railway rates. In Belgium last year a reduction was made in the parcel traffic, which was so very successful that a Bill was before the Legislature for reducing the rates still lower; and what was the financial result? The Belgian shareholder was making 5½ per cent. So successful had these low fares been that in 1884 the shareholders would be paid off, and the lines in the hands of the Government, who might use the railways as they thought fit, and who would be able to run trains at the cost price of travelling. Why should we not imitate such an example? It might be asked what system he would adopt in lieu of the present. He thought it a great misfortune that the recommendations of the Commissioners, Sir John Burgoyne, Sir R. Griffith, and Mr. Drummond, had not been acted upon with reference to the railways. But the evil had been done. The railway system had been productive of less benefit than was expected to Ireland, and it was placed in the hands of conflicting companies, whose Boards agreed in an enthusiastic devotion to high rates, and he saw no way out of the difficulty but in the purchase of the railways by the Government. What they ought to do was to introduce a measure giving the Government the railways for a period of, say, five or seven years, which would enable them to put the whole system on a proper basis. They might then divide the whole country as France was divided into certain zones north, south, east, and west—and let the railways out to companies on condition that low rates and fares were introduced and maintained. By that means they would get rid of the difficulty. Government management for a short period was not likely to work badly; for in a matter of this kind they would take good care to select the best men to administer the system. Such a change would confer enormous benefit on Ireland. The first result would be to effect a reduction in railway fares to one-half or one-third of their present amount, which would be equivalent to a remission of taxation of somewhere about £1,000,000 a year. But that would by no means measure the benefit to the country from the increased development of its resources which would necessarily follow from its being brought into close contact with the markets of England. What but nearness to, or distance from, the best markets made the difference there was between the West and East of Ireland. Even in the first year he did not think the public Treasury would lose anything considerable, not more, probably, than from £200,000 to £300,000 a year. But the benefit to the country would be immense. If it was put to him whether he would prefer the abolition of the income tax or the measure proposed, he would without hesitation say, give Ireland this cheap mode of transit by railways. He thought he had shown that the case of Ireland was quite distinct from that of England and Scotland, and ought to be considered by itself. He believed if they adopted his proposition they would confer the greatest possible benefit on every class and every portion of the country. He now left the question in the hands of the House. He looked with great anxiety to the result of the debate, and he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be able to agree to his proposition. He was quite indifferent as to the means—the end he desired was low fares and more centralized management. The whole of the people of Ireland were in favour of the proposal, and no greater benefit could be conferred by the House upon Ireland than the granting of this Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the Railway System of the United Kingdom may be instructed to direct their inquiries, in the first instance, to the Irish Railway System, with a view of ascertaining, with as little delay as possible, such facts as may enable this House to determine whether the provisions of the second clause of the General Railway Act of 1844, should be applied to such Irish Railways as are subject to its provisions,"—(Mr. Monsell),

—instead thereof.

MR. WHITESIDE said, in seconding the Motion, that he thought the House was indebted to the right hon. Gentleman for the great pains he had bestowed on this subject. He had discharged a paramount duty to his country in bringing it forward. The size of the question naturally attracted their attention, and it more particularly deserved the notice of the House because it was not calculated to encourage any delusive expectations. He agreed that if it should appear on a full and careful inquiry that it could be carried out it would confer on Ireland very great advantages. We had arrived at a crisis in the history of railway legislation. The reason for the passing of the wise and statesmanlike Act of 1844 was, he understood, given in the words of the Committee who reported previous to the passing of the Bill. That Committee said it was material to observe that in this country what was called the "high fare system" ordinarily prevailed, and that the average charge for railway communication—which fell principally on trade and commerce—was very much higher than in other countries where railways had been established. That there was no early prospect of a general reduction of the charge under the present system of independent companies; and if the experiment of reducing the charge were tried, the results, it was believed, would not be very unfavourable upon immediate returns. The words of the Act which was passed subsequent to the Report of this Committee were very important, as they preserved to the House the power of considering what course it would be politic to adopt after an experience of twenty years of the system of railway management. It would be improper to ask the House to apply any other principle to the consideration of the railway system in Ireland than that asserted in a very wise section of the Act of 1844. Upon the grounds, then, of general and national policy would it be wise to exercise the power retained by the Government? It was said that a railway was as necessary to our existence as the air we breathed. It was ridiculous to speak of a railway as we would of any other road or highway. He thought we had suffered a great misfortune by Parliament having neglected the recommendations of a Commission in 1837 which was appointed to investigate and report upon a plan upon which the Irish railways should be conducted. A useful Bill was afterwards moved by Lord George Bentinck, but not being supported by the Irish Members was lost. The Report stated that it was the favourite opinion of many that undertakings of this description (railways) were best left to the free and unfettered exercise of private enterprise, and that the less the State interfered either in making exactions before begun or in controlling their subsequent management the better. They (the Commissioners) were duly sensible of the great advantages to be obtained by allowing full scope to the capital and enterprise of individuals associated for such important purposes, but they apprehended that the difference between railways and any other description of public works had been overlooked, and the peculiar privileges which had been granted to them—privileges which should be exercised only under authority, effective superintendence, and control. It was important to observe the distinction. It was a very different thing asking the Government to take upon itself the management of the railways, and calling upon it to exercise a wise and politic control. The possession of a railway and the management of it as a trading company were very different to exercising that control which was intended by the Act of 1844. The two things were quite distinct. The exercise of that control would not lay the Government open to an imputation of unwise intermeddling with trading companies that could be otherwise made. The body of gentlemen to which he had referred said that—

“So great were the powers, so vast the capabilities of a railroad, that it must, wherever established, at once supersede the conveyances by common road; and, consequently, while the railway facilitated traffic, it destroyed other modes of conveyance.”

Towards the close of the Report the monopoly which railway companies obtained was referred to, while they were subjected to little or no external regulation or control. A most extensive monopoly had been established that could keep the intercourse of the country entirely at its command. The rate of speed, the hours for running, the number of journeys in the day, and the charge were all at the discretion of the railway companies, and whatever extravagant expenditure might be incurred in the construction or management of the lines it all fell upon the public. The Report then proceeded to say that it might have been well if we had looked at what had been done in other countries—in France, Belgium, and other places—before committing ourselves to the present system. In England alone were the main lines of intercourse committed to the management of individuals almost unconditionally and without control. This had arisen from the suddenness with which the railway system was pressed upon this country. What, then, was asked by the present

Motion? A Railway Commission, composed of eminent and competent persons, had been issued by the Government. It would be unwise to ask for a different body, and the only thing sought by the right hon. Gentleman who had brought this present Motion forward was that, the Irish railway question having reference only to a comparatively small extent of country, and requiring immediate and speedy relief, the Commissioners should take that first into their consideration. Although the book to which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Monsell) had referred was written by an Irishman, there was only one observation in the volume having reference to Ireland. It was a remarkable book, and most interesting. In truth, railways had almost a poetical interest, only sometimes one was obliged to say that they were not quite agreeable under the present system. He could confirm the experience of others, that directors had a very artful and ingenious and crafty mode of raising the fares whenever they could conveniently do so, and that, too, with a regularity and punctuality which deserved the description given by Mr. Galt, who stated that wherever there was a conflict between the interests of the public and the advantage of the directors, the directors always decided against the public and in favour of themselves. The one reference to Ireland in Mr. Galt's book was to the effect that the railway directors in Ireland entertained very favourably the scheme of the purchase of the railways by Government. That Ireland was in every respect more adapted for the railway system being under the control of Government than England, as there the people did not view the interference of Government with mercantile affairs with the same distrust as was felt in this country; and while in one country it might be desirable to confine the experiment to low fares and Government supervision of a few lines, in the other it might be extended with the consent of all classes, from the Giant's Causeway to Cape Clear, and from Connemara to the Hill of Howth. Therefore in no country was it more desirable to have the experiment tried than in Ireland. He (Mr. Whiteside) agreed with the writer, because the people of Ireland had suffered much inconvenience from the multiplication of companies there. Herauld's Railway Journal, while it appeared to be unfavourable to the scheme of the Government purchasing the railways in this country, was not opposed to it for Ireland, because it was a poor country and the purchase of the railways, followed by a very low fare, would be a sort of fillip which might contribute to the welfare of the country and raise the value of the land. There were a great many small railway companies in Ireland. In the north there were no less than six, and the Belfast people were so exceedingly skilful that they carried their lines no further than they felt certain they would be remunerative, leaving it to wilder speculators to accommodate the districts behind. If therefore they wished to travel from Londonderry to the Northwest lines they had two or three companies always to deal with. The system would have been much worse had it not been for his noble Friend Lord Erne, who had invested large sums in different railways, and took an interest in the management of them. The universal opinion in Ireland was against the existence of these numerous companies, and it was amazing that men who outwardly looked reasonable, and talked and acted on other subjects like other people, should undertake to prove that in the short line of country between Dublin and Belfast it was useful to have three companies with three sets of directors and officials. Most people thought this an intolerable nuisance; and Mr. Dargan was of opinion that by a uniform management a saving of £200,000 a year might be effected. If that were so, and if it were true that the credit of the Government would make a difference of  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent to these lines, a great benefit would accrue, and it would be possible to operate at once with the consent of all parties. In the West of Ireland the management of the Western Railway was much complained of. The utmost amount of inconvenience which could be afforded to the public had been afforded by the directors, and the result was that the dividend of the unhappy shareholders was reduced to 2 per cent. The shareholders would be very glad to get rid of the directors, who, on their part, he supposed, would be willing to transfer their functions to those who could exercise them with greater advantage to the country. As to the Munster Railway, he wished to say nothing in its favour, and nothing particular against it, further than that he believed that a wise man would strike out four-fifths of these companies, and have a concentrated management, which would lead to the economical results referred to by Mr. Dargan. If the Great Western in England had amalgamated twenty-five companies, what difficulty would there be in extending the principle of amalgamation in Ireland? There was not a single interest which would not be benefited by such a change. For instance, at present within limited distances a railway was never used in Ireland for the transport of cattle. There must be a reason for this, and he believed it to be the absurd arrangements made by the company in respect of cattle transport. The results of this question might be summed up in a few words, which he believed to be irrefragable. While he admitted that the state of Ireland peculiarly required this measure, he thought that inquiry—which was all they asked for at present—should be conducted on general principles. The highways of the country were almost as necessary as the air; in old times he was thought a hero who made a road which would last for ever, and the making of these iron roads never ought to be monopolized by companies free from Government control. At the outset the present system was regarded as an experimental one; the Government of the day wisely reserved to themselves the right, at the expiration of twenty years, of revising the experimental system; and the terms of purchase stated in the Act were distinct, and ought to be satisfactory to those who had anything to sell. Of course it would be necessary to look narrowly to see that no job was perpetrated; but he believed that we should never have a reduction of fares commensurate with the wants of the country until some such step was taken. Moderate fares were the most remunerative; but if railway directors thought they could get as much money by carrying a few passengers at a high price as they could get by carrying a great many at a low price, they would relieve themselves from the inconvenience of carrying a great number. He could not see how this grievance was to be redressed, except by the control of the State. In Mr. Galt's book it was shown that in a case where the fares were reduced by 70 per cent it only made a difference of 1 per cent in the dividend. It was open to the State to make another set of railways at one third the cost of the present lines, and their competition would destroy all the existing lines; but that would be a very unjust and unwarrantable thing, and therefore nothing remained but some such course as the Act of 1844 had pointed out. His right

hon. Friend had not mentioned the analogy of the penny postage; and, though the same results might not follow the adoption of cheap fares, we might fairly borrow a principle from a great experiment that had been successfully tried. It was not his place to point out the modus operandi, or how this great and useful project was to be worked out; this might be better done by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But he would say a word to hon. Gentlemen on the other side who had the other night supported the Motion for inquiry of a similar kind to that now sought in regard to property in Ireland. Instead of searching about for trivial causes to explain the condition of the south and west of Ireland, why not admit at once what was perfectly plain—that before the adoption of free trade Ireland enjoyed a monopoly, was benefited by that monopoly, and that change of policy had led to the results now witnessed? This was indisputably true, and he did not mention it for any unworthy purpose. Adam Smith himself admitted that sometimes where laws which theoretically appeared unsound had been allowed to exist for a long period of time, and great interests had grown up in consequence, a sudden change would lead to results more lamentable than the evils which would follow from the maintenance of those laws. At present there was a vast trade in the import into Ireland of the daily bread of the people; that was something to be remembered. Free trade legislation might be proved to be a great and signal benefit to the Empire; but if the consequences of that legislation had led to distress in certain parts of Ireland, the Legislature should try to confer some proportionate advantage upon the country where this could be done without violating the rules of political economy or perpetrating any gross job. His belief was, that that was the desire of the House. At the same time, he did not wish it to be supposed that the condition of the whole country had been accurately described by hon. Gentlemen who had addressed the House on a former occasion. Last autumn he had seen a good deal of the country. Beginning at Fermanagh, he had gone to Derry, stretched round the coast to Belfast, passed to Armagh, Neath, Carlow, Wexford, and other places, and according to his observation there was a conspicuous improvement in many parts of the country. As the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Robert

Peel) had said, there had also been very great improvements in Dublin—the approaching Exhibition was a proof of this. And if, in the districts which had suffered most from free trade, a plain, practical benefit like that now proposed were conferred upon all classes, it would be received in Ireland as a proof of the beneficent spirit which animated this House, and would make the Irish people sensible—and the debates of this Session showed that they ought to be sensible—of the pains and anxiety with which the House listened to every proposal calculated to be of the smallest practical service to that country.

MR. SCULLY said, that he took great interest in this question, so much so that he had some time since solicited an interview with the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon the subject. The question could not, either directly or indirectly, be regarded as involving any party considerations, and he should be, therefore, very much surprised if any hon. Member representing an Irish constituency opposed the Motion. It would be for the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consider whether the question was one which should be immediately dealt with, or whether, as usual, it should be postponed for some future treatment. The Commissioners certainly ought, in his opinion, to direct their attention first of all to Ireland, because, though that country would, no doubt, receive immediate benefit, England also would derive permanent advantage from such a course. The experiment might first be tried in Ireland, and if successful might be extended to England; while in case of failure, on the other hand, the latter country would be able to avoid adopting any course which had been found unsatisfactory. In the Commission which had been appointed the Irish element appeared to have been lost sight of, in fact the noble Lord at the head of the Government usually excluded Irishmen from the Cabinet and from Commissions. Out of fourteen Commissioners there were seven English and one Scotch Members, but not one hon. Gentleman who represented a constituency in Ireland. The only Irishman on the Commission was the Earl of Donoughmore. He quite believed that the proposed reduction of railway fares would be of greater advantage to Ireland than even the abolition of the income tax. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer owed something to Ireland, because during the time that the right hon. Gentleman had been in office the taxation of that country had been very nearly doubled. No doubt the people would benefit very much by a reduction in the charges for passengers and goods, but such a reduction would hardly meet with much favour from the railway companies, because it was very possible that with high fares and few passengers a railway company might return to its shareholders a dividend of 10s. per cent more than it would do if conducted on a reduced tariff. He could quite understand that the doubling of the traffic on a railway would have the effect of enormously increasing the trouble and work of the officials, who, in the case of the experiment failing, would be blamed by the shareholders for want of judgment, and in case of success would receive neither credit nor benefit. Mr. Galt and others had shown that by a little temporary sacrifice there would be an ultimate gain to the Government. It was proposed to reduce the charges on goods to something like one-third of their present rate; to reduce the fares of third-class passengers to one farthing; second class to one half-penny; and first class to three farthings a mile. Even were there a pecuniary loss, he apprehended that the Chancellor of the Exchequer could in some way deal with the question. It was suggested that the loss to England would be one-seventh of the gross traffic, and to Ireland of £250,000 annually. There were three or four ways by which the Government might deal with the question, and by which the reduction of fares might be effected. For instance, the Government might say to any railway in Ireland, "Reduce your fares and we will indemnify you for the loss, if there be any; while the gain, should there be a gain, shall be your own." There was another scheme, of paying over a certain sum to the railways in consideration of their adopting a low tariff under Government supervision. Or there was another, and perhaps a better plan, and it was this that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should purchase the Irish railways altogether. The net profits of those railways for some years past were on an average £800,000 a year. In 1862 they were £748,000, and in 1863 £768,000. The whole system might be bought at 25 years' purchase for £20,000,000, and this country would not lose by the bargain. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer said the Government ought not to give 20 millions for their purchase, because, amongst other things, it would lead to a vast amount of petty patronage. Such purchase would be an excellent thing for Irish shareholders, and it was well known that the Government could borrow at  $3\frac{1}{4}$  per cent. Therefore the interest upon the £20,000,000 purchase money would not exceed £640,000, and supposing the Returns from the railways remained the same as now, there would be a profit from the transaction of £160,000 a year. By uniform management, however, there might be a saving of £50,000; or, in Mr. Dargan's opinion, of £200,000, and that would be so much additional gain. At present the Government paid £80,000 a year for conveyance of mails in Ireland, and a very large sum for carriage of troops and stores. All that might be saved, and it would not be too much to say that this country would be a gainer by the bargain which he recommended of from £350,000 to £500,000 a year. Now he would ask, had the Commissioners turned their attention at all to the subject of the railways of Ireland? He had reason to believe they had not. He wished to get rid of the present system altogether. If the Government should take the railways of Ireland into their hands, he should altogether object to their disposing of the consequent patronage according to their present system; and, indeed, he thought that other patronage besides that connected with railways should be disposed of in a judicial manner in open court, the reasons for the decisions arrived at being stated. As long as patronage remained nominally in the hands of the Crown, but really in the hands of the Ministers, the only satisfactory arrangement would be to require all appointments to be made in open court after examination of the competitors by competent judges. At present there was great dissatisfaction at the appointments made in connection with the Queen's Colleges, and people could not understand why it was that the most eminent men in Ireland were passed over. ["Question!"] He maintained that he was speaking strictly to the question, because the disposal of the patronage was an important element in the consideration of a proposition to hand over the railways to Government control. The present mode of managing railways was very unsatisfactory. It was notorious that Boards of Directors were always fighting for what they termed their section of country; and their fares were either low or high as competition existed or not. Where there was no competition there were very high and even prohibitory rates; where there was competition very low rates prevailed. He had endeavoured to ascertain the traffic rates for goods on Irish railways, but had been unable to do so, as there were no printed rates, and the Companies charged just what they pleased—a policy which in the result was prejudicial to their own interests, as people would not send any goods but what they were compelled by necessity to send. The goods charges were higher now between Dublin and Tipperary than they were before railways were introduced, and the only advantage was that of increased expedition. The Chancellor of the Exchequer could not confer a greater benefit upon Ireland than by contriving some mode by which, without serious loss to the revenue, or only a temporary loss, the interchange of produce could be facilitated. That could only be done by reducing the fares, and the reduction of fares could only be effected by the intervention of the Government.

Mr. ENNIS said, that he trusted to the indulgence of the House while he addressed it for the first time. At first sight he was disposed to express his acquiescence in the spirit of the Resolution. He thought that inquiry would do good. But the more the existing state of Irish railways was inquired into the better, and the more honest the direction of those railways would be found to be. He had not, like other hon. Members, three methods to point out to the Chancellor of the Exchequer by which the mighty change that was contemplated might be accomplished; but in the language of the Mover of the Resolution, he would say that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be a bold man if he sought to carry it into effect. After seriously considering the matter he had come to the conclusion that the traffic upon Irish railways could only be a very limited quantity. He was one of the pioneers of the railway system in Ireland in 1845–6, believing that railways were the best means of improving the condition of the country. He accordingly induced numbers of persons in Ireland to put their hands into their pockets and contribute to a result that promised so much success. The system at first promised to be most successful. Those expectations, he would admit, had not been realized, owing to the wretched state of the country, not to any fault of the railway companies. He now felt bound to say, as a railway director, that notwithstanding every effort that had been made to regulate the fares and prices according to the traffic offered, the directors had been unable to augment that traffic to anything like a reasonable extent. Some anomalies of railway management had been flung at him, and he had been told that the Duke of Leinster, at Carton, near Maynooth, paid he did not know how many shillings a ton for the carriage of his coals. It was said that this happened because there was no competition at Maynooth. The fact was, however, that at this hamlet there was a most active competition between the railway and the canal. The rate charged for coals on the Midland Great Western Railway, over an extent of 300 miles, was only three farthings per ton per mile, and at that rate coals could hardly be carried with profit. Allusion had been made to the Earl of Clancarty, who was a director of the Midland Railway, and who, it was said, made a proposal to his brother directors that if they would reduce their rates and fares between Galway and Athlone to a certain minimum amount, he would pledge himself if there were loss to make up the deficiency. The directors, however, could not accept that offer without applying the same rates to the other portions of their railway, and there was no one to give a similar guarantee elsewhere. Having, however, done all in their power to assimilate the fares to the wants of the country, the directors were met by the fact that the traffic, as he had said, was a limited quantity, and could not be extended to anything like the amount necessary to make the reduction profitable. Mr. Galt, in his book, had made some very extraordinary proposals. He recommended that the fares should be reduced to an equality with those on the Belgian lines, to the extent of not less than two-thirds, so that the traveller would get for 6s. 8d. what he now paid £1 for. But when Mr. Galt made that proposal he forgot the Belgian railways were subsidized by the Government, and that they could afford to charge these low rates. He wished this system had been originally adopted in this country, and that the Government had taken into its hands the construction of all the lines. By this means competition would be avoided. What had competition done for Ireland? There were two railways between Dublin and Athlone, a town of 6,000 or 7,000 inhabitants. The second railway was granted in 1857, when the Royal Duke at the head of the Horse Guards gave evidence of the value of Athlone as a military station. The Committee were told that nothing ought to induce them to reject the opportunity of opening a communication between the metropolis and Athlone, that great emporium for the military. What was the state of Athlone now? There were a barrack and thirty-five acres of land there, which were left in the care of half a battery of artillery and a few men to keep the barrack in order. The Great Southern and Western and the Midland Great Western Railways had similar and harmonious fares and rates, and the traffic managers were instructed not to lose any traffic that could be made remunerative. His experience was quite adverse to any such sweeping reduction of rates of traffic as had been before suggested; but he, for one, should be delighted if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would take under his protection the Irish railways, because everything he touched was turned into gold.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Before addressing myself to the Motion, there are two statements made in this discussion to which I feel bound to take exception. I cannot admit to the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Scully) that there has been any neglect of Ireland or Irish interests in the appointment of the Royal Commission. The hon. Gentleman says there are two or three Scotchmen on the Commission, but only one Irishman. He has investigated the question of nationality with an acuteness to which I cannot lay claim. We did not ascertain the birth-place of every Member of the Commission. But one Member of that Commission is a Peer of great ability (the Earl of Donoughmore) connected almost exclusively with Ireland. The Chairman of that Commission is a noble Duke, holding the first rank among Irish proprietors. Lord Stanley, another Member of the Commission, is directly and largely interested in Ireland; so that I think it can scarcely be said with justice that due regard was not, in the formation of the Commission, paid to that country. In noticing the observations which fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Whiteside), I am not about to utter a single word which could prejudice the final judgment of this House as to the question whether it is or is not right or desirable that a pecuniary boon should be conferred by the United Kingdom at large on Ireland, or that any adjustment or re-settlement of the various questions connected with Irish taxation should not be at a fitting time undertaken. But I do protest against the assumption that there is a debt due from this country to Ireland on the specific ground that Ireland has been injured by the transition from a protective system to the system of free trade. Such an assumption I believe to be wholly and absolutely groundless. The right hon. Gentleman says that Ireland is importing wheat largely. What does that prove but the benefit which she derives from free trade?—because the price of wheat has, in consequence of free trade, greatly fallen. What does Ireland do with the land on which she formerly grew wheat? She raises oats upon it. Has the price of oats fallen owing to free trade? She raises flax and cattle. Has the price of either fallen because of free trade? For my own part, I think nothing is easier than to show the great advantages which Ireland has derived from the free trade system. I do not wonder, I may add, that several Gentlemen who have spoken in this debate have given great credit to my right hon. Friend the Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell) for having called the attention of the House to a subject which is undoubtedly one of very great interest and importance. I am not surprised at my right hon. Friend's natural anxiety that the investigation of the circumstances and facts connected with Irish railways should not be postponed so as to come on as a mere postscript to a large and comprehensive inquiry. I am not prepared, on the part of the Government, to say that we could assent to the form of Address which he proposes, but I at the same time think it may be in my power to give him the assurance for which substantially he seems to me to ask, and that is that such measures that we can adopt we will adopt with the view of securing inquiry without delay into the circumstances of Irish railways. I entirely concur with my right hon. Friend in several of the propositions which he and others have laid down. It is quite true that the cost of railways is not the regulator of the rates of fares. It is true that it is hardly possible to estimate the advantages which low railway fares may confer on a country. It is true, as he has said, that the problem which he has raised, and manfully confronted, to-night — the difficult and serious problem relating to the intervention of Government in the concerns of railways—is to a certain extent limited and simplified in Ireland by the particular circumstances in which she is placed. I even go a step further, and admit that if it should be the desire of the Imperial Parliament to confer a pecuniary boon on Ireland there would probably be no mode in which that boon could be conferred so free from all taint of partiality, and at the same time so comprehensive and effective in its application, as some measure taken with the view to secure to her the benefits of cheap railway transit. That is a proposition which I look upon as being of very great importance; but there is, I regret to say, a point in the speech of my right hon. Friend at which I must part company from him. He seems to be of opinion that if the Government were to become purchasers of railways in Ireland — a proposal of vast moment even in the case of Ireland alone, one on which I do not presume to give any opinion, and in the consideration of which it is my duty to reserve to myself and to the Government entire and absolute freedom—it would be necessary for us in the first instance to take upon ourselves the working of those railways. Now, I have no hesitation whatever in asserting the negative of that proposition. I contend that under no circumstances, and for no time, however limited, ought the working of any railway in the country to pass under the direct superintendence of the Government. I look upon the objections to any function of that kind being undertaken by them as so strong as at once to oppose a barrier, supposing it to be an essential part of the proposed plan, to any further consideration of the subject. It has been justly observed by my right hon. Friend that there are various modes in which the Government, if after examining the subject they should deem it desirable to do so, might intervene with the view to secure for this country, or for Ireland, as a portion of the Empire, the benefit of cheaper carriage and transit by railway. We might intervene by purchase, by means of a guarantee, by becoming creditors of railways, taking up the debts for which they are liable, and affording them the benefit of a lower rate of interest. That would have the effect of making a large addition to the net surplus available for dividends, and would enable the Government to make better terms. We are not now, however, in a position to inquire into the merits or demerits of any one of these courses of proceeding; but I do not attach blame to any one that this discussion should have ranged over a wide field. We come, after all, to one question, and that is the question of investigation. Now, the expediency of investigating the facts, connected with our railway system generally has been admitted by the Government, the House, and the country at large. The question raised by my right hon. Friend is what place Irish railways ought to occupy in the inquiry, and he has made certain calculations of profit and loss which he thinks will follow the adoption of the measures which he recommends. He tells us, in general terms, that the gross receipts of Irish railways amount to £1,500,000; that of that sum £750,000, or 50 per cent, goes into the working expenses, and the remaining £750,000 is available for the satisfaction of debentures, preferential claims, and dividends on the ordinary shares. He thinks that if a reduction of fares and charges were made to one-third on an average of the present rate, the effect would be that the first loss consequent on the change would not be above £200,000 or £300,000 a year, and the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Scully) arrives at a somewhat similar conclusion. Now that, it appears to me, is a very sanguine Estimate. I am glad to hear that it is the opinion of a gentleman who is a great authority on the subject (Mr. Dargan) that a saving of £200,000 a year can be effected in the working charges of Irish railways. The hon. Member for Athlone (Mr. Ennis) who has just addressed the House—and I am sure we should all wish to hear him again—did not advert to that part of the case, but he does not, I apprehend, share in the sanguine notion that the working expenses can be reduced to about 30 per cent, on the gross receipts. This is, however, a material calculation in the proposal of my right hon. Friend, who also gives the Government credit for being able to borrow any sum of money at any ordinary time at the rate of 3 or 3½ per cent. If, however, he will study the present prices of the Funds he will find it represents not very far short of 3½ per cent. I mention that in order to show that if in order to take up £8,000,000 or £9,000,000 of debenture debt and preferential shares we were to ask for a loan

of money to that amount we probably could not obtain it except at a rate exceeding  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. The calculation, therefore, in this matter must not proceed on principles which are over-sanguine. But my right hon. Friend went on to speak of the important subject of the conveyance of coals, and he seems to think that a charge of  $\frac{1}{2}d.$  a ton per mile might be taken as a fair and paying charge. I, however, apprehend that what would be a remunerative rate for the performance of the service depends on a great variety of circumstances which no general view could embrace. It depends on the quality of coals taken in the regular course of traffic, on the practicability of obtaining back freights of any kind, on the length of the journey, and on many other things. It would, therefore, be extremely unsafe for us if we were to allow ourselves to adopt or form any rapid conclusions with regard to the results to be achieved in a matter of this kind. I have admitted freely the great benefit which the reduction of fares and charges on railways is calculated to confer. The advantage accruing from it would, in my opinion, be enormous. It would pass with invigorating force through every fibre of the national system. But for that very reason let us not be seduced into any premature conclusions with respect to the cost at which that reduction could be effected. Nothing but the most minute, searching, and comprehensive investigation can possibly enable us to deal safely with a question of this kind. Being of that opinion we have committed it to the hands of gentlemen who will devote to it the time and labour which it demands, and I, for one, do not think it would be convenient for the public service that we should be tied down by the precise terms of the proposed Address. The proposition is that the Commissioners should be directed to turn their attention in the first instance to the Irish railway system. I apprehend, however, that they have already begun their investigation into the English system, and that they have proceeded to take viva voce evidence with respect to it. It would, under those circumstances, I think, be inconvenient that we should ask Her Majesty to issue instructions which would have the effect of causing the Commission to break in upon the course of their proceedings, and to stop taking that evidence which has been already tendered. The Commission, if it thinks fit, may cause the facts relating to the Irish system to be collected at the same time as those relating to the English system. The facts of the Irish system are of a far simpler character than those of the English system; for we have not in Ireland those extremely complicated matters of controversy which arise in England from the greater density of population and the more intricate system of competition. What I propose is that my right hon. Friend should withdraw his Motion, and I, on the part of the Government, undertake to use such measures as may be in our power to attain the object he has in view—namely, the examination of all the facts of the Irish railway system without delay and without prejudice to any portion of the subject. At the same time I must beg my right hon. Friend to understand that I hold out no promise to him, because it is much better that the executive Government should not proceed to frame a conclusion which must be hypothetical, and may be delusive, before we are in possession of the facts of the case. By using every endeavour for the early collection of the facts, we shall take the course which will enable my right hon. Friend at the earliest possible moment to make any proposition to the House which he may think fit, or, in case we may feel ourselves enabled to move in the matter, he will be in a position to follow his own course with regard to our proposition should he be dissatisfied with it. With regard to the latter part of the Resolution, which relates to the specific object of enabling us to determine whether the second clause of the general Act of 1844 should be applied to such railways in Ireland as it may be applicable to, I do not go along with my right hon. Friend. I agree with some who have spoken in attaching value to that Act of 1844 as deciding the main question of right in favour of Parliament and the public, if policy and expediency should also unite in deciding us to deal with that Act. But speaking generally, and especially in the case of Ireland, if there were to be any dealing with railways it ought not to be confined to those railways which are subject to the Act. The natural course would be to exclude all idea of mere compulsion in this case, and I do not think a satisfactory measure could be adopted if it were forced upon reluctant bodies of shareholders. What would be more satisfactory would be that amicable communications should take place, that they should not be confined to particular portions, but should embrace the whole system of Irish railways. These my right hon. Friend may think sufficient reasons for him not to press his Motion at the present time. I have every hope and confidence that the facts of the Irish railway system may be brought out within a reasonable period—I cannot say a very short time because this is a complicated matter—and placed before Parliament, so that hon. Gentlemen from Ireland may take any course on the subject which they may think their duty to their country dictates.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he wished to reply to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in respect to one point in which he thought the right hon. Gentleman had fallen into an error in consequence of having misconceived the intentions of his right hon. Friend the Member for Limerick. The Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to be impressed with the idea that the Irish Members were asking for this measure as a boon to their country. That they utterly denied. They were asking for no boon, but as the highways of the country were the rights of the subjects, they asserted that it was as much the duty of the Government to protect the subject in the enjoyment of the means of travelling as in any other privilege that necessarily belonged to him. There could be no doubt that this was one of the most important questions affecting Ireland that could be brought under consideration at the present moment. The question had been introduced to the House in a most lucid and unanswerable speech by his right hon. Friend the Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell). Under the present railway system the people of Ireland were almost deprived of the benefits to which they were entitled of travelling from place to place. It was proved that in Belgium persons were conveyed by railway at about one-third of the rate charged for the same distance in Ireland; nevertheless, the Belgian proprietors had much larger profits. The history of our railways in England proved the same fact. Some time ago, when a great competition existed, the London and North Western Railway Company reduced their fares for a distance of 340 miles from 60s. first-class, and 40s. second-class, to 7s. 6d. and 5s. respectively. And what was the result? Why, there was only a loss of 10s. per cent. That example was sufficient to show that low fares generally increased the dividend by the immense augmentation of the traffic which such a step was sure to produce. In his own country the Foynes Railway had at one time increased their fares for a certain distance from 3s. 6d. to 4s. The consequence was a great falling-off in the traffic. The directors, seeing the error they had committed, reduced their fares, and from that moment the traffic had considerably increased. The great evil they had to contend against in Ireland was the jealousy and want of co-operation between the different lines of railway. He had himself been a director of one or two small railways, and he had found that owing to that jealousy the larger lines took every means to prevent the smaller lines from developing the traffic which they otherwise could do. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had given a most satisfactory promise that the interests of Ireland should be consulted at the same time as those of England and Scotland; but he could not see the necessity for that elaborate and protracted investigation which the right hon. Gentleman appeared to anticipate. It was now twenty-one years since this subject was first mooted. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was the President of the Committee which sat upon the subject in 1844, introduced a Bill in that year which he carried through Parliament. All the anticipations then expressed by the right hon. Gentleman from that measure had since been more than realized. He stated that there was no likelihood that the experiment of the greatest possible cheapness to the public would be tried under the present system; and as it had not been tried during the last twenty-one years it was not probable that the public would obtain the benefit of such an experiment in the future. Also in remarking upon the receipts of the railway companies, which were then only £5,000,000, he said he did not think he was extravagant in his expectations when he anticipated an increase of receipts to £15,000,000 in some few years hence, and dwelt upon the importance of having a Government supervision of so large an expenditure. Well, the receipts now amounted to £36,000,000 a year—being much more than double what the right hon. Gentleman had anticipated. This was a question deserving the best consideration of the Government, who could perform no worthier act than to take into their hands the supervision of those railways. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Whiteside) spoke of the prosperous state of the country through which he passed in his tour last autumn, it should be recollected that he had avoided altogether the southern and western districts of Ireland, where misery of the most extreme character prevailed. Now he (Colonel Dickson) believed that nothing would lead more to the reduction of that misery than the development of the resources of the country by means of railways with low fares and under the supervision of the Government. In his own part of the country there were some millowners who were obliged still to send their produce by means of ordinary cars and carts over the old roads instead of by railway. All the Irish Members asked was that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would but carry out those views in respect to Ireland which he had expressed twenty-one years ago.

MR. LEFROY said, he could not let the debate close without expressing his heartfelt gratification at the mode in which this subject had been treated. It was most satisfactory that the peculiar circumstances of Ireland in reference to its railway system should have been considered in such an admirable spirit and temper by hon. Members on both sides of the House. The Irish Members especially owed the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell) a deep debt of gratitude for the able and argumentative manner in which he had brought this question under the consideration of the House. He (Mr. Lefroy) must also express his satisfaction at the way in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had treated this question, which filled him with hope for the future. He quite concurred with the right hon. Gentleman in the objection which he entertained to the Government undertaking the management of railways, though it would be well if they would to a limited extent undertake their control.

MR. MONSELL said, that after the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which was all that he wished for, he could not have the slightest hesitation in withdrawing the Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE SCHLESWIG HOLSTEIN DUCHIES. QUESTION.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he rose, with reference to the Despatch of Earl Russell to Her Majesty's Embassies at Berlin and Vienna of the 8th instant, concerning the recognition of the Provisional flag of the Duchies of Schleswig and Holstein, to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the following construction of that Despatch is correct:—First, that in recognizing the said Flag, Her Majesty's Government intend to grant to the ships bearing it the rights which belonged to the ships of the Duchies before their separation from Denmark, but only provisionally, and until the definite constitution of the Duchies is settled; secondly, that in saving the rights of the States of Holstein and Schleswig and of the German Confederation, Her Majesty's Government recognizes the rights of the said States to express their will as to their Constitution and as to the question of Succession, and that though the German Confederation has a right to decide for Holstein, the territory of Schleswig is beyond its control, and therefore the final settlement of both Duchies must receive the sanction of the great European Powers. He was induced to address to the hon. Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs the Question of which he had given notice by his anxiety that there should be no doubt or misapprehension as to the course adopted by the Government, and the terms on which this country stood with the Duchies of Schleswig and Holstein and the German Powers. It was important for the peace of Europe, and therefore for the welfare of this country, that Germany should be powerful; but she could be so only by the unanimity of her inhabitants, and the possibility of such unanimity was destroyed by the conduct of the Minister of Prussia. He was seeking to bribe his countrymen by obtaining for them that to which they had no claim—the annexation of Schleswig and Holstein, or a paramount influence in those countries. That Prussia, as well as Austria, was aware of the groundlessness of the claim was proved by their joint declaration at the London Conference of 28th May, 1864, whereby they demanded the—

“Complete separation of Schleswig and Holstein from Denmark, and their re-union in one State under the sovereignty of the Hereditary Prince of Augustenburg, who not only could show his right to the satisfaction of all Germany, and whose recognition by the Diet was therefore certain, but who united the suffrages of the immense majority of the inhabitants of those countries.”

Prussia knew that Austria would never listen for a moment to any such proposal were it not for her own fears in Italy, and the possibility that she might require the aid of Prussia for the preservation of her non-German provinces. Prussia had acknowledged the rights of Denmark with a view to induce her to cede them to herself. But Prussia had said in the declaration he had just quoted that Den-such a union voluntarily, and even in case of attack from Russia or France, disposing of the military and naval forces of those portions of the Fatherland. We should rejoice to see a North German navy. Such a force would furnish an additional guarantee for peace on the ocean, and peace on sea and land and orderly government everywhere were the objects most to be desired by a commercial country like our own. In the ambitious aggressions of Prussia we saw danger for the tranquillity of Europe. We know that Prussia had Rhine provinces not very attached to her, and we do not wish that she should afford to the French Emperor an excuse to seize them by way of compensation. But it was only too apparent that voluntary and mutually defensive union with the Duchies was not the object sought by Prussia. He should not say Prussia, but M. Bismark, the present Minister of Prussia. His aim was to add the Duchies to the Kingdom as a means of gaining popularity for himself, reconciling the Prussians to his rule, and diverting their attention from home politics and constitutional privileges. He believed, and confidently anticipated, that the attempt would fail. His anticipations rested on his confidence in the love of justice and truth of the whole German nation, especially of the people of Prussia. He did not believe that they, or their free representatives, would be seduced by the acts of the Minister; that they would surrender the constitutional rights and liberties of their country for the sake of obtaining Kiel as a Prussian harbour, or the Eider Canal as a Prussian water way. They would insist on justice being done to the long injured, but steadfast and determined, inhabitants of the Duchies, and this alone could restore to Germany the unanimity which would render her really powerful against any threat from without, and retain for her her just influence and true character—that of a mighty conservative Power in the midst of Europe, with populations well governed, prosperous, and contented, able to curb the ambition of France on the one side and the aggressions of Russia on the other, and gradually, but surely, advancing in material welfare and in all that appertains to true freedom and the blessings of constitutional orderly government.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that the hon. Baronet (Sir Harry Verney) had addressed himself to the task of proving that Prussia was deceiving, or attempting to deceive, the inhabitants of Schleswig, but he had forgotten to tell them the part he had acted last Session. The hon. Baronet forgot that he and those who thought with him, had witnessed with something like pleasure, the intervention of Prussia and Austria on behalf of what the House had been told were “oppressed nationalities.” They had been told last year by those hon. Gentlemen how badly Denmark treated the people of the Duchies; how she compelled them to speak Danish instead of High Dutch, and subjected them to other oppressions of that character. But now, on the showing of the hon. Baronet, it would appear that Prussia treated the feelings of the people of the northern portion of Schleswig with more contempt than had ever been exhibited towards the other portions of the Duchies by Denmark. He could not think that any Englishman could be satisfied with the state of things now existing; but last year the hon. Baronet could not see that the idea of Prussia, a semi-despotic Power, which held other nationalities in oppression, coming forward to emancipate the people of the Duchies was the merest delusion. It was some satisfaction to those who had opposed her designs to find the hon. Baronet confessing the delusion. The hon. Baronet was now surprised that Prussia should have but one object in view—her own aggrandizement. He, also, was astonished; but his astonishment was at the hon. Baronet’s being surprised; for he thought that what was so obvious now was quite as obvious last year.

MR. LAYARD said, that his hon. Friend (Sir Harry Verney) had placed on the paper two questions; but he had not put those questions to him, nor had his speech any relation to them. Last year the hon. Baronet was a most earnest advocate of the measures which the German Powers were then taking with regard to the Danish Provinces, while his hon. Friend the Member for Reading (Sir Francis Goldsmid) and himself endeavoured to check his sympathies for those oppressed nationalities. Last year his hon. Friend was most anxious that Her Majesty’s Government should not interfere. Well, with respect to the first part of the question, he had to state that Her Majesty’s Government had not interfered since the termination of the war; and he had no information to give as to what was taking place in the Duchies of Schleswig Holstein. When the Duchies were separated from Denmark they were placed in a very anomalous position. They were not a part of the territories of Prussia and Austria, and they were not a part of Denmark. The Duchies had ports and shipping, and it was necessary that they should have a flag, and it was thought necessary by Her Majesty's Government to give a provisional recognition to that flag. With regard to the second part of the Question, his hon. Friend attached admissions to that recognition which he could not countenance. By recognizing the flag Her Majesty's Government merely gave it a provisional status, and it was not intended thereby to recognize any rights of Prussia and Austria, or any right of the Germanic Confederation. It was merely a matter of convenience. When Her Majesty's Government provisionally recognized the flag, they did not by that act admit the rights of either one party or the other.

THE DIOCESE OF EXETER.

QUESTION.

MR. WYLD said, that when the inhabitants of Cornwall represented to the Government last year that they ought to have a separate diocese created, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department said he could not entertain the question until the re-organization of other dioceses in England, besides that of Exeter was being arranged. He was afraid that if the inhabitants of Cornwall were obliged to wait for that step to be taken they might have to wait a long time. The right hon. Gentleman also said that he trusted that the increased facilities in regard to travelling would put an end to the inconvenience which had been felt by the people of Cornwall in consequence of their bishop residing at a distant part of the diocese. But that great inconvenience had not been removed. The county of Cornwall stood by itself. The diocese of Exeter was without a parallel. It now included the county of Cornwall, contained an area of 2,000,000 square acres, and a population of more than 1,000,000. From the residence of the bishop to the extreme point of the diocese was nearly 120 miles, exclusive of the Scilly Isles, which was about twenty miles from Cornwall. The Archbishop of Canterbury thought that the present diocese of Exeter ought to be divided, and his Grace and the bishops and clergy of the Archdiocese of Canterbury in Convocation assembled had adopted a memorial expressing that view. The Bishop of Exeter had exhibited those good qualities, and exercised all the superintendence which it was possible for a prelate to do, but it was physically impossible for one man to attend to the requirements of the diocese, and the bishop was in favour of the severance proposed. Moreover, the Chapter of Exeter and the clergy of Cornwall had joined in a recommendation for the severance. The want of a new bishop was exceedingly felt in West Cornwall, and it was not merely a modern requirement, for Henry VIII. had proposed to create a new bishopric there. He trusted that the Government would be prepared to satisfy the wishes and wants of the people of that part of the kingdom, and he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If Her Majesty's Government will sanction the severance of the county of Cornwall from the diocese of Exeter, and the erection of that county into a separate See?

MR. F. S. POWELL said, he hoped the House would allow him to offer a few remarks upon this subject in its more general aspect, and he did so because, in the letter of the right hon. Secretary for the Home Department to the Archbishop of Canterbury, last year, the question of a bishop for Cornwall was blended with the question of more bishops throughout England. When the Reformation of the English Church took place it was intended to extend the number of bishops by twenty, but that idea was not carried out, and since that period the great increase of the population had increased the want of bishops. He believed that all who had an opportunity of coming into contact with the bishops must have felt that they were an overburdened and overworked body of men. As a practical man, he feared that the idea of a large extension of the episcopate must be abandoned for the present. It would be in vain to ask the House of Commons to give the country some thirty or forty more bishops, in accordance with the requisitions of some more sanguine churchmen, but a more moderate course had been proposed. The third and final Report of the Cathedral Commission recommended the creation of four new bishoprics—namely, Westminster, Southwark, Cornwall, and the division of Gloucester and Bristol. During the late sittings of the Convocations, there was a remarkable concurrence of opinion. The Convocation of Canterbury recommended three new bishoprics—namely, Southwark, Bodmin or Truro, and Southwell, and the Convocation of York, three—namely, St. Alban's, Southwark, and Bodmin or Truro. Both Convocations agreed that the populations inhabiting the dioceses of London, Manchester, Exeter, and Lichfield, were those which ought to be served by an augmentation. His own opinion was, that if the Church were allowed to be free in this matter, and were granted some assistance from the Episcopal Fund in the hands of the Commission, there would soon be sufficient funds. If the same temper and spirit were shown in regard to dioceses as had been exhibited in reference to parishes, there would result from the action of the friends of the Church a subdivision of the dioceses, and the same advantages would follow as now flowed from a subdivision of parishes. He hoped that the expressions made use of in the last cathedral Report would be received by the Government with favour. There was a growing opinion out of doors in favour of an increase of the episcopate, and this was especially manifested on every occasion when members of the Church met together, and especially in the Congresses at Bristol, Manchester, and Oxford. He was sure that great benefit would follow to the Church if a considerable and speedy increase were made in the number of its chief pastors, who, he believed, were gaining in public estimation. No inconvenience would arise from acceding to the concession asked by the hon. Member for Bodmin.

MR. AYRTON said, he hoped it would not go forth that there was any purpose of increasing the number of bishops from three to thirty. He thought that the hon. Member for Bodmin (Mr. Wyld) had only done a natural thing in bringing forward that subject, considering the constituency he represented; and that the hon. and learned Member for Cambridge (Mr. Powell), acted upon by a like influence, also naturally favoured an addition to the number of Church dignitaries. But it would, in his opinion, be a great misappropriation of the funds under the control of the Ecclesiastical Commission if a set of new bishoprics were now to be created and endowed. As to the endowment of new bishoprics by means of money raised by Churchmen, it would be time enough to deal with that proposal when the money had really been subscribed for it. [MR. F. S. POWELL: In one case £9,000 has been promised.] The clergy did not desire an increase of episcopal authority. If anybody sought to gather from a clergyman what his idea of a bishop was, he would find that he regarded a bishop as a person who held an exalted station as a prize for superior learning or some other qualities, and that the last thing he would admit was that a bishop ought to exercise authority over him. The real want of the Church was not more bishops, but more efficient ministers, who would devote themselves to benefiting and instructing the poorer classes of the community, and bringing within the pale—he would not say of the Church, but of the religion of the country—masses of the people who were in as complete a state of atheism or heathenism as the inhabitants of Central Africa.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the question of the hon. Member for Bodmin was entirely confined to a division of the diocese of Exeter, by separating from it the county of Cornwall. On that subject the opinions of the Government were expressed very fully in a letter which he had addressed at the beginning of last year to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and which had been laid before Parliament. In that letter he had stated the objections of the Government to the adoption of that scheme. It was impossible to treat the diocese of Exeter as an exceptional case, or to deal with it without any reference to other dioceses, as indeed had been implied by the speech of the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Powell.) He was aware that a strong desire existed in some parts of the diocese of Exeter for its division, and that a contest had already commenced between the towns of Bodmin and Truro as to which of the two should become the cathedral city in the event of such a division taking place. He gave all due weight to the considerations founded on the very large area of the existing diocese of Exeter; but there were six other dioceses with larger populations, and some of them with a very extended area, and in some of those six a desire had also been expressed in favour of their division. That was the case in regard to the diocese of Durham some years ago, but now the desire for its division had considerably abated, owing to the activity of the late and present bishops of Durham, and zeal that had been shown in the efficient discharge of their episcopal duties. A similar wish had likewise been strongly expressed in respect to the diocese of Winchester, and claims had been set up for the creation of a bishopric of Southwark, as had also at one time been the case as to Westminster. In his letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury to which he had referred, he had said—

“Looking to the whole of England, it will be seen that there are several dioceses which, although they do not quite equal that of Exeter in extent of area, yet combine the two elements of a very extensive area and a very large population. If, therefore, Her Majesty should be advised to accede to the present proposal, and to direct measures to be taken with the concurrence of Parliament for the creation of a separate See for Cornwall, it would scarcely be possible to refuse to entertain similar applications in respect of other dioceses, and great inconvenience would result from the separate consideration of each case, apart from its relation to the whole country and to other dioceses.”

With regard to the diocese of Exeter, he believed that no bishop had been more active in the discharge of his duties while his years and his strength enabled him to attend to them than the venerable prelate who now presided over that diocese; but, considering his advanced age, it was impossible that the diocese could now derive all the benefit which it formerly enjoyed from his personal superintendence. Still it is not necessary to assume that the diocese of Exeter must necessarily suffer from a deficiency of episcopal supervision, the bishop having made an arrangement by which, under the authority of an Act of Parliament, he had appointed an ex-colonial bishop to assist him in his duties of a spiritual nature. With regard to the general question, the Government felt that it was one involving many important considerations, and they did not think there was at present any such necessity for a general revision of the boundaries of dioceses as demanded the immediate attention of Parliament. The Archbishop of Canterbury, in a letter to him on the subject of the division of the diocese of Exeter, said he found—

and in his reply to his Grace he had said—

“But Her Majesty’s Government do not understand that the whole of the requisite endowment for a new See would be thus provided. If any considerable portion of such endowment, or of other expenditure incident to the creation of a new See, would have to be provided out of the funds in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commission, it would be a matter for grave consideration whether it would be more conducive to the highest interests of the Church, and the spiritual welfare of the people, that these funds should be appropriated to an increase of the episcopate, than that they should be applied as they are now in increasing the means of spiritual instruction in places where existing endowments for the clergy are confessedly inadequate.”

If four or five new bishoprics were created, a sum of from £20,000 to £30,000 a year would have to be deducted from funds which were now being applied most usefully for the benefit of the Church and the spiritual welfare of the people, in the augmentation of small livings and the employment of additional clergy in populous districts. He did not think it would be expedient to divert existing funds from those purposes. As to the spiritual wants of Westminster, he had not heard recently of any complaints of the Bishop of London being unable to superintend that part of the dioceses; and if a new bishopric were created there, he (Sir George Grey) thought it would be a diversion of money from objects of great importance to one not really required. Considering the present greatly increased facilities of communication by railway and by post, which facilitate the superintendence of a diocese of large extent—and considering also the zeal and activity evinced by many of the bishops, he did not think that any sufficient ground existed at present for entertaining the general question of a readjustment of the boundaries of dioceses, nor could he hold out any hope to his hon. Friend that the Government could now recommend the Crown to take steps for dividing the diocese of Exeter.

EXPEDITION TO BHOOTAN.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, that he wished, before Parliament separated for the holidays, to say a few words on a most important subject, he meant the great disaster that had befallen the expedition to Bhootan. The loss of two guns to any portion of Her Majesty’s army was a circumstance which so seldom happened that he thought some special inquiry should be made concerning it. It appeared that on the borders of Bengal was a district inhabited by the semi-savages of Bhootan, who had made such repeated incursions some time ago, that it was considered necessary that an expedition should be sent into the territory. That expedition was planned last year, at considerable expense. It was well planned; it advanced into

Bhootan, and was successful. A portion of the Bhootan territory, whether rightly or wrongly he should not presume to say, was annexed, the Natives were said to be satisfied with British rule, and the whole expedition was supposed to be over. The expedition cost upwards of half a million of money. A very slight loss occurred in men from the enemy, but a large proportion, possibly one-third, of the expedition, perished from disease. Scarcely, however, had the European force been withdrawn and replaced by a civil force of police and Native troops, than it was found that they had been made the victims of a ruse on the part of the people of Bhootan. Suddenly an attack was made on us; the forts we possessed were taken, and a force, under the command of British officers, was obliged to retreat in complete confusion with the loss of two guns. This was a most important circumstance in itself, from the loss sustained, and more especially from the effect it would have on the whole frontier which separated Hindostan from the other parts of Asia. He hoped the Secretary of State for India would give the House what information he could on this subject. The original circumstance of the expedition to Bhootan was, he thought, open to very great doubt indeed. He would go farther, and say that Mr. Ashley Eden, the gentleman sent on that expedition, the Envoy who suffered the insult which led to this expedition, had previously played no unimportant part in India. He had been the cause of the quarrels between Europeans and Natives on the question of indigo, and no doubt that gentleman had not displayed the discretion and prudence to be expected from persons deputed by the Government of India to manage important affairs. That gentleman certainly received no praise for his conduct either in India or in England on that occasion, and the disputes which his conduct was the primary cause of occasioning, led to very disastrous consequences in Bengal. It was extraordinary that a gentleman who had not signalized himself by any prudence in the position which he previously occupied should have been selected for this very delicate mission as an Envoy to Bhootan. That was one of the points in which the Government of India was, perhaps, open to blame, but he was unwilling to discuss the question till the papers were laid before them. He hoped the Secretary of State for India would explain how a territory of this sort, recently annexed, was left with so small a guard, and as he had the telegraph at his command, he would give them his views as to the Governor General's allowing the Government of Bengal to take this matter into their own hands. While it was in the hands of the Commander-in-Chief the affair was successful, why then was it left to the inferior Government of Bengal? He did not wish to prejudge the question, but the circumstances were of so exceptional a nature that he hoped the fullest explanation would be given before the House separated for the holidays. They all knew what was the effect of the slightest disaster in a country situated like India; and they had seen on a former occasion how great a flame a little spark had kindled. No doubt all over the frontier this disaster would be immensely magnified. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman would give them at the earliest opportunity all the papers relating to this subject, accompanied with a good map, so that they might be enabled to understand the whole question, and that a full inquiry into it would be made.

MR. VANSITTART said, the hon. Gentleman was mistaken in supposing that any European force was sent to Bhootan. It appeared to him that the same mistake which was committed last year in the Hill war on our North Western frontier had been repeated this year in Bhootan—namely, that of despising the enemy. In defence, however, of the conduct of the 43rd Regiment Native Infantry, which ran away from Dewangiri, he had authority for stating that that regiment went into action with but one European officer beside the colonel fit for duty. It was notorious that Asiatic troops would not behave well in action when they were under-officered, and all the Native regiments in India were in this state, owing to the right hon. the Secretary for India, in spite of all warnings and protests, converting the regular Native troops into irregulars, and thus reducing the number of officers from twenty-four to six. Besides which, the unfortunate system that had been introduced in carrying out the amalgamation order had had the effect of making commanding officers entire strangers to their men, and destroying the sympathy which used formerly to exist between them. In fact, no officer could now-a-days lead into action, as in the old time, men with whom he had been acquainted since his boyhood. With regard to this war there had unquestionably been great mismanagement, and the time that was suffered to elapse between the insult offered to our Envoys by the Bhootan Court and the despatch of troops to avenge it had been attended with the worst results. In dealing with barbarians like the Bhootans promptitude of action was necessary, for they attributed inaction to hesitation and fear. Moreover, instead of employing a Native force, of which, with the exception of the Ghorkas, all seemed to have behaved more or less badly, it would have been better had we organized, in the first instance, a compact, flying European column, for whose operations when the war first commenced the weather was very favourable, it being the commencement of the cold season. This course was, he believed, now being taken, but much valuable time had been lost. Looking to the advanced season, he feared that our gallant European troops would suffer greatly from malaria and cholera. It appeared to him that instead of that feeble policy of occupying a few trumpery passes, our troops ought to have marched boldly into the heart of the country, and after inflicting a severe blow on a despicable enemy, armed with bows and arrows, have concluded a peace and retired from their sterile hills. That might have been effected with comparatively little loss of life and treasure, and without injury to our prestige. This was the course pursued by that clear-minded man, Lord Ellenborough, on the occasion of the second advance of our troops into Affghanistan, and it had been attended with the best results, for we had commanded the respect of that warlike nation ever since.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he hoped the right hon. Baronet would give the House some information as to how it was the local Bengal Government had been suffered to act instead of the Supreme Government, and whether the Commander-in-Chief was responsible. It appeared that the local Government were responsible for sending the Native troops without European officers, and it was highly improper that any local Government should be allowed to plunge the Government into war.

MR. TORRENS said, that the hon. Gentleman who introduced the subject was somewhat in error when he spoke of the European troops in the expedition. The great fault that was to be found with those who had projected it was that no Europeans whatever had been employed, except some twenty artillerymen for the management of the two Armstrongs, which, he was sorry to say, had been deplorably lost in the disgraceful flight from Dewangiri. The House had very little information with respect to this expedition. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir Charles Wood) he believed had received little. But if he had received any he had certainly not revealed it to the public. So far as the facts had reached him (Mr. Torrens), it appeared that the operations of the force were attended with tolerable success during the season favourable to their employment; but when that period had elapsed, and many of the English officers became too ill to remain in the country, their number was consequently diminished, even the Native men were reduced by half; and the sad disaster of Dewangiri took place. It had been stated in a letter from Calcutta, which had been yesterday published in The Times, that the 43rd Native Infantry — composed, as he understood, entirely of Assamese who were a very cowardly race — were left to garrison the stockade at Dewangiri. But many of these men were only enlisted in October, the very month that this war begun, who had never been drilled, and were the first to run away from their post. The consequence was, that the rest of the regiment, too, also misbehaved; they ran away, and we lost our guns. Now, was it fair to leave British officers in command of such a rabble, some of whom were stated in the letter to which he had referred not to have received a day's drill. The right hon. Gentleman had stated, in reply to a question last evening, that an inquiry would be instituted into the management of this expedition. But who was to institute it? Was it the Governor General, or Mr. Beadon, the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, who were both responsible for the grievous ill-management of the expedition? The Governor General must be held responsible for sending an expedition into a difficult and mountainous country, composed of a bad description of Natives, solely without any European force to support—doing this in the teeth of all Indian experience, which shows that for the lengthened operations of a campaign Natives are not to be relied on unless they are sustained by British bayonets. He thought the inquiry ought to be instituted in England. As to the fate of our soldiers, who in the rainy and hot season were to be pushed forward into that ill-provided country, he would not dwell upon it, but he looked forward to the consequences with great apprehension. He hoped the House would receive from the right hon. Gentleman complete information upon the subject as far as it could be given.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he was puzzled as to how he should set about answering the various conflicting and inconsistent statements which had been made by hon. Gentlemen who had taken part in this debate. Indeed, many of the statements which had been alleged seemed to him to be the reverse of the truth. The hon. Gentleman who had first spoken stated that the Government had withdrawn the European troops from the expedition. But the fact was that no European troops had been sent, and none having been sent none could be withdrawn. The hon. Gentleman then said that, though our loss at first was small, he understood that we had since then lost one-third of our men. [Mr. HENRY SEYMOUR: It appears so from the newspapers.] He (Sir Charles Wood) could not account for the reports in the newspapers; but he could say this, that we had lost neither one-third nor any considerable portion of our force. The whole statement, in fact, appeared so entirely without foundation that he was at a loss to conceive whence it could have come. [Mr. HENRY SEYMOUR: Have not two guns been lost?] The hon. Gentleman, again, had talked of the immense loss we had sustained in the occupation of the Dooars. But he (Sir Charles Wood) informed the House last night that the actual loss, in effecting that occupation, except what had occurred from an accidental explosion, was only five men. What we had lost since then he could not pretend to say, but it might be forty or fifty men. However, instead of attempting to follow the various statements which had been made, perhaps the best course to take, and that most satisfactory to the House, would be to give a history of what had actually taken place. And in the first place he might be allowed to say that the papers which had been laid upon the table would afford the most complete information up to the time of the occupation. The India Office had been most desirous to give every information which could throw light upon the question, and the papers had been ready for some time, but the noble Lord had asked for a map in order to illustrate the operations; and so defective were the materials at their command, that the office had been employed for a long time in collecting the necessary information for making a map, and it was only at the commencement of last week that they had succeeded in doing so. The delay that had taken place, then, was entirely owing to the anxiety of the Department to furnish the House with this map. For many years past inroads had been made by the people of Bhootan into our territories, and before the mutiny broke out it had been determined by the Indian Government to send an expedition into that country with the view of bringing the aggressors to account, and also to rescue a number of British subjects who had been carried off into slavery. The mutiny, of course, put an end for the time to any idea of the sort, and when Lord Elgin went to India he was anxious, in conformity with the directions which he had received from home, to avoid having recourse to a military expedition. Lord Elgin, therefore, determined to send a mission to the capital of Bhootan, in order to make arrangements with the authorities there for the restoration of the British subjects who had been carried into captivity, and to obtain some security against future aggression. There was no reason at the time to apprehend that the mission would be ill received, because a former one had been treated with the utmost consideration and courtesy. And here he wished to say that the Government had no reason to believe that Mr. Eden was not, in all respects, a perfectly fit person for such a mission. On the contrary, that gentleman had conducted a mission to Sikhim, with great ability, and in this last occasion he had behaved with remarkable discretion in a position of great difficulty. The mission, however, was entirely unsuccessful in obtaining redress, and it would be perfectly impossible for any Government, which had a regard for its own honour, to submit to the indignities which had been offered to it in the person of its envoy. The circumstances to which he alluded took place in the course of last summer, and it was then determined that measures should be adopted in order to force from the Bhootan Government redress for the injuries which it had inflicted upon British subjects. It would have been perfect madness to send our troops into that country in the hot season. The advance was made at the earliest moment which was consistent with the health of our troops, and that was about the last of

December—only a few months after Mr. Eden's return. There was no unnecessary delay subsequent to the return of Mr. Eden. It would be seen by the papers that there were three courses suggested as possible to be pursued with the view of bringing the Bhootans to reason. One was the permanent annexation of Bhootan, the second was the temporary occupation of the country, and the third was the occupation of the Dooars, a portion of which we had always held, including the occupation of the passes from the hill country through which plundering expeditions had been made, and by the holding of which passes protection would be given to the people below against the inroads of the highlanders. He was entirely against the annexation of Bhootan, and he also objected to the temporary occupation; because, looking at the total disorganization of the Government of the country, it would be difficult for any sovereign chief with whom we might make a treaty to hold his position unless he had our support, and this would involve us in the internal concerns of that country. That was a policy which it would be wise to avoid. The course which was recommended—the occupation of the Dooars—met the approbation of all those persons who were best acquainted with the locality, was determined upon by the Government of India, sanctioned by the Commander-in-Chief and by the Home Government. This course was adopted because it was the least expensive, would lead to least subsequent mischief, would be most likely to attain the end in view, and promote the welfare of the people. In the beginning of December a force which had been determined upon by the Government of India, and placed under the command of a general officer, advanced for the purpose of occupying the portion of the country to which he had referred, and that occupation was so successful that had it not been for the accidental explosion of a mortar, they would only have lost five men up to the end of December. Our troops were in the occupation of the forts, and no resistance was offered. The whole undertaking had been under the direction of the Government of India. The Government of Bengal being a local Government, was quite subordinate to the Government of India. Towards the end of January the Bhooteas assembled in force in front of two of our positions, but we still retained possession of the two places, Buxa and Dalimkote, which the hon. Gentleman said we had lost. Dewangiri was abandoned because it was cut off from any supply of water, and we were not driven from it by any attack made upon the troops. The officer conducting the evacuation, having to remove his two guns by manual labour, and the strength of men dragging them failing, spiked them, and threw them over a precipice, into a narrow valley, and did not lose them through any attack of the enemy. The men of the 43rd had behaved gallantly, so far as the information which had reached this country enabled him to judge. The hon. Member for Windsor said that there were not European officers enough with the regiments, and blamed the reduction of the numbers attached to the old regular regiments; but he must remember that the number of European officers with the old irregular regiments was only three, and many of the most gallant actions ever fought in India had been fought by regiments so organized. An alteration had been lately made, by which six European officers were appointed instead of three.

MR. VANSITTART: What he said was, that we had regular Native regiments and irregulars, and we had reduced the officers from twenty-four to six.

SIR CHARLES WOOD: That was perfectly true; but it was equally true that many of the best actions in India had been fought by those regiments in which there were only three European officers. At the present moment there was no resistance on the greater part of the territory which we occupied, and the troops still maintained the position which they had occupied. He hoped by the next mail to receive more accurate information of what had occurred upon the subject. It was not quite fair to condemn the officers and men upon the scanty information which had been received. No official report had been forwarded. He thought the account which came to this country of great disasters was entirely unfounded, and he had received no information which would lead him to suppose that any great loss had been sustained.

HOLYHEAD HARBOUR.—QUESTION.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he rose to ask the President of the Board of Trade, When the repairs to the Landing Pier at Holyhead will be finished, whether the works recommended by the Committee will be carried out, and if not finished when they will be finished? At present passengers were put to much inconvenience in landing and embarking there.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, the Committee referred to had not recommended any particular plan. There were two plans considered, and the Members of the Committee were more favourable to one than to the other, but there was no definite recommendation that it should be adopted. He was aware their opinion was that an endeavour should be made to carry out the second plan. That had been done, and he had received a communication from the engineer, and also from the harbour-master at Holyhead, to the effect that the works, so far as the accommodation of steam vessels was concerned, had been completed. A sheltered berth had been provided for the incoming steamer, where the passengers might be landed without delay, and also a berth from which the out-going steamer would take in her passengers and go to sea without difficulty. If the Dublin and Holyhead Steam Packet Company did not avail themselves of these sheltered berths the Government could not help it. Their practice was to take in their passengers and land them at the end of the wooden jetty, but by coming a little further up they would come to the sheltered berth, where there could be very little swell. In accordance with one of the suggestions of the Committee the light-house had been moved to the end of the jetty, and a light would very soon be exhibited there. A berth had also been provided for the reserve packet, where she could lie in perfect safety and be available at a moment's notice. He was not aware that there now existed any difficulty in the speedy landing and embarkation of mails. It had been the desire of the Government to carry out to the best of their ability, and under the most competent advice, the recommendations of the Committee so far as they could be gathered from what passed in it. They had expended in doing so nearly all the money voted for that purpose by the House.

MR. LAIRD said, that having been a Member of the Committee, and knowing that the recommendations were of a very moderate character, involving no considerable outlay, he wished to understand distinctly whether those recommendations had been fully carried out?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that the Committee did not make any definite recommendations. The works, with the exception of the dredging, were on the point of being completed, and could now be used.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,158,797, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of Wages to Artificers, Labourers, and others employed in Her Majesty's Naval Establishments at Home, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1866."

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he thought it was not fair to bring on these Estimates at that time of night (a quarter-past eleven), as several of the items would involve considerable discussion, and the money was not wanted. He had no objection to the first two items—for wages at home and abroad—but he appealed to the noble Lord to institute a proper investigation, and have a final settlement of the wages question. From different classes of workmen in the Royal yards there came constant applications for advances. The joiners were greatly dissatisfied at their rate of wages. Several of the workmen were discontented, and with great reason, for the factory men, for example, got an increase of 55 per cent in their wages on transferring their services to private establishments. The ropemakers and others were sent adrift at short notice, and without means of support for themselves and families. He asked the noble Lord to treat them all in a generous spirit. Although he represented a dockyard borough, he would not bring forward the case of the workmen if he did not conscientiously believe that it was based on good grounds.

MR. ANGERSTEIN said, that he had received a letter stating that workmen in the dockyards received half-pay in case of injuries, but that in cases of sickness no allowance was made. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) had, however, stated that the men received payments during sickness. He had also been informed that the hon. Gentleman's statement regarding the number of superannuated men was not fairly estimated, because the total number of workmen as mentioned by the hon. Gentleman referred only to the establishment at home, while the number of superannuated men included the superannuations on the establishments both at home and abroad. The percentage of superannuations would by this means appear greater than it really was. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would explain those two points. He must say, before he sat down, that he thought that Her Majesty's Government ought to be influenced by the lucid and truthful statement of the hon. Member for Devonport, though in one point he believed the hon. Gentleman had erred, for he could not credit his statement that the Government was indebted to the artificers to the extent of £400,000 a year.

MR. LAIRD said, he did not believe that the employés in the dockyards were so badly treated as some hon. Members appeared to think. The wage at present in Liverpool and Birkenhead were 7s. a day, and on the Clyde 6s. a day, but the average wages in Liverpool and Birkenhead did not amount to more than 24s. or 25s. a week, because a large portion of the men had not regular employment. That the men in the Government dockyards were pretty well paid was proved from the fact that some time since constant employment for twelve months certain was offered at Birkenhead at the rate of 36s. a week, and that, though the wages at the Government dockyards were said to be only 27s. a week, not one man applied for employment from the Government dockyards. The men, too, in the Government establishments were in a much better position, because they generally worked under cover and lost no time from wet weather—an evil to which the men in the private yards were constantly subject. At present the wages on the Clyde and in Liverpool were higher than they had been before, but there was every prospect that they would be reduced. He thought the constant agitation of this matter tended to do great harm in the dockyards.

MR. AYRTON said, when he regarded the extravagant expenditure of the Government, he was perfectly shocked to hear hon. Members endeavouring to increase the Estimate by raising imaginary grievances for the benefit of their constituents. He believed that the duty of a representative was rather to watch the Estimates for the purpose of reducing them, and thus economizing the expenditure of public money; but no sooner was the subject of dockyards mentioned in the House than some representative of the dockyards or the dockyard boroughs would stand up and maintain that some one or other ought to be paid more than he at present received. This system would almost induce the opinion that either the Government ought to possess no dockyards at all, or the dockyard boroughs ought to have no representative.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he must disclaim being influenced by the considerations referred to by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton), because his constituents would be glad to see the Government dockyard in their borough abandoned, and that fine part of the river on which it was situated occupied by private firms. In answer, however, to the argument employed by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Laird), he might say that mere fluctuation in wages would not be sufficient to attract men from the Government dockyards, because when a man became established he would, by leaving the yard, forfeit all claim to superannuation. He believed the system of measurement employed in the Government dockyards was defective, and was a great cause of discontent, because it often happened by the men working in gangs that the worst workman received the best pay at the end of the week. They did not know at the end of the week how much they had earned. He must say that he believed himself bound to represent to the House the grievances of his constituents whenever they were brought under his notice.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, the whole tenor of the debate showed how much an authoritative inquiry would conduce to the comforts of the dockyard Members. They would then be able to say to those who came to them with grievances that they were unjustifiable; or, on the contrary, that those grievances were worthy (as he believed most of them were) the immediate attention of the House. He had complaints, and appeared for the engineers, the Royal Naval engineers, the smiths, the storekeepers, the workmen in steam factories, and the artificers generally; and if the Government would grant them a Committee to inquire into their grievances it would be found that most of them had a substantial footing, though he could not but admit that some of them were brought before the House without sufficient cause. He hoped the attention of the Duke of Somerset and of the noble Lord opposite would be given to the subject, as all that the men desired was inquiry.

MR. LOCKE asked if there was any law which obliged these men to enter the dockyards. If there was, then there ought to be inquiry, but if there was not, as the dockyards of the whole country were open to them, he did not see they ought to complain. He believed that they went to the dockyards for the simple reason that they liked it, and if they did not find the work there to suit them they could leave it. It appeared to him that hon. Members for the dockyard towns had been speaking not to the House but with an eye to a general election.

MR. WYKEHAM MARTIN said, he was glad to find that no metropolitan Member ever dreamt of a job for the benefit of his constituents. There were large sums annually voted for the maintenance of public parks and institutions in the metropolis, and he recollected that an hon. Member, not far from him, had once proposed that the whole expense of the sewage of the metropolis should be thrown on the nation. The hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Laird) had, in his remarks, only noticed one class of workmen, and forgot those who were tempted to enter the dockyards when wages were high, and who were discharged in quiet, peaceful times. He could not see why, because the representatives of dockyard towns asked that justice should be done to infirm and injured public servants, they should be accused of personal motives.

MR. CHILDERS said, he thought he might safely leave the question in the hands of hon. Members who did not represent dockyard towns, but perhaps it would be only proper that he should notice some of the specific complaints that had been urged. The hon. and gallant Member for Chatham (Sir Frederic Smith) had expressed a hope that no hardship would be inflicted upon the officers whose offices had been recently abolished—the spinners and the measurers. It was true that the spirit of progress had pressed hardly upon individuals, and a good many spinners and measurers had been discharged, whose work was now efficiently done at a saving of several thousands a year to the public. But great care had been taken to do as little harm as possible to any individuals. With regard to the spinners, a great majority of them have been able to get employment in other branches of the service, and only a small proportion of them had elected to leave the dockyards. Every consideration had been shown towards those persons which was consistent with a due regard for the public interest, and no one could be more anxious to do justice to all parties than was the noble Duke at the head of the Admiralty. With regard to the other class of persons who had been affected by recent changes, those who were not fit for other works were superannuated; but as to the remainder, they were being gradually absorbed into the other departments, and until that absorption took place, which he believed would be in a few months, they were allowed to retain their salaries. The hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Angerstein) had referred to a remark which he (Mr. Childers) had been supposed to have made on a former evening respecting the advantages enjoyed by dockyard men when they were sick. It was a mistake to suppose that he had alluded to that subject, but he would just acquaint the House with the regulations in force for the sick and hurt workmen in the dockyards. Any man who was hurt in the execution of his duty was allowed half-pay until his return to work, but a man absent on account of sickness has no allowance. When any workman had been absent from sickness for a period of six months a special report was required, and the surgeons were directed not to allow men to remain absent for a longer period than was actually necessary. During the process of recovering strength a man was put to easy work, and when a man became ruptured in the course of his duty, upon the recommendation of the surgeon he was provided with a truss. If those regulations were fairly carried out, and he believed that they were carried out in the most kindly spirit by the surgeons of the various yards, he did not know what possible improvement could be introduced. The hon. Gentleman also spoke of his comparing the 9,600 men on the establishment receiving pay with the 3,000 men who were in the receipt of superannuation allowances. In fact, he believed he had rather understated the latter figures, as he now learnt that the total number of men in receipt of such allowances was 3,100, or rather more than 30 per cent of the establishment. The other hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Alderman Salomons) complained that the men in the dockyards did not know what they earned, but as all men were now paid by day wages, there could be no difficulty on that account. Then came the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) who approached the subject with courage, not to say with rashness, and he brought a whole budget of complaints from all branches of officers in the dockyard service. If the hon. and gallant Member thought it to be his duty, as the representative of a dockyard borough to say that everybody had a grievance, he (Mr. Childers) would be content to leave it to the knowledge and discretion of the House to decide how much weight should be attached to such evidence. Once a year the Admiralty gave every possible facility for the rectification of grievances. They went to the dockyards, they investigated complaints on the spot, and the representations of the men were thoroughly looked into. He trusted that the Government would be allowed to take this Vote, and that the House would hear no more during the present Session of the insufficient pay of persons employed in the Royal Dockyards.

MR. SEELY said, he rose to move a reduction of £10,777 in the Vote, on the ground that the charge for the police was more than sufficient. The amount for the police this year was £38,295, which was appropriated in two parts—one for watching and guarding the navy yards, and the other for watching and guarding the victualling, medical, and transport establishments. He was unable to state the exact appropriation for the present year, because no explanation was given; but he would recommend that in future years the appropriation would be explained. He might assume, however, that the appropriation this year would be the same as for 1863-4, when it was £19,364 for the naval yards, as given at page 5, No. 514 "Navy Ships" account for 1863-4 leaving £18,931 for the victualling, &c., establishments. He had made some inquiries as to the expense which private yards were put to for watching and guarding. He found that at Millwall twelve watchmen were employed at a charge of £748 a year; at the Thames Iron Works ten watchmen were employed at a charge of £696, and taking a third private firm he found that altogether twenty-six watchmen were employed at a cost of £1,652. Calculating the number of workmen employed at these private yards the charge per head per annum was 2s. 6d. a man for watching and guarding. The Government, on the other hand, paid £19,364 for watching 16,964 men, or at the rate of 23s. 2d. per man for guarding their naval yards; but this was economy itself compared with the charge for watching and guarding the victualling and medical establishments, which amounted to not less than £18,931 for watching 714 persons, being £26 6s. per head for the number of persons employed in these establishments. Yet they were mostly matrons, nurses, cooks, barbers, &c. The reason why he proposed this special reduction was, that in 1863-4 the Government only required the sum of £8,141 for watching and guarding these victualling and medical establishments, which was amply sufficient for all practical purposes. These police charges were not incurred in guarding from without, but from within. He believed that the course pursued was such as to damage the character and lower the moral tone of the workmen. In 1859 there was a Committee on Dockyard Economy, and Lieutenant Wise, a dockyard superintendent of the police, was examined before it. He stated that on the workmen leaving the yard of which he was police superintendent they passed between six policemen and an inspector, that about every fifth man was "rubbed down," as it was called, to see if he had any stolen property about him, and that on the average every man was searched twice a week. He would appeal to the Government to take into their consideration the expediency of doing away with what they must admit was a most degrading practice. It might be urged that it was necessary; but that was a plea which was always set up in favour of an abuse, as in the case of the free use of the lash in the army and the press-gang to man the navy. It was a degrading practice, and he ascribed its continuance to the want of competent heads of departments. In private firms, where the relations of master and servants were on a better footing, these heartburnings did not exist. He moved the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £10,777.

MR. CHILDERS said, that the introduction of the metropolitan police into the dockyards was a measure which had been decided upon by the Legislature, and which had been productive of great advantage. He had a Return which showed that whereas in 1859, under the loose system then in operation, only sixty-five persons had been apprehended for theft and other offences, 645 offenders had been arrested the very first year the new system came into operation. That was tolerable proof that the introduction of the police into the dockyards was not a mistake. Since then the number of offences had diminished. His hon. Friend had exaggerated the case as to the number of police engaged in guarding the hospitals and elsewhere; £30,366 went for the wages of the police engaged in watching the dockyards, while the charge for watching the victualling department was £4,234, and that for the medical department £2,653. The amount he could not think was excessive when the work to be done was taken into account.

In reply to Mr. Alderman SALOMONS,

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the introduction of the metropolitan police had considerably lessened the number of offences and of marine-store shop dealings in the dockyards.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, that he wished to vindicate the heads of dockyard departments from the taunts of the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Seely). There were no less than sixteen post captains employed in superintending private yards, showing that their services in this respect were well appreciated in the country.

MR. LAIRD said, he thought £38,000 was a very large sum to be expended on watching and guarding our dockyards. There was a great disparity in this respect between public and private yards. He did not complain of the introduction of the metropolitan police into the dockyards, but he did complain that so large a sum as £38,000 should be expended in maintaining a police force to watch 16,000 to 17,000 men. He also thought it was great degradation for a respectable workman to be searched on leaving the dockyard, though he was ready to admit that a different system of police was required in public from that employed in private establishments. If anything would justify the high wages which were paid in the Royal dockyards, it was the degradation to which respectable workmen were exposed by being searched. The figures quoted by the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Seely) were perfectly correct.

MR. C. P. BERKELEY said, that the police had not only to protect the property in our dockyards, but also to visit every ship lying in the docks and to guard against fires.

MR. SEELY said, that the statements which he had made as to the relative costs of watching in the Government and private yards were accurate.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,148,020, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of Wages to Artificers, Labourers, and others employed in Her Majesty's Naval Establishments at Home, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1886,"—(Mr. Seely.)

(2.) £72,585, Wages to Artificers Abroad.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE moved that the Chairman report Progress.

MR. CHILDERS said, the Government would not object to postpone Votes 10 and 11, and to the others he believed there was no objection.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir James Elphinstone.)

The Committee divided: — Ayes 17; Noes 42: Majority 25.

Votes 10 and 11 were postponed.

(3.) £64,800, Medicines and Medical Stores.

(4.) £103,925, Naval Miscellaneous Services.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he thought that the contribution to sailors' homes should be increased, so as to aid in providing better lodgings for sailors in the principal commercial ports. He found that the Government gave only the trifling sum of £425 as a contribution to sailors' homes, and it appeared to him that they might with great advantage advance a larger sum for so admirable a purpose.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the Government had received no complaints that the sailors' homes in the dockyard ports were not in good circumstances, or that their managers were dissatisfied with the contributions of the Admiralty towards their support. The question whether the Government should assist in the maintenance of similar institutions in all the commercial ports—for the Government could not make a distinction—was a very wide one, which would require much consideration. He was afraid that the immediate effect of their interfering with these charitable institutions would be to lead many persons to withdraw their subscriptions and devote them to objects which received no assistance from the Government.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he could assure the noble Lord that sailors' homes might be extended with great advantage, and complained that the Admiralty made no provision for the education of the children of those who were employed in the dockyards.

MR. CHILDERS said, that the sum of £2,000 which was for contributions to religious and charitable institutions exceeded the Estimate of last year by £625; and this excess was mainly caused by provision for the very object which the hon. Baronet desired to see accomplished. The Director of Education had been instructed to visit all the schools in the dockyard towns, and he had prepared a full and complete scheme under which it was intended in the future to make contributions to their support.

MR. KINNAIRD said, that provision for the safety and comfort of sailors when they came ashore was not a work of charity; it was a plain duty of the Admiralty.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he wished to inquire what was the amount of stamp duty paid by officers of the navy for their commissions.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the stamp was fixed by law at 5s.

In moving that the Chairman should report Progress,

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that he intended to go on with the Navy Estimates after the Army Estimates on Monday, the 24th instant.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he thought that that was too early a day.

MR. CHILDERS said, that Vote 11 would not be taken on the 24th.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported on Monday 24th April; Committee to sit again on Monday 24th April.

TENURE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LAND (IRELAND) ACT.—COMMITTEE.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Select Committee on the Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Act do consist of Seventeen Members."

MR. HENNESSY moved an Amendment that the Select Committee on Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland) be increased from seventeen to twenty-one

Lord Clarence Paget

Members, and that Lord Robert Cecil be a Member of the Committee.

MR. SPEAKER said, it was out of order to move an addition to the Committee without due notice.

MR. COX moved the adjournment of the Question.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he had no objection to postpone the nomination of the Committee to the first Thursday after the Easter recess.

WATERWORKS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. MILNER GIBSON, Bill to amend the Law relating to Waterworks, ordered to be brought in by Mr. MILNER GIBSON and Mr. BARING.

MASTER AND SERVANT BILL.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the state of the Law as regards Contracts of Service between Master and Servant, and as to the expediency of amending the same."—(Mr. Cobett.)

BRITISH PRISONERS IN ABYSSINIA.

QUESTION.

MR. WARNER said, he would beg to put a Question to the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in reference to British prisoners in Abyssinia. He wished to know, What is the present state of the negotiations with respect to the British captives in Abyssinia, whether the Government have reason to expect a successful issue to the mission of M. Rassam, and what steps they are prepared to take in the event of their not receiving good accounts from him?

MR. LAYARD replied, that he was afraid that he could not give the hon. Member much information on the subject, not that he wished to conceal anything, but that he considered it would be very unadvisable, considering the position of the prisoners, that anything should be said that might lead to greater complications. He would take this opportunity, therefore, of deprecating any mention in the press of what took place in that House or elsewhere with regard to those prisoners, as he had reason to believe that all these things were sent out to Abyssinia and got much exaggerated, and might lead to serious consequences to the prisoners who were held by the King. Every means had been taken by Her Majesty's Government to obtain their release. The Government were in communication with some of the authorities; they had lately heard from a good source that Captain Cameron and the missionaries, although in prison, were in good health; and letters received from M. Rassam within a few hours held out the hope that ere long the prisoners would obtain their release.

THE BANKRUPTCY ACT, 1861,

QUESTION.

MR. MURRAY said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General, Whether it is intended to introduce in this Session any Bill to carry out the Resolutions reported to the House by the Select Committee appointed to inquire into the working of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, in reply, that considering the magnitude and importance of the subject, he did not think it possible to give any engagement on the part of the Government that a Bill would be introduced during the present Session. All he would undertake to say was that the recommendations of the Committee would, without any loss of time, receive the best consideration of the Government, with the view to introduce as speedily as possible such a measure as it should seem to them expedient to adopt.

MORTALITY AMONG CHILDREN IN NORFOLK.—QUESTION.

MR. BENTINCK said, he wished to ask a Question of the Secretary of State for the Home Department of which he had given him private notice, Whether any answer has been received from the Chief Constable of the county of Norfolk to the communication which had been addressed to him by the right hon. Baronet as to the accuracy of the statement of the alleged mortality among children in the parish of Emneth, in the county of Norfolk?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, in reply, that a detailed statement having been made on the authority of the coroner for Lynn with reference to the alleged mortality among children in the parish of Emneth, he had referred it to the chief constable of the county in order that inquiry might be made; and he had received from him the day before the House adjourned a full Report, which showed that the statement of the coroner was very grossly exaggerated. That statement having attained extensive circulation by being made in that House, he thought it would only be right that the Report of the chief constable should be laid on the table; and if the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bentinck) moved for it, the Report would be produced and printed. He might add that with the Report from the Chief Constable of the county he would produce a letter from the clergyman giving a statement of the circumstances of the parish.

PENSIONS TO EX-COLONIAL GOVERNORS.—QUESTION.

In answer to MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE, MR. CARDWELL said, he would take an early opportunity of laying on the table the terms on which it was proposed to grant pensions to ex-Colonial Governors.

INDIA—PEGU PRIZE MONEY.

EXPLANATION.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he wished to correct a statement he had made just before the holidays, in answer to a Question by the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Mr. H. Cole), with reference to the Rolls of Pegu Prize Money. He had stated that the whole of the Prize Rolls had been sent to Chelsea Hospital, whereas only a portion of them had been sent. Orders had been sent to India to have the remainder sent as soon as possible.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY considered in Committee.

(1.) £212,800, Administration of the Army.

GENERAL PERL said: There cannot be

any question of much greater importance than the organisation of the War Office—that Department on the working of which the efficiency of all the military establishments depends; and I think the noble Lord the Under Secretary for War will now acknowledge the propriety of having postponed this Vote until the Members of the House should have had the opportunity of considering the Report which he has placed on the table. The noble Lord himself also has now had the opportunity of better understanding the feeling with which the proposals have been received by the War Office. The noble Lord said the proposals were received with universal satisfaction throughout the Office, but he has since, I believe, been requested in a somewhat irregular manner—by means of a round-robin, to withdraw the statement he then made. In fact, that Report was received with the greatest possible alarm by the War Department. The first thing which strikes one on the subject is the absence of any information as to the cause which created the necessity for the appointment of the Committee. We have not been favoured with the instructions to the Committee, nor with a copy of Sir Edward Lugard's letter to the Treasury, although a paragraph of it is given which renders it difficult to understand whether the Committee was appointed in consequence of any defects in the working of the Office or from a laudable desire to promote economical reductions in the establishment. One almost supposes that there must have been something vicious in the working of the office from one paragraph in the Report. The Report states that the present system does not enable the Secretary of State to regulate promotions according to the actual requirements of the service. But that is contradicted by Sir Edward Lugard, who was not only a member of the Committee, but also a permanent Under Secretary of State knowing the working of the Office better than any of the members of the Committee. The difference between the Committee and Sir Edward Lugard is, whether selection for promotion should be merely from the branches or be extended over the whole Department, and that is a most important question, which ought to be considered not with reference to the interests of individuals alone, but with a view to the benefit of the service generally. I agree with Sir Edward Lugard that with the exception of the duties of the heads of branches and some of the seniors, there is nothing which a clerk of intelligence and ability could not in a short time acquire, and that it would be an advantage if gentlemen were acquainted with the duties of the Office generally, and not merely with the routine of the particular branch to which they may belong. I would have the promotion general over the whole Office—one advantage of which would be that it would operate as a general stimulus in all the branches. I think, also, it would be less galling to be passed over by a gentleman in another branch than by one in the same room. Indeed, if the system of promotion in the branches were continued, the effect would be little short of making promotion a mere question of seniority, because those who have the promotions in their hands would not like to pass over a gentleman except in a case of such inability as would make it improper that he should remain in the department at all. However a system of promotion in the branches may be applicable to the War Office after several years from the time of its formation, I hold that such a system would have been perfectly impossible at first. The War Department was originally composed of gentlemen from the Colonial Office, the Secretary at War's Office, and the Ordnance Department, and it would have been perfectly impossible to classify the business in the several branches, so as to give to each gentleman the duties which he was best fitted to perform. Another objection to the division proposed in this Report is that it would soon have the effect of defeating the object in view when the War Departments were consolidated—namely, that of having all under one head. I know that some persons would rather see the ordnance and other branches separate departments, but I am not one of those. I think that Lord Dalhousie's plan of having all the branches which at present constitute the War Department under one head, who is responsible for the working of the whole, is a good one, although my experience at the War Office showed me that a great deal remained to be done in order to give effect to that system. Much difficulty in this respect has resulted from the changes of Secretaries of State, of whom there have been five in ten years. The Parliamentary Under Secretaries have also been changed, there having been six or seven within the same period, and there have even been changes in the permanent Under Secretaries, those who do not go out with the Government. When I was in the War Office, Sir Benjamin Hawes, Mr. Godley, and Sir Henry Storks held office in that Department, and I think it would have been impossible to find three men of greater ability, and I had the great advantage of their assistance whenever I required it. Unfortunately, two of those gentlemen, Sir Benjamin Hawes and Mr. Godley, have since been removed by death, and Sir Henry Storks, from his superior merits, has been promoted to the performance of higher duties. I do not say that those who succeeded them are inferior to those gentlemen; but I think it unfortunate that changes in the permanent staff should take place before the system is established. It is impossible to get the system into proper working order if those engaged in carrying it out are perpetually being changed. A great advantage possessed by the War Department over the Admiralty is that those who carry on the duties of the Office do not change with the Government; I found no difficulty to arise from having Under Secretaries of different politics to those professed by myself, or had any reason to know what their politics were. We had all I trust but one object which was to make the Department as efficient as possible. As to any self-constituted committee directing the Secretary of State in respect to the way in which the business of the Office should be performed, that is a thing which I should not suffer were I at the head of the Department. I must observe that, so far from finding any want of zeal and ability on the part of the officers, every paper which came to me was covered with minutes; and so much ability was shown that it was often very difficult to decide which of their several opinions was the best. As I remarked before the Organization Committee, I am of opinion that the Department ought to be worked downwards instead of upwards. I found the best results to follow from the simple arrangement of a weekly meeting between His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief and his staff and the Secretary and Under Secretaries of the War Department. At those conferences questions were often settled which otherwise would have led to a protracted correspondence, and the decision on which must have been delayed a long time if the communications on the subject had been confined to writing. My opinion always has been, and still is, that the business should be divided between the Under Secretaries of State, and that everything requiring opinion and decision should be referred to them in the first instance. They would apply to the branches for information if necessary, but if it were a mere matter of routine it would at once be sent to the branches and settled. Finally, of course, everything should be brought under the notice of the Secretary of State. I am sure that mode of doing business would lead to a great saving of time. The division and classification of the business appears to me to be the grand point on which the whole efficient organization of the Department depends. It is pointed out in these Reports that certain portions of the business of the Office would be as well done by mere clerks as by gentlemen who had passed a civil service examination. But a question then arises as to the point at which the line of distinction between duties requiring superior education and the routine duties of a mere clerk should be drawn. The majority of the Committee state, "That it is the nature of the work done, and not the ability of the person who performs it, which ought to command promotion and remuneration;" but that appears to be quite contrary to the principle on which the civil service examinations have been established. I think, however, that it would be a great advantage if in those examinations the questions had more direct reference to the duties to be performed in the particular office. It is a great hardship to a man who knows the business of an office well, and is in every respect qualified for the position, to be passed over by a man less efficient in the office, merely because the latter could do that which the office would never require of him. When I was at the War Office I acted upon the system of having the clerks appointed as temporary clerks in the first instance, and those who met the approbation of the heads of the branches were allowed to compete for the permanent positions. But I know a case in which thirty-three temporary clerks went up to compete for eleven vacancies, and one of the best clerks in the office who passed nearly the highest in everything required by the office was rejected on account of his Latin. It is scarcely reasonable to expect from such a man much zeal when he went back to his old employment. Neither can you expect great zeal from men of superior education when you tell them their business might be as well done by ordinary men. According to your view you ought not to have first-class clerks and second-class clerks, but first-class business and second-class business. But that is not my idea. My idea is that the War Office in time of peace ought to be reduced to the lowest possible strength consistent with the performance of the work, but that it ought to contain in itself—at all events, among the higher classes of its clerks—gentlemen capable of performing any duty of the Office. When I was at the War Office I knew several such gentlemen there. Something beyond the ability to discharge mere routine duties constitutes the value of the civil servant of the State. A man may be able to perform his own ordinary duties, and yet not be the proper person to put at the head of a branch. I think, therefore, that the promotion should be general, and not confined to branches. I think you should look to the Department as a whole, and not regard it as a collection of separate branches. If a sudden emergency should arise which would make it necessary for you to order an army to go abroad all your arrangements must depend on the War Department. You cannot move without the War Department, and unless you can put the whole strength of the Office into one branch, if necessary, all the evils that arose under the old system of separate establishments will return the moment the Department is put to the test. I would impress upon the Government that the question with which we are now dealing ought not to be settled without the most ample information and the fullest consideration, because there is nothing so unpopular in a Department as constant changes and uncertainty as to the means by which promotion is to be obtained. The great fault of the Report presented to the House is that it proposes that promotion should be confined to branches. As regards the interests of those gentlemen who would be affected by the changes proposed, there are many hon. Members who are better acquainted with them than I am. If mere economy be the object of these Reports I do not think that it was worth while to attempt a saving at so great a disadvantage. Nominally, the saving is £10,000, but that Estimate has already been reduced to £7,000, because there are several items not included, and that saving must be still further diminished on account of the retiring superannuations and annuities which will be granted to these gentlemen. I am certain that no system can possibly work well if it be unpopular with those by whom it is to be carried out, and this one is universally unpopular with the clerks who remain in the Office, and will probably lead to utter despair on the part of some of those discarded. No policy can be worse than that which allows a large body of very useful and meritorious men to leave the public service under the impression that they have not received what they were entitled to, and for that reason I hope that the case of the temporary clerks dismissed upon the present occasion will be re-considered, that that of the permanent clerks also will be further inquired into, and that the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for War will be able to inform the House that full consideration has been given to the change in the system of promotion in the office of the Department before it is carried into effect.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he thought that those Members of the House who had been able to look at the Reports on the table, must feel that the House was fully justified in requesting that the discussion on the Vote might be postponed until the Reports were before them. As a general rule he was quite willing to acknowledge that it was undesirable that the House of Commons should interfere with the discretion of the Government and of heads of Departments in the administration of the departments under their care. Generally speaking the House of Commons had not sufficient knowledge to deal with these questions; but, in the present instance, there were several points which rendered it important that the House of Commons should take into its consideration the new organization of the War Department, and that some explanations upon the subject should be given. One of the questions which ought to be considered was the economical result of the alterations. He had not yet had time to examine into the question very carefully, but it appeared to him that the apparent saving of £10,000 would be materially reduced, and would probably altogether disappear when the counter-charges, not in the Estimate, were set down. First among these counter-charges were the superannuations. He perceived that something like £6,500 had been awarded to a number of gentlemen since the preparation of the Estimate before the House. Those gentlemen were clerks, some of them of a comparatively advanced age, but for the most part young men. The majority were not much more than forty, some fifty, and some even still younger. He would ask the Government whether this £6,500 represented the whole of the superannuations caused by these changes, because he had heard that even since the drawing up of the Report some other cases had been submitted to the Treasury, and one of these cases was stated to be that of the librarian. The probability, therefore, was that something like £1,000 a year more would be added to the superannuation allowances. Then there was the fact that a great many of the persons to be employed would be officers or soldiers who would, at the same time, be drawing allowances from their regiments. To know the value of these changes, therefore, on the score of economy, the House ought to be informed what expenses would be incurred in this direction. There was another and an important point upon which the House ought to exercise its judgment. One of the Reports related to the Accountant General's Department, and proposed the creation of a new office, to be filled by a gentleman called the Auditor General. The House of Commons ought to view with great jealousy the system of auditing in public departments. The question was a difficult one, and they ought to be certain that the system proposed would best prevent the misappropriation of public money. Of course, the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for War would understand that he did not refer to the misappropriation of public money by individuals, but to the employment of public money in a different direction from that for which it was voted by Parliament. The House should bear in mind that there were two kinds of auditing. There was the audit of an independent department, which was more independent than that of the office itself; and there was the audit within the department, which had the advantage that it was conducted by men who knew something of the service, and could say whether the expenditure was right or not. He assumed that the creation of the new office—that of the Auditor General—was not intended in any way to weaken the control which the Audit Board exercised over the War Department. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been in his place he should have asked the right hon. Gentleman whether with these contemplated changes within the Department, it was intended to strengthen or in any way to alter the functions of the Audit Board. Perhaps, however, the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for War would be able to give the House some explanation upon that point. The Accountant General appeared to be the officer mainly instrumental in the preparation of the Estimates, and it was undesirable that the auditing of the Estimates should be separated from the Department where those Estimates were prepared, because it would be much more easily seen whether the expenditure of public money had been in conformity with the purposes for which the money was voted by Parliament. By this means, too, if any misappropriation of public money occurred, owing to a defective preparation of the Estimates, a recurrence of those defects would be the more easily guarded against for the future. He believed, therefore, that it would be inexpedient to separate the auditing from the Department of the Accountant General. He must confess that he was startled the other day by something he had heard in connection with the temporary clerks and their retirement, and he would mention it because he should be glad to hear some explanation upon the subject. It was stated that the retiring gratuities allowed to these gentlemen were not as large as the gratuities awarded on certain other occasions, and especially in the case of certain officers superannuated last year on the change which took place with respect to our establishment in the Ionian Islands. He understood that an application for a certain amount of gratuity was made at the time to the War Department, and that it was stated that the matter ought to go to the Treasury and then that it could not be referred to the Treasury, because the money had been already voted and spent, and therefore they must deal with the matter on their own authority. He thought they ought to take care that there was no department that might feel itself able to ignore any irregularity of that kind. The circumstance of there existing a special audit department in the War Office would have the effect of rendering the Board of Audit somewhat less anxious with regard to the production of the accounts, and if the War Office were subject to that which naturally attached to an executive department — namely, an anxiety to grant favourable terms to its own servants—a danger might arise of a wasteful and improper application of funds, which ought to be checked by a proper system of audit. This was a point upon which the House ought to have some assurance. They ought to be told that this proposed change in the accounts of the departments was not likely to weaken the securities for the proper application of the public money. There was another point upon which he wished to make some observations, and that was with regard to the substitution of branch for office promotion. This was a question which the House ought to consider with extreme jealousy. It might be fairly said that Members of the House of Commons were not the proper judges as to the constitution of an office or the best mode of promoting the clerks, and the House might also be told that this matter had been reported upon by a Committee of eminent public servants, and that members should not be so presumptuous as to criticize the recommendations of that Report. He had, however, served on Committees in former years for the re-organization of a great number of public establishments, and his experience was this—that while the Committees were able to suggest plans which were accepted by the Government, and were to a certain extent acted upon, objections after a year or two were raised on the part of the officers as to the change which had taken place, and this led to subsequent alterations and considerable confusion. Every alteration did harm. He did not mean to say that they might not do good; but the changes unsettled the minds of the civil servants, and induced them to agitate for arrangements more beneficial to themselves. Almost every alteration was sure to be accompanied by a good deal of suffering to officers, and additions of expense which could not be avoided. He could instance several departments—that of the Post Office, for instance—in which changes had been made in consequence of recommendations of Committees. These had been afterwards set aside and large sums of money expended in compensation to persons sustaining injury, and the result had been great confusion in the Department. Clerks had come to him from various offices to state the disadvantages which had accrued to them from the adoption of some plans and the rejection of others. The House ought, therefore, to look very closely into the principles of the Report now before them, especially after the manner in which it had been adopted by the Committee. The Members constituting the Committee were, first, Mr. Anderson and Mr. Arbuthnot, who were connected with the Treasury but had nothing to do with the administration of the War Office, except so far as they had been called on to give their advice, which was proper enough. Then there was the noble Lord the political Under Secretary (the Marquess of Hartington), who had the conduct of the Department, and most ably did he fulfil his duties. There would come a time, however, when another would succeed him who might hold different opinions in this matter. Besides these Members there were Captain Galton and Sir Edward Lugard, two permanent officers of the War Office. Sir Edward Lugard took one view, and the captain took another. The noble Marquess took the side of Captain Galton, and a majority was thereby obtained in favour of the Report. If, at some future day, a new Secretary of State in the Department should be inclined to take the view of Sir Edward Lugard and several other officers of high standing in the Department, the House might be called upon to reverse the decision of the Committee. That decision appeared to him to rest upon an assumption which he regarded as entirely false—that the system of amalgamated office promotion had been tried and failed, and that it ought to be exchanged for a system of branch promotion. The present system of promotion in the office, as he had gathered from the Report, appeared to be one of the most absurd that could be invented. When a vacancy occurred among the first-class clerks, say of the barrack department, a clerk was not promoted in that department to the vacancy, but after inquiry as to who was the best second-class clerk, perhaps in the store department, the authorities gave him the rank of first-class clerk, and kept him still in the same department, while they gave the duties of the vacant first-class clerkship in the barracks to one whom they did not promote, and whose pay they did not increase. It was one of the most wonderful systems that could be conceived. The promotion in work was given to one man, while the promotion of rank was given to another. If this were really the present system, the Committee were certainly right in finding fault with it, and they ought to have proposed that the man most worthy to succeed to the vacant office should receive the appointment, undertake the duties and, draw the pay. If the officer was not fit for the office, however meritorious he might be in other respects, he was not the man to select for promotion. It was by no means to be assumed that the man who had experience in the barrack department must necessarily be the man to succeed to the vacancy. If the offices were managed properly, there were no such technical and exclusive acquirements necessary for the discharge of the duties of one branch as would make it impossible for an intelligent man to perform them if he had been fairly treated from the first and allowed to acquire a general knowledge of the work of the department. It was absurd to suppose that a man of ability would not be fit to be promoted from one branch to another, and nothing could be more advantageous to the office than changes of this sort. There were two different systems under either of which the public offices might be manned. One was the system of mere branch officers, in which case all that was required was to take in young men just able to perform the lowest duties, and confine them to their own branch. The other was to introduce young men of intelligence and give them experience in two or three or more departments, and then promote them according to merit. If the first of these principles was adopted, and they took young men to be brought up as mere machines, they were wrong in taking into the service young men of ability and ambition. The system of competitive examination was unsuited to such a system. But if they adopted the other principle, what could be more reasonable than that when a young man of ability entered the office, and was put forward to serve as a junior in one branch, he should then be removed to another, and thus afford the opportunity of selection from men of varied experience. The result would be that the new blood would be continually coming in, and faults might be discovered in one branch by those who had been accustomed to the duties of another. In that way a more efficient and healthy establishment could be secured than under the system of branch promotion. But there was one condition which ought to be attached to such a system to enable it to work, and that was, the mechanical work should be separated from the other and given to a class of men distinct from the ordinary class of clerks. The proposal to employ non-commissioned officers and soldiers to perform mechanical duties was, he thought, a step in the right direction, as it would have the double advantage of employing persons who could not look for promotion in the department, and of enabling each department to vary its amount of mechanical assistants from time to time, without doing injustice to any one, as the soldiers could be sent back to their military duties, and could not be turned out upon the world as the discharged temporary clerks had been. He was sorry that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had left the House, as he had wished to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to another subject. Some years ago a Committee was appointed, of which he was a member, to consider the whole question relating to copying and subordinate clerks, and that Committee recommended a scheme which, he believed, would have been found advantageous to the public service. The proposal was to establish a copying office, the clerks employed in which should only look for a moderate amount of remuneration, and from which office the wants of other departments should be supplied. Thus, if the War Office wanted fifty copying clerks, that number would be sent; and if at a future time it was found that only thirty were wanted, then the remaining twenty could be sent back to the Copying Office, where they would be available for the requirements of other departments. He alluded to that proposal because he thought the idea of employing soldiers as copying clerks was a step in the right direction. If a great part of the mechanical duties in the offices could be well performed by soldiers, the junior clerks could be to a considerable extent employed in learning the business of those offices, and in qualifying themselves for promotion. At the same time, he thought very great care should be taken to employ soldiers only for work which they were fit to perform, and he very much doubted the expediency of employing soldiers in any examinations of accounts. He observed that the Director of the Store Department seemed to object to some alterations proposed in his Department, but he did not know whether the objections had any relation to the employment of soldiers. There was one other point upon which he wished to say a few words, although his right hon. and gallant Friend (General Peel) had already referred to the subject. He alluded to the case of the unfortunate temporary clerks who had been discharged. He felt that with respect to gentlemen in that position it was a most delicate matter for the House of Commons to interfere with the discretion of the Government as to their retention or dismissal. When a Department of the Government dealt with a large body of its servants in any way which led these gentlemen to consider themselves aggrieved, there was too great a tendency on the part of such persons to appeal to Members of Parliament to undertake the advocacy of their claims. He had had many such requests made to him, but he had always declined to interfere. In the case of these dismissed temporary clerks, however, he did wish to ask some questions. In the first place, he thought the manner in which they had been dealt with was hardly equitable, because they were now treated as temporary clerks, while of late years they had been dealt with in a manner that led them to believe they were something more. When there was a real temporary pressure, such as occurred during the Crimean war, and when there was reason to believe that such pressure would only last for two or three years, it would be unreasonable to allow the Department to enlarge its staff and to burden the country with a larger number of permanent officers than would ultimately be required. Nothing could be more reasonable than that a Secretary of State should be at liberty to employ temporarily a number of gentlemen, offering them certain salaries during the period of their employment, upon the understanding that their services might be dispensed with upon three months' notice. If the gentlemen to whom he now referred had been so dealt with immediately after the close of the Crimean war they would have had no ground for complaint. It might, indeed, be asked why should these gentlemen now complain, when they had been permitted to do work and to receive pay for nine or ten years, instead of having been discharged after being employed for only two or three years? It must, however, be borne in mind that when the emergency which led to their original employment had passed away and their services were still retained, these gentlemen had reason to believe that they were in a different position to mere temporary clerks. It appeared that it was from among these gentlemen that the clerks on the permanent establishment were usually selected, and of late gentlemen were never appointed to the establishment in the first instance, but were made temporary clerks, from which they might afterwards become permanent officers. That practice seemed to give the temporary clerks a certain status. The Committee on Army Organization, in 1860, took notice of the large number of temporary clerks, and recommended the discontinuance of the system of temporary appointments. Since that time, however, other temporary clerks had been appointed. In 1862 a Minute was passed which appeared to him to have deluded the gentlemen whose case he was considering. It appeared from that Minute that the clerks on the permanent establishment were selected from these so-called temporary clerks, who were divided into two classes for that purpose, and they had, besides, a system of advancing salaries, at the rate, some of £5 and some of £10 per annum, up to a maximum in certain cases of £250. Those gentlemen naturally regarded that arrangement as an indication on the part of the Department to recognize them as a class of officers whose services were to be retained. Of course that arrangement would not give any individual clerk a ground of complaint if he were dismissed for misconduct, nor even if it were deemed proper to reduce the establishment in consequence of a diminution in the amount of work to be done. But when it was proposed to substitute an arrangement that would not be less expensive than that which it was to replace, and which was described by those who recommended it as an experiment, when they were proposed to be superseded in favour of another and a new class, then he thought these gentlemen had some reasons for complaint of the manner in which they had been dealt with. When they contrasted their own treatment with that of other gentlemen upon the establishment they could not think but that they had been hardly dealt with. In the Returns which had been laid before Parliament he found that among the permanent clerks whose services had been dispensed with was a gentleman—Mr. Wilson—a third-class clerk, now aged thirty, who had been ten years in the service, and whose salary at the time of the reduction of the establishment was £190. The pension allotted to that gentleman was £47 10s. a year, which represented a larger amount than he would have been entitled to receive under the Superannuation Act if he had retired from ill-health. The gentleman's services had been dispensed with on account of a reduction in the establishment. That gentleman was only thirty years of age now, and would probably have little difficulty in obtaining private employment, or if the Government chose they might again employ him. For his ten years' service he would receive nearly £50 a year for the rest of his life, or, according to probability, a total amount of £2,000. The temporary clerks were men of forty or fifty years of age, who had, many of them, been employed nine, ten, and eleven years, and the whole amount of gratuity to all those gentlemen was £2,000, or about as much as would be paid to the gentlemen who had only served ten years. He did not find fault with the amount awarded to that gentleman, except as an indication that every change induced fresh expense. The temporary clerks, men of forty or fifty years of age, who had served the Department so long, were placed in a difficulty, because at their ages they could not readily obtain employment in private business, and they complained of hardship, because their expectations of permanent retention had been encouraged by the continuance of their employment in the public service after the original pressure upon the Department had passed away. It would be very reasonable that these gentlemen should come forward and ask to be treated with a little more liberality. There were instances, too, of great inequality in the mode in which these gentlemen were dealt with as compared with one another. For instance, one gentleman, Mr. Hodgson, fifty-four years of age, after eleven years of service, only received a retiring allowance of £108, while another gentleman of twenty-five years of age, after a service of one year and four months, had a retiring allowance of £26 5s.; that was, for one-tenth of Mr. Hodgson's service he got a quarter of his allowance. Of course, £26 5s. would be a great deal more valuable to a gentleman of twenty-five years, who might reasonably hope to obtain other employment, than £108 would be to a gentleman of fifty-four years. He did not mean to say that there had been any favouritism shown, but the principle which had been followed of giving a month's pay in respect of three year's service certainly had worked most unfairly with respect to some of the clerks. Looking to the spirit of the Superannuation Act, the noble Marquess would see that there was as much reason why an additional allowance should be made to these gentlemen as to the permanent clerks. They only received one month's pay in respect of three years service; but if they had been permanent clerks they would have had one month for each year; and an addition on account of being dispensed with for the convenience of the Office. Therefore, considering that they were dispensed with in order to allow an experiment to be carried out which might not be successful, they had a right to complain of the treatment. He wished to ask the noble Marquess whether this system of temporary clerks was to be continued, as there was nothing in the Report which would lead any one to suppose that it was to be abandoned. If so, was it to be continued on the footing of the Minute of 1862; and he should like to hear the noble Marquess's opinion as to the effect which this mode of dealing with these gentlemen would have on the good feeling and right spirit of the Office generally. He wished also to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he thought it would be possible to take into his consideration a plan which would get rid of all the difficulties attending temporary clerks by establishing a copying office for the use of the whole public service. He made these remarks because he had some experience of these Committees and of the manner in which their recommendations had been set aside after a great deal of dissatisfaction and expense, and because he was much dissatisfied with the main principle of these recommendations, and felt convinced that before many years, if they were acted on, there would be a re-action against them and a modification of them. As these changes were said to be made for the sake of inspiring and invigorating the Department generally, they had a right to enter more minutely than might otherwise have been necessary into the manner in which they were likely to operate on the feelings of the clerks. The Report pointed out that the Office at present was not worked with the energy with which it ought it to be, but he did not believe that this was the way to infuse a right spirit into it. Some arrangement, such as that of a general office of subordinate clerks, from which the higher ranks could be filled by promotion, would, it appeared to him, have the best tendency to promote the zeal and energy of the different departments. He wished, therefore, to ask the noble Marquess whether he did not think that the change in the Accountant General's office would not weaken the check of the Audit Board; whether any measures were likely to be taken to improve the control of the Audit Office over the War Department; and whether he thought the separation of the audit in the War Office from the Accountant General's Department a measure likely to conduce to economy?

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he thought that the prospect opened out to well conducted soldiers and non-commissioned officers by this scheme would attract a better class of men into the army, and would improve its general standing and morality. He therefore cordially thanked the noble Marquess for the share which he had taken in it.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I will take the opportunity first of referring to a statement made by me on a previous occasion, of which I have been reminded by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (General Peel), as to the effect produced on the War Office by the publication of this Report. I do not think I used the words quoted by the right hon. Gentleman, that "the Report had been received with entire satisfaction in the War Office." On the contrary, I said there was great excitement in the War Office, more with reference to the result of this debate than the Report of the Committee, and that as far as I knew the Report had been well received in the War Office. I am quite willing now to admit that I have reason to believe that statement was not correct, and that the clerks in the War Office, I am sorry to say, look upon the Report with considerable suspicion, and believe that it will be extremely injurious to their prospects. I should be most willing to correct any mistake I might have made, but the extreme irregularity of the manner in which the incorrectness of the statement referred to was brought under my notice prevents me from saying more on this occasion, and from taking any additional notice of the statements there made. But although I am willing to admit that the feeling of the War Office is contrary to the recommendations of this Committee, still, much as I may regret that circumstance, it does not make any difference to my mind in the soundness of the views expressed in that Report. Criticisms have been passed both in and out of this House on that Report, on the manner in which the questions touched on in it are discussed, and on the manner in which the recommendations it makes are set forth. It is quite possible that if the Report had been intended to be published it would have been expressed in a different manner—that it would have gone into a much fuller explanation of various points. But it must be borne in mind that the Report was not drawn up for the information of the House of Commons or the public, but for the guidance of the Secretary of State, by whom the Committee was appointed, who, of course, was intimately acquainted with the position of the Office and the circumstances which led to the appointment of the Committee. I had no objection to lay the Report on the table; but it never occurred to me, or any Member of the Committee, that the Report was to be published, and it is possible, therefore, that to persons not intimately conversant with the interior arrangement of the War Office it is not so clear as it might have been. The right hon. Gentleman complains that no explanation was given of the reasons for the appointment of this Committee, and that the instructions to it have not been laid on the table. Several reasons induced Lord de Grey to come to the opinion that improvements might be made in the working of the War Office. In the first place, ever since 1856, in spite of all the efforts of successive Secretaries of State, a continual increase had been going on in the number of the clerks in the War Office, and in spite of that increase the work was not performed any more rapidly or regularly. The work frequently fell into arrear, even when there was no extraordinary pressure, and the business was not attended to with the desired promptitude and ability. Besides these general reasons for making certain inquiries into the working of the office, probably it is within the knowledge of a considerable number of hon. Gentlemen that during the course of last year circumstances occurred which more specifically drew attention to its organization. At that time certain irregularities were discovered to have existed in the Office for a considerable time, which showed that in some parts of the Office there was a very serious want of proper supervision. Upon looking at the constitution of the establishment, it appeared that while some of its branches were entirely without the supervision necessary to preserve proper discipline, in others the proportion of superior clerks was so large that their services as supervisors were almost thrown away. These were the principal reasons which led to the appointment of the Committee whose Report is now under discussion. The hon. Baronet (Sir Stafford Northcote) complains that the instructions given to the Committee have not been laid upon the table of the House. But as far as I recollect those instructions were of a very general nature, and allowed the Committee a considerable latitude in the prosecution of their investigations. The principal point in this Report which has been referred to, and the only one on which any difference of opinion was entertained in the Committee itself, is the recommendation that the promotions in the War Office should no longer be divided into two classes, but should be from a much greater number of branches. The principle contained in this recommendation is not by any means a new one. At the re-organization of the War Office, in 1856, the promotions were extended throughout the whole Office indiscriminately, but upon the recommendation of a Committee, which sat later to inquire into the working of the account branch, it was separated from the other departments so far as regards promotion. The opinions we have received upon the subject tend to show that this subdivision of promotion, so far as it has gone, has been productive of very good results. The Committee, whose Report has just been laid upon the table, examined very carefully, not only the heads of the different departments, but also other gentlemen whose opinions were of value upon the subject, as to what would be the probable effect of extending the principle further, and the evidence received was almost unanimously in favour of the course proposed to be adopted. Not only is the principle known already in the War Office, but it is the principle adopted in the Admiralty, and which, so far as the organization of the Office itself is concerned, is found to work well. In fact, in the Admiralty the office was sub-divided for the purpose of promotion into very much smaller divisions than are recommended in this Report. It appears to me, and I think every other person who has taken the trouble to look into the subject will agree with me on the point, that the reasons for the proposed subdivision are very strong indeed. The hon. Member for Stamford

(Sir Stafford Nothote) admitted that the principle at present regulating promotion at the War Office is one which cannot be defended. It cannot be right that when a vacancy occurs in a particular branch, a gentleman in such branch should be promoted to perform the duties of the higher office so vacated without receiving an increase of pay, while in another branch a gentlemen received an increase of pay without obtaining any promotion in point of rank. This certainly was not the intention of Lord Panmure, when he directed that upon any vacancy occurring in any branch of such a nature as to cause a promotion, the head of the branch in which such vacancy occurred was to recommend to the permanent Under Secretary of State the gentleman whom he thought most fit to fill the vacant office. This is shown by the fact that neither Lord Panmure himself, nor any succeeding Secretary of State for War, has observed this regulation. On this point the Committee say—

“We do not question the motives by which those who are responsible for the selection of clerks for promotion have been governed. We have no doubt that they have been influenced solely by a desire to carry out the regulations in the manner best calculated to reconcile the claims of individuals with the requirements of the public service; but it appears to us that anomalies of the character to which we have referred are inseparable from a system which attempts to give promotion as the reward of general merit by selection from a wide range of Departments, the duties of which vary in character, and many of which have little in common beyond the circumstance of their being subject to the authority of the Secretary of State for War.”

It is because we found it impossible to carry out the regulations of Lord Panmure that we have recommended the system of branch promotion which has already been found to work satisfactorily. The right hon. and gallant Member (General Peel) says he does not attach much weight to the opinions of the heads of the different branches; but, if you are not to take the opinions of those gentlemen, it would be exceedingly difficult to effect any improvement in the Office. Those gentlemen are responsible to the Secretary of State for the manner in which the work of the Office is performed, and they must know better than other persons the system of promotion under which they would be able most efficiently to perform it. It is quite possible that in some cases heads of departments may take up erroneous views upon particular points, but where we find that they concur in their opinions, I think we should give those opinions considerable weight in coming to a decision upon the subject. The reason for the extraordinary system at present in operation being adopted was, no doubt, this:—When a vacancy has occurred in any particular branch in which no one appeared to be deserving of immediate promotion, and when a clerk in another branch did deserve promotion, the head of the Department in which the vacancy occurred might, undoubtedly, have selected a clerk from another branch; but it has been found in practice that the heads of the Departments would rather conduct the business of their office with the men they had before, and even with a reduced staff than bring into it to perform responsible duties a man unacquainted with them, and who, before he was of much service, must go through a sort of apprenticeship. It is all very well to talk of teaching the young clerks the work of all the various branches; but it often takes a great part of a man's official life to enable him to thoroughly master one branch alone. No doubt, something might be done in that direction by making young clerks serve first in one office and then in another, but a thorough knowledge of the duties required cannot be obtained by devoting time to more than one or two branches. It would be quite unreasonable to expect that a man who has been employed for a certain number of years in the medical office should go as a second or third class clerk into the Works Department, where he would have to enter upon duties of a completely different character from that which he has been previously occupied with, and for which his former occupation to a great extent unfits him. Reference has been made to the anticipated economical results from the change recommended; but I must state that the recommendations of the Committee were not made with the view of effecting an immediate saving upon this Vote; our principal object being to increase the efficiency of the Office, and any economy which may result from the changes will be only a secondary consideration. However, an immediate saving will result from the alterations proposed, the amount of which we hope will increase in the course of years, as the heads of Departments, in consequence of the increased efficiency of their respective branches, will be able to dispense with a considerable number of the clerks at present employed in them. In no instance, or hardly in any, have we recommended the reduction of the number of persons employed in any branch, but it is hoped that in several instances it will in the future be found possible to effect such a diminution. When re-organization was still under consideration, and it was therefore impossible to state accurately what would be the cost of the War Office during the present year, we asked for a sum less by £10,000 than that voted last year, and I believe that if the arrangements which we have recommended are carried out the saving which will be effected will exceed that amount. According to a statement, which I am sorry I have not at hand, the saving resulting from the immediate adoption will this year be about £7,000, and in a few years, even with the existing establishment, it will reach £15,000 a year. If the number of clerks employed in several branches are reduced, as it is anticipated will be the case, the saving will, of course, be considerably increased. The hon. Baronet the Member for Stamford (Sir Stafford Northcote) asked me what were our reasons for recommending the subdivision of the Accountant General's branch of the War Office. One of our principal reasons was this:—As the hon. Baronet is probably aware, the irregularities to which I have already referred occurred in the Accountant General's branch. When we looked into its organization we found that that branch was too large to be effectively superintended by a single individual, and it appeared to us that any arrangement by which 240 clerks should no longer be placed under the personal supervision of one gentleman would of itself be an improvement. We also thought that it would be advantageous to separate the duties connected with the keeping of accounts and the preparation of Estimates from those of their examination by the Board of Audit. The Committee had no desire to procure any alteration of the functions of the Board of Audit with reference to the expenditure of the funds voted by Parliament, and, as far as I am aware, the duties of that Board remain exactly as they were. The only division is a division of the duties performed in the Accountant General's branch. The hon. Baronet is, no doubt, aware that a large part of the work of that branch is the examination and checking of accounts. The accounts of the paymaster of every regiment, of the controller of army expenditure, and of every person who is authorized to spend money on the part of the War Department at any station whatever come to the Accountant General's office to be minutely checked and compared with the vouchers. That is very different business from the settlement of claims, or the discussion of questions of the pay and allowances of officers, or from keeping the accounts which have to be presented to Parliament, or preparing the Estimates. It, therefore, seemed to us that the business of this branch naturally separated itself into the two divisions which we have recommended should be established—namely, the Chief Accountant's and the Chief Auditor's branches. Lord De Grey immediately accepted our recommendation, and it would be still more satisfactory to him if the audit duties could be entirely removed from the War Office. It is, no doubt, wrong in principle that the same persons should have the power of allowing a payment, and also that of auditing the accounts, and if any arrangement could be devised by which the audit and examination of accounts should be removed from the War Office, I am sure that no one would be more pleased than should we at the office and the Secretary of State himself. That subject was discussed by the Committee, but it appeared that the same documents which are required for the examination of the accounts are afterwards needed for the preparation of those which have to be presented to Parliament, and that therefore it did not seem possible to place the two descriptions of clerks under different roofs, and it would be impossible entirely to separate the audit from the War Office. Another recommendation of the Committee was that a lower class of clerks should be employed in some branches of the Office. Such a suggestion has frequently been made in this House, and I am sure that every one will agree with me that it is one which may with advantage be carried out, at least to a certain extent. In the first place, the effect upon the Office itself will be good. It will diminish the number of temporary clerks; and, as the number of the third class will be reduced in proportion to the number of the upper classes, it will improve the prospects of promotion of clerks who enter the office in future. It will also be of advantage to the army that soldiers should have a prospect of obtaining one of these appointments on their retirement from the service. Hon. Members will see that the Committee have not made any very definite recommendation with reference to the employment of this class of clerks, thinking it better that the principle should be left for gradual introduction as opportunities presented themselves. Some heads of Departments are already employing them. The Director of Stores is gradually increasing the number employed in his branch, and other heads of Departments think that they may be employed with advantage, but it is not a change that they are willing to adopt very rapidly. The best and safest way is to employ one or two at first to find out for what sort of work they are fitted, and gradually to extend the number as may be convenient. The Committee will see that we have recommended that in some branches there should be no establishment clerks—as, for instance, the branch of the Director of Works and the Barrack Department. The work of the latter Department will be done entirely by barrack masters and barrack clerks. Barrack clerks, as the Committee are aware, are all of them men who have been in the army, and therefore the experiment will be pretty extensively tried in that branch; and, if it answers there, there can be no reason why it should not be extended to some other Departments. The only other subject to which I need allude is the dismissal of temporary clerks. I cannot admit that anything has ever happened in the War Office which has given these gentlemen any right to suppose that the conditions upon which they entered the Office had been altered. It is quite true that many of them have been retained for a much longer period than they could possibly have anticipated when they entered the Office; but they must always have had distinctly in view the possibility, not to say the probability, of the termination of their service. That this has been so is shown by the fact that temporary clerks have always used the greatest possible exertions to get themselves placed upon the permanent establishment. It certainly is the fact that in many cases temporary clerks have become permanent; but none of those recently dismissed could have anticipated such a result, because they were too old to be admitted to the establishment. I quite admit that the position of those clerks is very much to be regretted, and that the employment of such a class is a practice which it is not desirable to encourage. The reason why so many temporary clerks have been retained up to this time has been that the authorities at the War Office have never since its reorganization been convinced that alterations such as those now recommended might not be necessary; and therefore it has not been thought desirable to increase to the full requirements of the Department the establishment the reduction of which would necessarily be attended with more difficulties than would that of the number of temporary clerks. The hon. Baronet inquires whether it is intended to continue the system of employing temporary clerks. Now, as I have stated already, we hope the effect of the recommendations which we have made will be to enable us to reduce in many cases the number of clerks employed, and it would therefore be unwise to diminish the number of those we have a right to dismiss without burdening the country with pensions. I cannot, I may add, admit that those clerks have been treated harshly, because, not only have the terms been kept with them under which they entered the public service, but they have received a larger amount of gratuity than that to which they were absolutely entitled under the terms on which they entered the Office. I very much regret that they should be thrown on the world without any certain means of subsistence; but it nevertheless appears to me to be perfectly clear that if a man makes a bargain with the State he can have no just cause of complaint if that bargain be kept. If it is not open to the Government to act upon the engagements into which they enter under those circumstances, I cannot see what is the object of making temporary engagements at all. The hon. Baronet says that these men have been dismissed solely for the purpose of trying an experiment; and it certainly is an experiment to this extent, that we propose to try something which is novel; but I do not know to what passage in the Report of the Committee he refers when he speaks in those terms. All their recommendations have been carefully considered, and our intention is that the arrangement to which he alludes shall be a permanent one. There are some other points which have been raised in the course of this discussion to which I have omitted to reply, but I think I have alluded to all the prominent topics which have been mentioned. I very much regret that these recommendations should be looked upon unfavourably in the Office. I believe that the clerks very much miscalculated the effect they are likely to produce. I do not believe the effect of the arrangements in question will be to injure the prospects of the clerks in the War Office, but rather to cause promotion in the Office to be distributed more equally and fairly than has hitherto been the case.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I wish to say a few words in reply to one or two questions which have been put by my hon. Friend opposite. My hon. Friend (Sir Stafford Northcote) referring to the Audit Office, asked whether it was proposed that its functions should be extended. Now, as he is aware, a new appointment has been recently made to the chair of that office, and it is the hope and intention of the Government that the jurisdiction of the Board may be extended, and their hands strengthened in the execution of their important duties in the spirit of the recommendations made by the Committee on Public Moneys on the subject. It would be premature to enter into details which are of a highly technical and departmental character. I shall not, therefore, go beyond the general declaration that it is intended to give as much strength as possible to the Audit Office for the performance of its duties, and to make the circle of those duties as wide as possible. My hon. Friend has also asked whether we have any plan in view for the formation of a general copying-office for the purpose of discharging those mechanical duties which are connected with the higher work of the political departments of the State. In replying to that question, I may be allowed to observe that I think my noble Friend has succeeded in showing that no hardship has been inflicted in the particular case which has formed the main subject of this discussion. At the same time I should be disposed to admit that there is unavoidable inconvenience attaching to the system of employing temporary clerks; because if I understand the case which my hon. Friend opposite has sought to make out, it comes to this, that there has been so much anxiety on the part of the War Office to improve the condition of those gentlemen where they could do it, by adopting them into the establishment, and by recognizing claims in some degree outside their position as temporary clerks, that the course now taken is open to objection on the ground that the more kind the authorities were, the more unkind they were, or at least seemed to be. I do not, therefore, hesitate to say that there is great force and justice in the view of my hon. Friend, with regard to the general expediency of establishing a copying-office, in which duties of a mechanical character might be performed. I am not, however, in a position to inform him that we have made any progress towards the execution of that design. No one knows better than my hon. Friend, who has had the greatest experience and has exhibited the greatest zeal in dealing with such questions, what important changes the adoption of a principle of that kind would involve in the present organization of our public departments, and in many privileges and usages which were highly valued, and that it might prove a complete failure in connection with the administration of those departments. It is, in point of fact, only under a very favourable concurrence of circumstances that such a plan could, in my opinion, be carried into effect. In principle I fully and cordially concur with my hon. Friend; in practice I shall be always ready to promote his view to the utmost of my power; but I am unable at present to see any combination of circumstances so favourable as would warrant the Government in stating that they could hold out any prospect of being able to accomplish this result.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he could not clearly understand from the speech of the noble Marquess what it was the Government actually proposed to do, whether they intended to follow the rule laid down by Lord Panmure or not, which rule was to receive recommendations from the heads of each branch of the War Department whenever a vacancy causing promotion occurred, and promote according to merit, but this rule had not been followed even by Lord Panmure himself. A Report of a Committee which had sat on the organization of the War Office had been laid on the table of the House, and the majority had recommended that promotion, as a rule, should go in the separate branches of the Department, but the Commissioners did not agree, and Sir Edward Lugard protested against it. No doubt in the smaller branches there would be some hardship to clerks in it from the lesser chances of promotion, but in the larger this objection would not affect them, and in fact promotion was now separate in the Medical branch, in the Accountant General's branch, and he believed in the Fortification branch. A clerk who was acquainted with the business of his own branch might be quite ignorant of the one to which he was promoted, and as they were at present promoted indifferently the War Department authorities made the promotion, but kept the clerk in his own branch. Thus they had secured several higher class clerks in one department while another was conducted by subordinate officers. This was absurd. Some rule of promotion should be observed, and even were the rule of branch promotion adopted they could retain the power of promoting extraordinary merit and qualification. But the Secretaries of State had often made appointments with singular indifference to the claims of the best candidates. As to the consolidation of the War Office regulations, we had often pressed it on the War Department, but he thought that could be better done by a board of officers than by a person whose experience could furnish him with no qualification for the office. There were several important recommendations on which the noble Lord had not touched. A considerable check upon the expenditure in colonial stations formerly existed in the fact that it was under the control of what were called respective officers, they were the chief ordnance officers on the station, to whom the accounts were submitted previous to their being forwarded to the Government. Their Report as to the expediency of any proposed outlay formed a considerable check on extravagance. A very large number of cash transactions had lately been transferred to the Commissariat, and the Report stated that though the department might be able to perform the duty in time of peace, in time of war it would be impossible that the Commissariat could continue to conduct those transactions which were perfectly inconsistent with their proper duties. The noble Lord had not alluded to this branch of the subject. He hoped, also, he would be able to state what the intentions of the Government were as to Paymasters. Paymasters formerly were elected from officers who had seen service, but recently these positions had been conferred very often upon civilians. He hoped the noble Lord would be able to assure the House that in future paymasterships would be given only to military men, to whom they ought properly to belong. The revision of the different orders and regulations of the army as to finance and discipline was, as he had stated, most desirable. There was now a mass of orders from the time, he believed, of Anne, which had become a confused mass which few could understand. It was known that one order cancelled the other, or part of another, then another re-enacted it, and nothing was more difficult for an officer to know than the rules by which his duty was to be carried on, but to revise these orders into a code required great knowledge and experience. They referred to every possible requirement of an army, as to material and discipline, as to duties on land and on board ship, embarkation of troops, promotion, and every conceivable position of cavalry, infantry, and artillery. One officer, however experienced, would shrink from such a task, and it should have been intrusted to a board from each branch, assisted by an experienced Paymaster and army agent, but this task was committed not even to a soldier but to a civilian, the successful author of a novel. He might be a very respectable gentleman, but clearly the appointment was not made for the benefit of the public service. This attempt at revision or codification of the orders for the army as now made was laughed at by the officers, because it was intrusted to a person who was totally unfit for such a task. He did not know exactly by whom the affairs of the militia were administered, but evidently they were not in good hands, for the militia regiment which he had the honour to command remained unprovided with bedding, money, and a great many other requisites many days after the time appointed by the regulations had elapsed. He thought there ought to be some definite rule with regard to the retirement of barrack masters, who at present were generally appointed late in life, and having no allowance to retire upon remained in the public service till they were much too old for the proper performance of the duties of that office. No rule of retirement, civil or military, applied to these officers, many of whom were distinguished and had served their country faithfully. With regard to the temporary clerks, he thought that it was unfair to treat persons who had spent ten years of their lives in the service of the public in the light of temporary servants. The saving which the noble Marquess expected to effect was apparent, he thought, rather than real, as would appear on a comparison of items in the accounts.

Mr. MALINS said, he was very happy to hear the Chancellor of the Exchequer say what he had done as to the unsatisfactory arrangement with the temporary clerks, for nothing could be more absurd, to say nothing of its injustice, than that they should have two sets of clerks in the public service, performing the same duties, the one class being termed established clerks and the other temporary clerks; though many of the latter class were retained almost for life, while others had served some for twelve years, some for ten, some for eight, and so on down to one year; some of them being between forty and fifty years of age, and having families dependent upon them, and who, believing themselves fixed in their positions, were suddenly thrown upon the world. He had received a letter of complaint that morning from a gentleman thus circumstanced, who was forty-three years of age. All men of experience knew how difficult it was to find occupation for young men of twenty; but in the other case it became almost impossible. The Government contended that these gentlemen had had justice done to them by receiving gratuities of £100 on leaving the service. It was true that they might be beyond the letter of the Superannuation Act, but equitably and morally their claims ought to be fairly considered, and he believed the House would have supported any moderate proposition for meeting the just demands of a number of gentlemen, thirty-two in number, thus circumstanced. He regretted that that system should have been adopted, and he trusted that hereafter those who served the public efficiently would be considered as permanently appointed—thereby avoiding the ridiculous distinction of one set of men being viewed as permanent clerks, and another set of men as temporary clerks, when the services rendered by both were precisely identical.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH, said he agreed in what his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Dunne) had stated with regard to what are called the respective officers, but he did not perceive any intention on the part of the Government to do away with them. They were useful in curtailing expenditure, and he hoped they would not be interfered with or abolished. He agreed with his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Malins) that the temporary clerks were very hardly dealt with. The complaint was not so much that they had been removed, as that the gratuity given to them on their removal was insufficient. The Committee and the noble Marquess appeared to be of opinion that the number of clerks was too large for the service to be performed. A diminution in the number being thus necessary, the question was in what class the reduction ought to be made. It must have been felt that whenever a reduction did take place it would be among the temporary clerks taken on during the Crimean war. The fact was they ought to have been weeded out before now. The noble Marquess did not say that the work at the War Office was well done. If so, and if there were inefficient men, let them be removed. The true remedy was to institute an effective supervision of the staff, to see that no more clerks were employed than were actually required, and to take care that these were efficient and well paid. The work at present was not done with accuracy. There was an error, for example, in page 9 of the Estimates, of £443,000 in the addition of the sum total of the first column, and which it was presumed was prepared in the Office of the Accountant General's Department, and this was in a document laid before the House of Commons. The noble Marquess must be aware that the question of promotion was a difficult one, and it presented only a choice of evils. Some one had recommended that the clerks should be two years in each branch of the Department, but there were no fewer than fifteen branches in the War Office, and it would take a man thirty years to go the round of the whole of them. To promote a man from the medical branch, in which he was efficient, to the works' branch, of which he knew nothing, would be absurd. The best system of promotion was a branch promotion; and then, whatever evils occurred, the men would at least know the work they were called upon to do. If some of the branches were too small, they might be put into groups like Railway Bills before a Committee of the House. Nothing could be more absurd than to advance a man from one department with which he was thoroughly acquainted to fill a vacancy in another department of the details of which he was utterly ignorant. No promotion ought to be made at all if an efficient man could not be obtained in the service to fill the vacancy. The public service was the first thing to be attended to, and promotion to the public servants the next. It was stated that the clerks at the War Office were dissatisfied, and had sent in a representation to the Secretary of State for War. As this was a public document, he confessed he should like to see it, that the House might know what complaints were made. The work of the Department would never be properly done without an efficient supervision. There were 240 clerks in the Department of the Accountant General, and how could they be supervised by one man? The noble Marquess proposed, with a view to economy, to introduce soldiers as clerks in the War Department. This would be very useful under due regulations. No one had a higher opinion of military men than he had, but he advised caution, for the arrangement would be productive of much good or much mischief. If the War Office took the best men from the regiments to employ them as clerks they would cripple the efficiency of the regiments. There was a great want of good orderly clerks and paymaster's clerks—as every one who had the honour of commanding a regiment well knew—and in many cases they could be very ill-spared. But if the War Office gave employment to retired soldiers and pensioners great benefit would be conferred on the service by the encouragement to good conduct which it would produce. With this exception, he should deprecate a large drain from the military service for civil work, and would rather say, "Let the soldier keep to his musket and the clerk to his pen." He hoped that the noble Marquess would re-consider the question of promotion, and that such a plan would be adopted as would do justice to all without outraging the feelings of honourable and worthy men in the service.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, there was another question besides those of promotion and the temporary clerks—namely, whether the attempt which the War Office was making to effect a reform in the Department should meet with obstruction or support in the House. It was clear that the noble Lord at the head of the War Office was anxious to have the work of his Office done in the best possible way. The noble Lord on finding that the existing arrangements of the War Office did not work well, caused an investigation to be made, which resulted in a Report drawn up by competent men. And upon the recommendations contained in such Report the noble Lord acted. It would not be possible in any but a public Department that a large business should be conducted as it was in the War Office. For what was it that was wanted? In the first place, that people who were fitted for the work should be put to do it, and in the second, that they should be properly paid. But the arrangements of the War Office were not calculated to carry either of these principles into effect. Was it not an extraordinary thing that when there was a vacancy in one department there should be a promotion in another? If, for instance, in his own business a man engaged in the selling department were to die or to be removed and he were to put in his place somebody from the book keeper's department it would be thought a very injudicious thing. Well, the War Office did not do exactly that, but they put a man to do higher work, for which he was not paid, and they paid a man in another department for work he did not do. The principle laid down as to promotion was found to be so extraordinary and unbusiness-like that even the heads of the departments in the War Office were themselves often compelled to deviate from it, and did not take persons from one department to fill vacancies in another that was wholly different. With regard to the temporary clerks it was impossible not to feel for them much pity, but the War Office were not to keep persons whom they did not want. Therefore the whole question was whether the gentlemen so employed were entitled to a pension or not. He did not wish to prejudice the Committee against a proposal to grant those clerks a pension should the Government wish to grant it, but it should not be forgotten that the word "temporary" seemed to exclude any right of that kind. The whole question turned upon this—whether they had ever been induced to believe that they had ceased to be temporary clerks. He was inclined to think that they had not, and he had come to that conclusion not merely from having read the Report, but from one or two cases which he had known, in which the persons laboured very hard to get themselves removed from the temporary to the permanent establishment. The thanks of the Committee were due to the noble Lord at the head of the War Department for the exertions he had made to reform it.

MR. ANGERSTEIN said, his object in rising was to prove that the modus operandi in the proposed reformation in the War Department could not be satisfactory because it was not just. The Secretary of State had very properly determined to reduce the number of clerks in the War Office, and he applied to the Treasury to know what they would do. The Treasury, instead of saying that they desired to know who were willing to quit the Office under the Superannuation Act, issued a Minute authorizing the Secretary of State to grant at his discretion to clerks who wished to retire, and who had served twenty years, a bonus calculated on a service of ten years, and to those who had served fifteen, a bonus for seven year's service, and so on in proportion. When that became known, many if not most of the best clerks wished to avail themselves of the terms; and no wonder they did, because the bonus was of such a magnitude as to serve as a premium upon retirement—a thing which was hardly compatible with the good of the public service. The Government were, of course, very unwilling to accept the resignation of their best men, and by some means or other it was made known in the Department that it would be convenient if every officer who did not obtain the approval of his superior should retire. Accordingly, the resignations of many had been sent in and accepted. But with regard to those who had done their duty efficiently the Government would neither accept their resignations nor make their status better by increasing their chances of promotion. It was a painful thing for a man to feel that when he had done his duty he should be refused an advantage which had been given to those whom it was acknowledged had not done so. He trusted that this matter would be re-considered, and that those who were really efficient would obtain better remuneration.

COLONEL GILPIN said, he did not participate in that feeling of gratitude towards the noble Marquess for his endeavours on this question which the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster) said he thought the Committee should experience. Neither did he believe the clerks of the War Office were at all grateful for the treatment they had met with from the Government. There were two portions of the Department to which the Report did not refer—namely, the highest and the lowest. He wished to call the attention of the Committee to the enormous sum of £5,739 for messengers, and the additional item of £992 for boys to do the work for them. That was not quite in accordance with the economy of which so much was heard from the opposite Benches, and which was so rigidly enforced towards the service. For instance, a memorandum had been issued inquiring whether any reduction in the allowance of soft soap for cleaning the harness for field batteries, and which was now fixed at three-quarters of a pound per horse per month, and of one penny per horse per month for veterinary medicines, could be judiciously recommended. When military men saw such petty economy practised in their case, it was no wonder they should look with jealousy at the enormous sums granted for the civil part of the service. He trusted the noble Marquess would look out for old soldiers who for smaller pay would do the work which was now done by boys. It was pretty well known that the great duty of the boys was to do the work for the messengers who were too fat and too lazy to do it.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Dunne) had referred to a great many points incidentally mentioned in the Report as bearing on the administration of the War Office. Into the regulations of the Commissariat and the intended arrangements in the barrack department he would not enter, because they did not affect the administration of the War Office. But the consolidation of the finance regulations did affect it, and on this subject the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Dunne) would have done better to postpone his ridicule until he had seen the consolidation and knew what was its result. As to the statement that no good could be done except by a board of officers, he quite agreed that if new regulations were to be framed for the payment of officers and men, it might be necessary that, if officers were not employed to frame them, they should be consulted on the subject. But here there was no question of framing new regulations; the only thing to be done was to arrange and modify regulations already in existence, so that they might be easily understood by all who might refer to them. On a former occasion he had stated the reasons which led the Government to think that this consolidation would be better done by a civilian accustomed to such work than by any officer, and he felt convinced that the army would not follow the example of the hon. and gallant Member, and prematurely ridicule a work which they had not yet had an opportunity of seeing. As to the remarks of the hon. Member (Mr. Angerstein), the proposal of the Treasury was by no means a general invitation to the gentlemen in the War Office to retire upon certain terms; it was simply an intimation that as a reduction had to be made in the establishment, the authorities would be prepared to entertain applications for retirement by such gentlemen as might be recommended by the Secretary of State. It was quite obvious that those applications could only be entertained to a limited extent. Earl de Grey was quite aware that the task of selection would be a difficult and a delicate one, and he therefore appointed a sub-committee of officials in the War Office to consider whose services might be best dispensed with, and whose services it would be impossible conveniently to dispense with. This committee went carefully into the subject, and in every case their recommendations were carried out; so that there was no exercise of private influence, and, so far as he could see, no hardship or injustice had been done. Some remarks had been made as to the number of messengers in the War Office. The attention of Earl de Grey had been called to the subject, and the result was that no new messengers had been appointed, and it might be found possible, in the course of time, to make some further reduction. It was an error to suppose that the boys in the office were kept to do the messengers' work; these boys were in reality employed in carrying papers from one part of the office to the other, which did not form part of the messengers' work.

COLONEL DUNNE disclaimed any feeling of hostility towards, or any wish to cast ridicule upon, the gentleman employed to consolidate these regulations, but he believed the feeling of the army to be, that that gentleman was not qualified for the work which required a knowledge of military details only possessed by officers.

(4.) £698,195, Half Pay, &c.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he was happy to see a reduction in the dead weight amounting to nearly £30,000 in the pay to reserve officers; but there was so much the greater reason that some consideration should be shown to those officers whose case had been so often brought before the House, and especially the reserve captains on the F G list. The Committee appointed to consider the question of naval retirement could not enter into the grievances of these officers, because they involved a money question which had not been submitted to the Committee. These captains were removed from the active to the reserved list when the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Francis Baring) was First Lord of the Admiralty. Certain officers had served with considerable distinction, and as they were getting old they were offered the retirement which then existed for officers of that rank. They declined that offer, and refused to accept the retirement, but the First Lord was determined to remove them from the list, and he caused a reserved list to be framed. Having declined to accept the retirement, they were persuaded to go upon the list thus created, believing that by this removal they continued to enjoy all the advantages accruing to officers on the active list, except that they would not receive the same amount of employment. They received Commissions like officers on the active list, and not similar to the Commission of retired officers, and they believed, and were assured, that they would lose nothing by accepting promotion on the reserved list. This impression of theirs received some corroboration from what occurred at the time of the Russian war, when many of them applied for employment, for Sir James Graham did not decline their services upon the ground that they were on a list which incapacitated them from serving, but because their services would not be required, as there was no probability of a great naval war with Russia. No doubt, there was considerable advantage at the time in removing these officers from the active list, as room was thus made for promotion, but there was also considerable hardship in the fact that in accepting the reserve list they were not aware that they were accepting a retirement. He would suggest that a small boon should be granted to them, and that they should be allowed, rising pari passu with captains on the active list, the same additional pay of 2s. a day as officers on the active list became entitled to; and that they should also be entitled at the proper time to their reserved flag. Considering that the country received in the present year £30,000 from the diminution of the list, and that an expenditure of about £5,000 a year for a very short time was all which the adoption of his suggestion would entail, he thought that the Government would do well to consider the proposal. He was aware that the matter had often been discussed in Parliament; and that the Law Officers of the Crown had decided that these gallant officers had not the right which they had imagined they possessed; but, considering their age and services, it seemed very hard to withhold from them that to which they seemed to have a reasonable claim, and he trusted that their case would receive further and favourable consideration.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the hon. and gallant Gentleman had often brought the case of these gallant officers before the House, and had urged that they ought to be allowed to rise pari passu with officers on the active list. The right hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir Francis Baring) was, the First Lord of the Admiralty when the Order in Council, having reference to the officers in question, was issued, and that right hon. Gentleman had often stated that he never had the intention of giving them the same advantages as officers on the active list. These officers were commanders, and they were promoted from commanders to captains on the reserved list, receiving the lowest rate of captains' half pay. He could not concur in the statement that these officers had accepted their promotion with the understanding that they were to rise pari passu with the active list, and receive the higher rates of pay attached to that list. The question was, whether it would be a sound and just measure to allow officers promoted to the reserved list, and whose services the public thereby lost (as it was a clear understanding with them that, unless on some great emergency, they never would be called on to serve), to rise pari passu with officers in the active list, who were liable to be called on to serve. He did not conceive that there could be a difference of opinion on the subject. It would be perfectly unjust and disadvantageous to the navy if officers were to be told that they might, if they chose, go on the reserved list, and that then they should have exactly the same pay as officers likely to be called on to serve. The Law Officers of the Crown had given their opinion that there really was no case in favour of the claim made on the part of these officers. Their case was brought under the consideration of a Committee of that House two years ago, and the feeling of the Committee was in favour of granting them any boon that could possibly be conceded, and the Government, in consequence, decided that their services should count towards increased pay under the terms of the Order in Council which granted increased pay for length of services; so that those officers not only received their 10s. 6d. a day, but also increased pay according to length of service. The suggestion of the hon. and gallant Member for Wakefield (Sir John Hay) would, if acted on, cause many of the officers to be losers, because there were many now receiving 4s. a day in addition to the pay they would have been entitled to had they remained on the active list of captains. There were seventeen of these officers who received considerably higher pay than captains on the active list. There was one officer receiving 16s. 6d. a day, who if he had gone on pari passu with the active list would have now been receiving 14s. 6d.; and there were several receiving 14s. 6d., 15s. 6d., and 15s. 9d., who if they had remained on the active list would only have been receiving 12s. 6d. He could not, therefore, hold out any hopes that the Government would be prepared to ask the House to extend any further boon to those officers.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT had learnt with considerable regret, from the speech of the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty, the continued indisposition of the Board of Admiralty to meet the claims advanced in their memorial by the reserved captains of the Navy. At the same time, he frankly admitted that when the right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth, in the year 1851, at that time presiding at the Board, drew up the Minute offering retirement to these officers agreeably to that Minute, he had done so in the full belief that it did not lay open to any misunderstanding. He, however, contended an amount of ambiguity was apparent which justified these officers in arriving at a different impression, and certainly a subsequent Board of Admiralty had thought so, or they would not have consented to the submitting this memorial of these captains for the legal opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown; in equal fairness he admitted that opinion had been against their claims. Still, when submitted to the House of Commons, the Committee appointed by the House to investigate them had recommended a favourable consideration might be extended in their favour, and agreeably as had been said by the noble Lord, inasmuch as some increase in their half-pay had been granted in their behalf. And he further added that those of them who had served long and faithfully had had proper consideration allowed to them; but he (Admiral Walcott) maintained that meritorious officers had shown themselves anxious for active service, but had unfortunately failed to obtain it from the want of Parliamentary or political influence, were equally deserving of the favourable consideration of the Government and the nation. He had had personal communication with several of these captains, and they had assured him on their honour that when they accepted the offer of retirement contained in the Minute they had done so in the full and firm belief that they, though set aside from active service, where by it insured to rise in rank and increase of pay similarly with captains on the active list, according to seniority. He had advocated the claims of these officers on former occasions, because he had believed it to be just, and he still retained this strong opinion. If the Government looked to the officers, whether of the army or the navy, to perform meritorious services to their country, it was incumbent on it to deal out a meed of justice to them all, and in doing so he believed it would be applauded by the nation. He, therefore, regretted the decision at which the Government had arrived in this matter, and feared it would cause great dissatisfaction in the service.

METROPOLIS SEWAGE AND ESSEX RECLAMATION BILL—(by Order).

CONSIDERATION.

Bill further considered.

SIR WILLIAM RUSSELL moved that the following clause be added to the Bill:—

“Article 15 of the said agreement scheduled to this Act is hereby annulled; and if the main culverts are not completed in the manner defined in Article 8 of the said agreement, within the time prescribed in that behalf by this Act, then, notwithstanding anything in the said agreement or in this Act, the concession made by the said agreement shall at the expiration of that time absolutely cease and determine; and Article 25 of the said agreement scheduled to this Act is altered by extending the power of the Board to inspect the vouchers to the books of account therein mentioned.”

He thought the clause would meet the objections that were raised to the passing of the Bill before the Easter recess.

MR. AYRTON said, that this clause was intended to carry out what was understood to be the wishes of all parties—namely, that in the event of the promoters of this scheme not being able to complete it within the time allowed by Parliament they should have no claim upon the rate-payers for indemnity, and they should proceed upon the merits of the scheme and at their own risk. The clause also provided that the Metropolitan Board should have full liberty to inspect the books and papers of the promoters. With this additional clause he did not think the Bill was further objectionable.

EXHIBITION OF REFORMATORY CHILDREN.

QUESTION.

MR. TAVERNER MILLER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a proposed Exhibition of Reformatory Children, to be held at the Agricultural Hall, Islington, from the 19th to the 25th May next, and whether it meets with his sanction and approbation? He might, perhaps, be allowed to add that the children had all been criminal offenders.

SIR GEORGE GREY, in reply, said, his attention had not been drawn to this subject, nor had he heard of any intention to hold such an exhibition till yesterday, when the hon. Gentleman was good enough to inform him of the Notice he had placed on the paper, in order that his attention might be called to it. This morning, however, he had received by post a printed paper, stating that the exhibition, about to take place, was an exhibition of the products of the industry of children in Reformatories, and that on a certain day one thousand of the children would perform certain pieces of music, such as the Morning and Evening Hymn. He certainly entirely agreed with what he understood to be the feeling of the hon. Gentleman, that it was most inexpedient that children who had been convicted of crime and sent to Reformatories should be made a public exhibition of in this manner. He had, therefore, sent to Mr. Turner, the Inspector of Reformatories, to know whether he was aware of the intention to hold such an exhibition. He had not been able himself to see Mr. Turner, but he understood from him that no child who was an inmate of any Government Reformatory would be present—the children proposed to be present at the exhibition were wholly unconnected with Reformatories certified by the Government or receiving any grant from Government.

MR. TAVERNER MILLER said, that it had been announced that two hundred children would be present from the Middlesex Industrial School.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that was not a certified Reformatory. It existed under an Act which there was a Bill now before Parliament to amend; but it was not a certified Reformatory, and received nothing from the Government.

OBSOLETE ACTS OF PARLIAMENT. QUESTION.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would beg to ask Mr. Attorney General, When he intends to bring in a Bill to repeal Obsolete Acts of Parliament in continuation of the Act of 1863?

MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL said, in reply, that the Bill was in preparation. He could not state positively that it would be introduced during the present Session, because accuracy in such a matter was of primary importance; but he had every reason to hope that he should be able to introduce it.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL—[BILL 118.]

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. CHILDERS said, he rose to ask leave to bring in a Bill to provide for the better government of Greenwich Hospital, and the more beneficial application of the revenues thereof. Towards the end of last Session, in a debate raised by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Wakefield (Sir John Hay), he had stated in general terms what were the views of the Government with respect to the future management of the Hospital and the application of its revenues. In a few words the position of the Hospital at that time was this—it was enjoying an income of £154,000 per annum, and the expenditure in connection with it was about £134,000, so that there was a surplus, real or apparent, of about £20,000. He said "real or apparent," because the real surplus was not so large; a portion of the income was only of a temporary nature, and provision was made for investing it. He stated the expenditure of the Hospital in connection with seamen and marines at £107,700, or £70 per head. He said that the Commissioners, in their Report, had stated that an endeavour should be made to increase the numbers in the Hospital from 1,600 to 2,300; but, in spite of every endeavour to increase the number by additional gratuities, additional advantages to married men, additional comforts in the Hospital and otherwise, instead of an increase, when he spoke in the beginning of June last year, there were only 1,508 inmates. He stated that the Admiralty had very carefully considered the whole subject, and the evidence taken by the Commission; and, having in view the opinion indicated by the Commissioners themselves—in the event of their plan to attract more men into the Hospital failing — the Government had come to the conclusion that, instead of endeavouring to attract a larger number of seamen into Greenwich Hospital by additional gratuities and the greater comforts that might be given to them, and thus only making more expensive an institution which, however suited to a past age, was of a quasi-monastic character, and not so well adapted to the exigencies of the present time, it would be better to ascertain whether the very large funds at the disposal of the Hospital might not be expended in a manner better calculated to meet the wants of the old sailors to whom those funds belonged. He stated, with reference to the recommendations of the Commission, and the notorious evils of the double government of the Hospital, that the Government had taken up the question as a whole, and as they were proposing to make a very great change with respect to the admission of seamen into the Hospital, the whole management should be treated de novo, and established on a more satisfactory basis. It was then proposed to limit the admission to infirm and helpless seamen, and to pensioners who require medical assistance of a temporary character, making the Hospital serve for pensioners as Haslar did for seamen in the service, as well as an asylum when they were unable to take care of themselves. The number estimated to be provided for would be thus reduced to 600 seamen and marines. They then proposed to apply the large and increased funds at the disposal of the Hospital to increasing the out-pensions of seamen after certain ages, and giving additional retirements to officers. The government of the Hospital should henceforth be under the same system that prevailed at Haslar; and the management of the Hospital revenues would be entirely distinct from that of the expenditure. With respect to the officers and clerks employed, the Government proposed to compensate them liberally. A great variety of details were involved, but he had promised that during the recess a joint Committee of the Treasury and Admiralty would be appointed, and that he hoped at an early period in the present Session a measure would be proposed to carry the scheme into effect. The Admiralty had complied literally with the engagement he then made. In the first instance, they had altered the regulations with regard to admissions to the Hospital, limiting them to wounded and maimed or infirm and helpless seamen and marines, and those who were in want of medical assistance. Later in the year a joint Committee of the Treasury and Admiralty was appointed, consisting of Mr. Hamilton, Assistant Secretary to the Treasury, Sir Richard Bromley, and himself; and though the serious illness of Sir Richard Bromley had caused some delay, they had made a Report in February which had been carefully considered by the two Departments, and the measure he now asked leave to introduce was founded on that Report. He need not say that that Committee did not inquire into, nor were they responsible for, the general features of the scheme. The principles had been laid down for them in the Admiralty Minute, in which the Treasury concurred. He would lay on the table all the papers on the subject, which would show what difficulties had been experienced with respect to some of the details; as to which, however, nothing would be kept from the House. He would now state to the House what they proposed to do with respect to the management of the income of Greenwich Hospital. That income was now about £154,000 a year, and it arose first from the interest on certain invested moneys; next from a grant of £20,000 from the Consolidated Fund in lieu of the old deductions from merchant seamen's wages called seamen's sixpences; and lastly from rents of estates in the North and in the neighbourhood of Greenwich amounting to about £40,000 a year. The Government proposed that the management of this income should be kept perfectly distinct from that of the expenditure of the Hospital, and should be placed under the guardianship of that House. The entire expenditure connected with Greenwich Hospital would appear in the Estimates, so that the House of Commons would have complete control over it. With respect to the income, they had considered it most necessary to provide that, under no circumstances, should the income of Greenwich Hospital be regarded as part of the general revenue of the country. That income was applicable to certain specified purposes which had been defined by law, and would continue to be so applied; and although the House would be able to object to any part of its expenditure, it should not have the power of applying the income to other purposes. At the same time, it was rather difficult satisfactorily to constitute a department for the management of this income. To retain three Commissioners, a Secretary, and Treasurer, with all their paraphernalia, would be absurd, nor would it be proper to leave to a single Commissioner the entire management of estates of such magnitude. It had been, indeed, proposed to associate unpaid Commissioners with a paid officer, but the experience of boards so composed was not favourable. What the Government proposed was that an officer should be appointed by law, to be called "The Controller of the Greenwich Hospital Estate," and that the estates themselves should be vested in the Board of Admiralty, and should be managed by this Officer, who would be placed under its direction. By this means they anticipated that they would obtain, on the one hand, economical management, for he need not say that the department which would be required would be a very small one; and, on the other, complete security that the estates should be kept altogether separate from other public estates of the country by being vested in a body specially responsible for the affairs of the navy. Passing from the management of the income, what they proposed as to the expenditure was, that in the first instance the whole expenditure on account of Greenwich—that was, on account of the Establishment at Greenwich itself, and the out-pensions and retirements, which would be a charge upon the Greenwich Estate—should be provided by a Vote of Parliament, and that the arrangements as to pensions and the Establishment at Greenwich should be subject to Orders in Council, in the same way that other arrangements under the direction of the Admiralty were subject to such Orders; that the income of Greenwich should be carried to a separate account in the books of the Paymaster General, and that at the end of the year, when the actual expenditure on account of these services had been ascertained and certified by the Commissioners of Audit, that amount should be transferred to the credit of the Consolidated Fund from the Greenwich Hospital account, so that if there was a balance in favour of that account the balance might be invested for its benefit; and if, unfortunately, there was a balance against it, the deficiency should be made up out of the capital. In that way the account of the income and expenditure of Greenwich Hospital would be kept entirely separate from that of the other income and expenditure of the country; and that House would have entire control over every shilling expended in connection with Greenwich. They also proposed very largely to extend the functions of the Commissioners of Audit. At present the details of the landed income were not audited by those Commissioners. It was proposed by this Bill to impose upon them the duty of auditing both the income and expenditure of the Hospital; the former being audited in the same way as the income of the Crown estates, and the latter like any other naval charges. The amount of the income, as estimated by the Commissioners for the present year, was £154,600. The Bill proposed that in the first place this should be devoted to the maintenance at Greenwich of a Hospital and Infirmary, providing for the accommodation of 600 seamen. A detailed estimate of that expenditure had been prepared, and it showed that the amount required for that purpose, including gratuities and all expenses of management, would be about £45,000 a year. The Schools would be maintained as at present. They now cost £22,000 a year, and the future expenditure had been estimated at £23,000, making a local expenditure at Greenwich of £68,000. It was next proposed to grant special additional out-pensions, to be called "Greenwich out-pensions," to all out-pensioners exceeding a certain age, according to a scale which he would describe to the House. The pensioners at present varied in age from about forty to about eighty years of age. The Government proposed to take fifty-five as the age at which pensioners should be entitled to some additional boon, and to provide that, at that age, an additional pension of 5*d.* a day should be granted to them, provided that they had been on the list for five years. At seventy they proposed that the pensioner should receive 9*d.* additional instead of 5*d.*, but that this addition should be given to those only who had been on the pension list for ten years. The total number of out-pensioners, according to a Return which the Admiralty received from the War Office at Christmas last, was 11,909. Of these there were over seventy years of age, who had enjoyed their pensions for more than ten years, 1,352, and over fifty-five years of age, who had been in the receipt of pensions for five years, about 2,965; so that the number of out-pensioners who would receive the additional

Greenwich out-pensions would be 4,317. To that must be added a sufficient allowance for those who, under the present system, were in-pensioners of Greenwich. There were at present in Greenwich Hospital 356 men over seventy, and 429 over fifty-five years of age, who would be out-pensioners if they chose to leave the Hospital. Altogether, they calculated that provision should be made for 5,000 out-pensioners, at a cost of about £48,000. In addition it was necessary to make a fair provision for the loss which the officers of the navy would sustain from the change in the arrangements. He was aware that he was here treading upon disputed ground. The members of the Commission rather tended to the opinion that the funds of Greenwich Hospital were intended solely for the benefit of seamen, and that it was unjust to apply any part of them to the relief of officers. The Admiralty did not entertain that view, and they therefore proposed that fair consideration should be given to officers as well as to seamen. There were at present out-pensions to officers—called “out-pensions of Greenwich Hospital,” formerly chargeable on the Hospital funds—payable to ten captains, fifteen commanders, fifty lieutenants, and fifteen masters, in all ninety. They proposed to add to these, pensions to six captains, nine commanders, thirty lieutenants, and five masters. They also thought that it would be fair, considering what other ranks would lose by the change, to add fifteen pay-masters and nine warrant officers. This, altogether, would give out-pensions to seventy-eight additional officers, at a cost of £3,990, and they proposed to charge these on the Hospital funds. In addition to that they proposed to make the following arrangement with reference to flag officers. At present flag officers were in receipt of considerable advantages from Greenwich Hospital. The Governor and Deputy Governor were distinguished Admirals, and he need not say anything of the great merits of those very distinguished officers. If Greenwich was to be managed like a hospital there would be no necessity for having these officers, and they proposed to make the following arrangements. There was a list of reserved flag officers called the “A” list, upon which no officer was placed unless he was seventy years of age or had received some great injury in the service. These officers were in receipt of an extra good service pension of £150 in addition to their half-pay. It was proposed to increase the present number by six. On the other hand, whilst making this addition to the “A” list, it was proposed to reduce the “active list” by six flag officers. There was also attached to the “A” list, and in one sense forming part of it, the reserved flag list of Greenwich Hospital, which contained at present four names. As vacancies occurred in this list it was intended to add to the “A” list, so that in the end that list would consist of twenty instead of ten. The addition, however, of the six would be spread over three years—that is, two a year; and the reduction of the active list would be of four Rear Admirals, one Vice Admiral, and one Admiral, beginning with the Rear Admirals. The whole plan would make provision as follows—for flag officers £1,500 a year; for 78 officers, in the shape of out pensions, £3,990; and for 5,000 seamen in a similar manner. £48,000. It was also their duty to make an equitable arrangement between the Treasury and Greenwich Hospital, because, as the House was probably aware, a sailor, on entering the Hospital, resigned his out-pension so that from the entry of each sailor into the Hospital the Treasury received a certain advantage. They now proposed, therefore, that the Treasury should receive out of the funds of the Hospital £15 a head for the number of inmates falling short of an average of 1,400, so that when the numbers were ultimately reduced to 600, the credit to the Treasury would amount to £12,000. This would act as a set-off against the £20,000 which the Hospital received from the Treasury. With respect to the widows' gratuities, they proposed to continue the present system, under which the widows of seamen drowned or killed in Her Majesty's service were entitled to gratuities from the Greenwich estate; but instead of setting aside a fixed sum to form a fund, those gratuities would be paid out of the Votes by Parliament, but charged in the same way as other charges in the settlement of the account with Greenwich Hospital. The result of these charges would leave a surplus on the total income of the Hospital, amounting to £154,000, of something over £13,000 a year, which would be left for accumulation in precisely the same way that the funds of Greenwich Hospital were at present left to accumulate. He must point out to the House that during the first two years of the new system they did not anticipate that the number of men in the Hospital would be reduced to the 600 for which provision was made, as the ultimate establishment. In order to meet this, they proposed the first year to limit the number of extra out-pensions to seamen to 3,000, and in the second to 4,000, bringing the number to the maximum of 5,000 in the third year. In the same way they proposed that only two of the six additional flag officers' out-pensions, and twenty-six of the additional officers' out-pensions should be granted the first year, similar additions being made in each of the two following years. The anticipated saving from this arrangement would, in the first year, amount to nearly £30,000, and in the second to nearly £15,000, and as the whole expenditure of the Hospital would be £45,000, he thought that would be a quite sufficient sum to provide for the gradual reduction of the seamen in the establishment. There could, he believed, be no doubt that the reduction would take place very rapidly. He had watched very carefully the change which had been effected by the regulation of last year. When he addressed the House in June 1864, upon this subject there were over 1,500 pensioners in the Hospital, but the number was now about 100 less. That change had been effected merely by restricting the admission to infirm and helpless seamen, and he had no doubt that the increased out-pension would bring about a far more rapid reduction. He also proposed under this Bill to give power by Order in Council to the Admiralty to grant to those now in the Hospital who might elect to leave not only the amount of the new out-pensions, but also something in addition, not to exceed the amount of the money gratuity they receive in the establishment, with respect to the future numbers. The total number of infirm and helpless men in the Hospital was now something under 450; and he did not expect that, under ordinary circumstances, 600 would ever be exceeded. He might add that they proposed leaving the Commissioners and the military officers in the enjoyment of precisely the amount of salary and emolument which they now received. He believed that it would be unadvisable to swell the superannuation list for this purpose, and they therefore proposed to purchase at the Government Annuity Office, out of the capital fund of the Hospital, annuities equal in value to the amount of the salaries paid to those officers, including of course the value of their residences, and other allowances. The Governor and the

Lieutenant Governor would both have the option of leaving the Hospital on these terms, or of remaining in the enjoyment of their titles and of the residences in which they at present dwelt. The compensation would be made by the investment in annuities of about £170,000 or £180,000 out of the capital stock of the Hospital, which amounted altogether to nearly £3,000,000. With respect to the clerks, many would continue to be employed, either at Greenwich or elsewhere, and provision would be made for the superannuation of the rest. He had now gone through the general features of the measure. Some of these arrangements would be provided for in the Bill, others were within the competence of the Admiralty. The Bill provided for the management of the income of the Hospital; it gave power to the Queen in Council to make the necessary orders with respect to the establishment and to the additional pensions to officers and men; it charged those pensions on the Hospital funds, but provided that they must first be voted by Parliament. It also provided for the auditing of the accounts. He believed that the proposal which he had detailed to the House would be regarded by the service as advantageous. If the House would consider the general effect of the measure—that, instead of the advantages of the Hospital being confined to 1,400 men, their enjoyment would be extended to 6,000, he believed that the proposed alterations would generally be deemed satisfactory, and suitable to the present condition of affairs. As they had striven for the attainment of only one object—the best application of the funds to the purposes for which they were intended, he hoped that the measure would be received by both sides of the House with the favourable consideration which had been exhibited on a former occasion. The hon. Gentleman then moved for leave to introduce the Bill.

Moved, That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide for the better government of Greenwich Hospital and the more beneficial application of the Revenues thereof. —(Mr. Childers.)

MR. LYGON said, that with a great deal of what had fallen from the hon. Gentleman every body must agree. Having himself had an opportunity some time since of examining into the affairs of Greenwich Hospital, he had arrived at the conclusion that in order to effect the most good with the funds at the disposal of the Hospital a larger number of out-pensions should be granted. Circumstances and habits had greatly changed since the time when the Hospital was first established, and pensioners were able to obtain a greater amount of comfort in their own homes than they could obtain at the same cost in the Hospital. He had listened with some anxiety to the statement of the hon. Gentleman in order to obtain some information upon two points. He was desirous to know what the duties of the Controller of Greenwich Hospital were to be, for if it was intended to make the establishment merely a Department of the Admiralty, and that the administration of its affairs was to be yearly considered by Parliament, he thought that was a subject upon which much difference of opinion might be expected. He also wished to know what was to be the ultimate destination of the magnificent building at Greenwich. It was proposed to retain only 600 pensioners there, and he wanted to know how the remaining accommodation, which was sufficient for 2,000, was to be employed. He thought it would be a useful application of the surplus accommodation to provide naval barracks, which were much wanted, and by so doing set Haslar free.

MR. LIDDELL said, that representing the landed property which formed the bulk of the Hospital estate, he felt a great interest in this subject, and was glad to be able to express his approval of much that had fallen from the hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers). At the same time, while approving generally of the scheme, he must guard himself against approving all the complicated details until he had an opportunity of considering the Bill. As to the future use to be made of the buildings at Greenwich they must not overlook the possibility of a future naval war, when a necessity for extra accommodation for wounded seamen would arise. It would therefore be necessary to keep many of the wards in a state of preparation for such contingency. With regard to the present surplus of the Hospital funds the amount of £11,000 a year did not exactly represent the real amount, as £2,000 was expended for insurances, and the remainder was funded to meet the contingency of an exhaustion of the minerals upon the Hospital estates. He understood that the future surplus under the proposed scheme would be only £13,000. The margin of £2,000 between the two surpluses seemed to be rather a narrow one to provide for the increased accommodation that would be required in case of our being engaged in a naval war. With regard to the very large extra amount of allowances which it was intended to bestow upon officers under the new scheme, he thought they were entitled to participate in its advantages, but it did not appear to him to be just that the State should profit by throwing upon the revenues of the Hospital any greater amount of retiring allowances than the officers would have been entitled to had the institution been kept up in its entirety.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he wished to give his general concurrence to the scheme, but he agreed with some of the remarks of his hon. Friend the Member for Northumberland (Mr. Liddell). It seemed to him that the Treasury should not be relieved to the extent of £14,000 a year out of the £20,000 now paid by the country towards the maintenance of the Hospital. That would be appropriating charity money to State purposes, which he thought the House would not sanction. He thought the reduction in the flag list of officers was in the right direction, but he did not think that the cost should be paid out of the Hospital revenues. The sum to be paid back into the Treasury ought, in his opinion, to be funded in order to meet the possible increase of accommodation that might be required for wounded seamen in time of war. All these, and other points which had been referred to, were matters of detail, and could be better considered at a future stage of the Bill. He was glad to find that the monastic seclusion to which seamen had been condemned in Greenwich Hospital would be done away with, and that they would be allowed to enjoy their pensions at their own homes.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he thought it would be convenient to defer any explanation of details until the Bill had been printed. He would only observe in answer to the question that had been asked about the disposal of the building at Greenwich, after the reduction in the number of inmates, that, as had been remarked by another hon. Member, in case of a naval war additional hospital accommodation would be needed, and the building would be reserved for that purpose. The hon. and gallant Officer opposite (Sir John Hay) seemed to think that the revenues of Greenwich Hospital were to be saddled with allowances to flag officers, but what was intended was to grant a certain number of out-pensions from the Hospital funds, and the officers would receive their half-pay as before. There would be a certain reduction in the active flag list and an increase in the reserved flag list on half-pay.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT said, he had not risen to offer any opposition to the first reading of the Bill, indeed he should have thought any such intention unseemly—he, however, though abstaining from entering into the details of the measure, which had been with such clearness and succinctness set forth by the hon. Member (Mr. Childers), could not refrain from expressing the surprise and regret he felt at the proposition for displacing the Governor and Lieutenant Governor from the positions they now held. The position of these officers, in his opinion, added greatly to the comfort and advantage of the Pensioners and the general resources of the Asylum. The inmates had immemorially been accustomed to regard these officers with reverence, either in having gallantly led them into action or from having been disabled or maimed like themselves in their country's service, and to maintain discipline and ensure the efficiency of the Institution. He would further observe the public had always associated these officers with the names of distinguished and successful Naval Commanders. He therefore trusted this matter would be re-considered before the Bill was submitted for a second reading.

MR. CHILDERS said, that those officers were expressly excepted; that they were to have the option of remaining where they were, and that that exception was mentioned in the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to provide for the better Government of Greenwich Hospital, and the more beneficial application of the Revenues thereof, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHILDERS, Lord CLARENCE PAGET, and Mr. ADAM.

Bill presented, and read 1st. [Bill 113.]

UNION BENEFICES ACT AMENDMENT.

LEAVE.—BILL ORDERED.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE moved for leave to introduce this Bill. He said that on a former occasion he had made a statement as to its objects, but as, unfortunately, there were an insufficient number of Members present he was not then successful in obtaining leave. It would, therefore, be unnecessary for him now to do more than make the Motion of which he had given notice.

Moved, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend an Act passed in the twenty-third and twenty-fourth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, intituled 'An Act to make better provision for the Union of contiguous Benefices in Cities, Towns, and Boroughs.'"

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he had no wish to oppose the introduction of the Bill, but, as a friend of Archdeacon Hale, and on his authority, he wished to state that what was said of him on a previous occasion—that he was obstinately opposed to the clearly expressed wish of the Legislature as to these benefices—was an entire mistake. The facts were these. A scheme had been submitted to and approved by the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's for the taking down of St. Benet's Church, and the sale of its site by tender. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners, when the scheme came before them, altered it so that the sale was to be effected by public auction. Archdeacon Hale would doubtless have preferred that it should not have been taken down at all; but, at any rate, he did not consider that the sale of a church by public auction was a becoming thing, and he objected to that part of the scheme, but he had no intention whatever of setting himself against the declared will of the Legislature, and of the other bodies whose consent had been gained. Instead of altering the scheme and removing this objection, the right hon. Gentleman thereupon introduced a Bill for dispensing entirely with Archdeacon Hale's consent, thus not only placing the Archdeacon in an unfair position, but doing away entirely with one of the securities provided by the original Act. Before leave was given to introduce the Bill he should like to hear from the right hon. Gentleman whether it contained any provision for the sale of the church by public auction, and also whether it contained a provision for dispensing with Archdeacon Hale's consent.

MR. LYALL said, he had no doubt that this Bill was introduced with the best intentions towards the Church, but he did not look with much favour on a piecemeal legislation such as this to provide for the scruples of one individual. If the right hon. Gentleman wished to amend the scheme of 1860 he ought to bring forward a general amending Bill. The Act of 1860 put many persons in a very uncomfortable position. For instance, the consent of the rectors of these churches was to be asked for the sale of their graveyards, but the rectors naturally objected to consent to the sale of the graves of people over whom they had been appointed guardians, and to give an opportunity of erecting a public-house on the site of those graves. When the original Act was passed, it was generally recognized that it was not likely to be very effective, considering how many consents were required, and if any interference of the Legislature were needed the right hon. Gentleman should have introduced a general amending Bill. It was throwing too much responsibility on the clergy in many cases to ask their consent, and if public policy required the sale of a church it ought to be done by a compulsory enactment decided on by Parliament not by a permissive one.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he had to complain that the right hon. Gentleman had not explained what the provisions of the Bill were. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie) could have but little confidence in his Bill when he sought to introduce it almost by taking the House by surprise, and without giving any information at all respecting it. He supposed, however, that it might be taken for granted that it was directed against a particular ecclesiastical dignitary. When the original Bill was passed numerous safeguards were provided; but when, for the first time, the conscientious scruples of one man came into play, a Bill was introduced pro hac vice to do away with him altogether. Certainly, they ought to have some explanation of the character of the measure.

MR. HUBBARD said, he thought that when a Bill was brought forward which would act as a Bill of Pains and Penalties to a dignitary of the Church its unusual character alone required something more than a cursory statement like that of the right hon. Gentleman on the other evening to induce the House to permit its introduction. Since then there had been placed on the table of the House the correspondence on the subject with the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and others concerned in the matters at issue, and those documents were an entire and complete justification of the course which he (Mr. Hubbard) had taken on a former occasion. One of the points for which the House had expressly provided had arisen. The House determined that as the Archdeacon was the person specially authorized and empowered by his office to protect the fabrics of the Church, his consent should be requisite upon the proposed removal of any of them, as well as that of the other authorities. The correspondence on the table showed that it had been arranged by the Bishops' Commissioners that on the union of the parishes mentioned in this Bill the church of St. Benet, Gracechurch Street, should be sold by tender; but the scheme was afterwards altered by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, so as to sell the materials by public auction. It was to this that Archdeacon Hale took objection, and in doing so did the very duty put on him by the Act of Parliament. It was certainly a queer thing that because a man did the duty for which he was expressly inserted in an Act of Parliament, another Act of Parliament should be brought in to scratch him out of the first Act. In making these remarks he wished it to be distinctly understood that he was not an opponent of the Act for the Union of Benefices. It was an Act which he believed would be found conducive to many purposes of utility, piety, and public benefit. If the present Bill were now a genuine proposition to amend that Act, he should be willing to support it; but if, as he could not help inferring from what had passed, it was one of pains and penalties against the Venerable Archdeacon of London—a man of high character and universally respected—he should oppose the Motion. To give the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie) an opportunity of giving more explanation on these points, he would move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. ALDERMAN ROSE said, he believed that the safeguards provided by the Act were necessary, and ought to be preserved, except some very good reason could be given for doing away with them. When he was Lord Mayor it came to his knowledge that the beautiful church which stood at the end of Lombard Street and King William Street was about to be taken down under the Act, because, as it was alleged, it stood in the way of a street improvement. An arrangement had been made with the officers of the church, and a large sum was to be paid in order that the building might be sold. That church was well filled every Sunday, and he believed there had been no intention to pull it down. The excuse made was that it was habitually empty, and the whole thing was cut and dried. It was to have been put up to auction in order that it might be converted into a post office. He, however, made it his business to call upon the parishioners, who availed themselves of the power given them under the Act of Parliament, and they gave their unanimous vote against the desecration of their church. He thought the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie) ought to give some further explanation before he asked them to read this Bill a first time.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he had said nothing because he had already made a statement on the subject. He had no objection to give hon. Gentlemen opposite any information on the subject of this Bill, though they seemed to be already in possession of what they asked for. Under the Act certain consents were necessary before a church could be sold. It was requisite to have the consent of the parishioners, and that had been unanimously given in this case. The consent of the patrons was required, who, in this case, were the Deans and Chapters of Canterbury and St. Paul's, and that also had been given, as had likewise been the consent of the Bishop of London, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and that of the Secretary of State. He thought that all those safeguards very amply secured the interests of the Church and of the public. But in addition to the consents which he had just enumerated, and which had been re-acquired in the Bill as it came from the Lords, the consent of the Archdeacon was foisted into the Bill by the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard) during its passage through that House. The hon. Member said he was not opposed to the Union of Benefices Bill. He had thrown every obstacle in its way. After he (Mr. Bouverie) had undergone severe labour during the whole of two Wednesdays in his endeavour to get that Bill through, the hon. Member (Mr. Hubbard) proposed that the consent of the Archdeacon should be required. Thinking it likely that the reverend gentleman would take the same view as his Bishop, the Archbishop, the Capitular Bodies, and the Secretary of State, he did not deem it worth while to divide the House on the proposal, and not wishing to fight every point to the death, in an unguarded moment he had agreed to introduce the Archdeacon. Unfortunately, the hon. Member for Buckingham was more knowing than he had been. He wanted to put a spoke in the wheel and stop the whole proceeding, and had succeeded in doing so. He hoped he was not doing an injustice to the hon. Member when he said he believed that to have been his object. In the two parishes with which it was proposed to deal by the scheme now before the House there were 805 souls, and one of the churches alone was capable of containing 800 people. The parishioners consented to the amalgamation, the main object of which was to raise a large sum of money, it was said £40,000, which could be realized by the sale of the site of a church not required for the purposes of public worship in the City. It was proposed to apply part of the money so raised to the building of a church in a populous place in the outskirts of London, where a church was much needed, and the people were in a state of spiritual destitution, and also to the erection of a residence for the clergyman in the united parishes. Removing a church was no great novelty now-a-days—the Bank of England and St. Katharine's Dock had each swallowed up the sites of old churches; but this was not to be taken for a bank or a dock, but to erect another church in a part of London where the people were in a state of spiritual destitution. That was the scheme, and all the parties interested in it, the parish, the patrons, the Bishop, the Archbishop, the Home Secretary, had all consented, and then the Archdeacon stepped in and stopped everything, because he did not approve of the sale being by public auction. The hon. Member for Buckingham had told the House that the Archdeacon objected to the church being sold by auction. He had himself no particular fancy for the sale by auction, but in such matters they must be guided by the circumstances of each case. If the hon. Member for Dundalk had been told that the Archdeacon only objected to the sale of the church by auction, he had been misinformed. The Archdeacon had had an interview with his Colleagues of the Estate Committee of the Ecclesiastical Commission and himself, and they had asked him this very question; the rev. gentleman had then stated distinctly that he objected to the principle of the Act, and declined to give his sanction to the scheme, even if it were agreed not to sell the church in that manner. Thus it was quite evident that the Archdeacon had other reasons than the one suggested by the hon. Gentleman for his opposition to the measure, and was prepared to stop all Union of Benefices under the Act. Was such a scheme, which would prove most beneficial to the parish, to the City of London, to the Church generally, and to the spiritual wants of those outside the City, to be stopped because the Archdeacon of London did not choose to approve it? Having had charge of the original Bill in that House, and knowing the opinion of its author in another House, he had no hesitation in asking the House to pass the proposed Bill, which would have the effect of allowing a very useful project to be carried out. The hon. Member for Buckingham talked of the Bill as one of pains and penalties against the Archdeacon; but he (Mr. Bouverie), in introducing it, was not proposing to drag the rev. gentleman to the stake and burn him, but merely to relieve him from a responsibility he had found inconvenient. Three years ago Parliament, without the consent of the Archdeacon, directed that his sanction should be obtained before the sale of a church could be proceeded with, and it was quite competent for the Legislature, upon further reflection, to say that in future his approbation should not be necessary in matters of the kind. Under these circumstances he trusted the House would support a measure so beneficial to the City of London and to the Church generally.

MR. COLLINS said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie) must have misunderstood the Archdeacon on one point; for about a month ago, in a conversation which took place in the lobby of the House, the Archdeacon had informed him that, although the Union of Benefices Act was not a measure he should have originated, still he did not object to assist in carrying out its objects, and he would have given his sanction to the sale of the church in question provided it were not disposed of by public auction. The real question, therefore, before the House was not whether or not the sale of the church was to be stopped, but whether the name of the Archdeacon was to be expunged by the Bill merely because he differed from the other trustees and from the hon. Gentleman as to the mode in which the sale was to be effected. Personally he (the hon. Member) thought a great boon would be conferred upon the City of London by the union of the benefices, but he thought it would be preferable if the House were to take the reasonable scruples of the Archdeacon into consideration, and direct that the sale of the church should not take place by public auction, and that at least they should not take the strong measure of striking out his name.

MR. KNINAIRD said, the Archdeacon, in his interview with the promoters of the scheme, had expressed his entire dissent from the scheme, and more particularly from the proposal for the sale by auction. After the consent of the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London had been given to the scheme, if an insurmountable obstacle were raised which would prevent its being carried into effect it was but reasonable that Parliament should remove the impediment.

MR. HENLEY said, they were being plunged step by step into greater difficulties. The right hon. Member who had carried the original Bill through the House had made a most extraordinary observation when he stated that one of the provisions of the Bill had been foisted into it. After that Bill had received the approval of both Houses, and had become an Act of Parliament, were they now to deal with it in accordance with the preconceived notions of the person who brought it in? Neither the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie) nor the hon. Member who last spoke (Mr. Kinnaird) had ventured to assert that any offer had been made to the Archdeacon to carry out the scheme without the sale by auction. That would have been a very simple thing to do, and he could not understand why, when a person objected to what he considered an indecent mode of carrying out a scheme for the public good gentlemen, honestly wishing to carry it out, should not have made an offer to remove the cause of objection. Instead of adopting that most reasonable and easy course the right hon. Gentlemen had brought in the present measure for the purpose of snuffing out the Archdeacon, who had chosen to refuse his sanction to an indecent mode of carrying out a good scheme. That was not a prudent mode of effecting an object of this kind on which there was sure to be great difference of opinion. Were the present Bill carried the next thing would be that an endeavour would be made to snuff out in like manner the Archbishop of Canterbury, and then the Bishop of London, and so, one after another, by disqualifying Bills, all those whose sanction was now required, until at length somebody or other would pull the churches down and put the money received from their sale into his own pocket. The right hon. Gentleman, instead of giving them any information relative to the Bill, had merely availed himself of the opportunity to indulge in a violent tirade against the Archdeacon and to state that some thousands of pounds would be applicable to do good elsewhere. Before bringing in a Bill upon which they had very imperfect information, it was but reasonable that the Commissioners, who had the carrying out of these matters, should put it to the Archdeacon whether he would consent to the scheme in question if the indecent mode of carrying it out were given up.

MR. AYRTON said, the original Act originated with a large number of the most influential and intelligent of the clergy of the metropolis, who thought it a scandal that there should be such a large number of richly endowed churches without congregations in the City, and he had stated at a meeting to take into consideration the spiritual destitution of the City that they had no case on which to go to the community while such a scandal existed in the metropolis. The Bishop of London, upon whom the matter was pressed by the clergy, then laid the question before the other House. It was a great misfortune that the right hon. Member (Mr. Bouverie), in his eagerness to pass the measure, should have permitted the introduction of a provision by which a subordinate functionary received power to interpose in such a manner that his veto might supersede the wish not only of his own bishop, but that of the Archbishop of Canterbury. If the Archdeacon entertained the opinion that a church once consecrated should never be devoted to any other purpose—a view which was not so generally recognized by the Church of England as by the church to which the hon. Member for Dundalk belonged—the House ought obviously to relieve him of a duty which did not harmonize with his opinions, and which he found it unpleasant to perform. It was remarkable that whenever an attempt had been made to get rid of a church in London for purposes of commerce or private profit there had never been any difficulty in the way. If a railway wanted the ground, churches, graves, and bones were got rid of with the greatest facility. This was the only occasion on which an attempt had been made to remove a church for a religious purpose, and it seemed to provoke a vast amount of animosity and opposition. In the present case, nobody was to make any money out of the removal, but spiritual wants alone were to be provided for and every possible obstacle was raised to the proposed change. There was in law a doctrine applied to property that cujus est solum ejus est usque ad cælum, and he would not say how far they acted upon that doctrine who placed obstacles in the way of such sales as that to which the Bill related, and who, while priding themselves on being supporters of the Church of England, objected to a change which was in accordance with the spiritual wants of the community. It was, indeed, contended on their behalf that there would be something indelicate and indecent in selling a piece of land which was ecclesiastical property for the highest price that could be got; but, for his own part, he could not perceive the force of that objection. Seeing that the proceeds of the sale were to be applied to meeting the spiritual necessities of the poor, he thought it was desirable that they should be as large as possible, and the best way to secure that result in the City of London was to put the land up to auction. What, he should like to know, was the spiritual distinction between selling a piece of ground by auction and by private tender? He did not know which Article of the Church of England enunciated it. Looking at the matter either in a temporal or in a spiritual point of view, it appeared to him, he must confess, that what was to be sought after was the highest bidder, and he trusted refined scruples, which had really no foundation in reason, would not be allowed to interfere with the practical aim of his right hon. Friend by whom the Bill was promoted. Those hon. Members who stood so zealously by the Established Church ought, he thought, to have some faith in a Bishop and Archbishop of that Church, and ought not to discredit those high functionaries by setting up a subordinate to protest against their proceedings when they had simply sanctioned that which was reasonable and proper.

MR. LYGON said, that the Archdeacon in his letter to the Bishop of London used the following words:—"I have no objection to the taking down of the church, and disposing of the site; but there are different ways of doing the same thing." The Archdeacon did not there state that he objected to the principle of the act; on the contrary, he was ready to assent to the sale; but he disapproved of the proposal that it should take place by means of a public auction. The scheme, as prepared by the Bishop of London, was, that upon the union taking place, the Church of St. Benet should be taken down and sold by tender, and that was the proposal which was sanctioned by the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury and the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's. When the matter came before the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, however, they took upon themselves to alter the proposal so made, and it was from them the proposal came that the church should be sold by public auction. It appeared to him that, when the principles of the Bill had been agreed upon, the Archdeacon was specially charged with the responsibility of seeing that the manner of giving effect to them was in accordance with ecclesiastical rules and precedents. In his (Mr. Lygon's) opinion the Archdeacon had exercised a very wise discretion, and there was no reason why he should on that account be deprived of the power with which he was at present invested. So far, he might add, as ecclesiastical sanction went, it was clearly in favour of having the church sold by tender.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he could assure his hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard) that no Nonconformist body had any intention of obtaining for itself possession of the site in question. It was true that on a former occasion he had proposed that a clause should be introduced into the Bill then before the House to the effect that the Nonconformists might secure one of the sites in question for a church whenever the Church of England was not in a position to purchase it. Perfect horror seized the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard) when he made that proposal, and he believed that some fear existed in this case that the Nonconformists might be the purchasers. The Bishop of London had written asking him as a favour to withdraw the clause he had referred to, inasmuch as its insertion would peril the passing of the measure. And having mentioned the name of that right rev. Prelate he could not abstain from saying that he felt the most unbounded admiration of his career as a bishop, for, since he first came to fill the position which he now occupied with so much advantage to the Church, no man had done more to provide for the spiritual necessities of the metropolis. He entirely sympathized with the Bishop of London in the present case. The best way to obtain the largest sum for the same object was the question that evening before the House; and he, for one, was quite surprised to hear the objections made to the proposed scheme by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Sir George Bowyer), seeing how frequently the sites of Roman Catholic churches abroad were turned to other than their original uses—churches which had been used for centuries as places of worship, and which contained magnificent paintings, having even been used as stables. For his own part, he hoped his right hon. Friend would persevere with the Bill. With regard to the Nonconformist body, he desired to say that they were not jealous of the progress which the Church of England might make, provided that that progress was made in the right way—namely, by simply relying on the Christian willingness of their own people, and using the property of the Church to the best advantage.

Bill to amend an Act passed in the twenty-third and twenty-fourth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, intituled "An Act to make better provision for the Union of contiguous Benefices in Cities, Towns, and Boroughs," ordered to be brought in by Mr. EDWARD PLEYDELL BOUVERIE and Mr. GOSCHEN.

SALMON FISHERY ACT (1861) AMENDMENT.—LEAVE.—BILL ORDERED.

MR. T. G. BARING, in moving for leave to introduce this Bill, said, it would be in the recollection of the House that the Act of 1861 was founded on the Report made in 1860 by a Royal Commission, which had been appointed to inquire into the causes of the diminution in the quantity of salmon in the different rivers of England. Those who had read the Reports of the Inspectors under that Act were aware that it had been successful to an extent which could hardly have been expected considering the short time it had been in operation. There had been a considerable increase in the salmon since that time. But while the Act of 1861 had succeeded to a very considerable extent, those who had in different localities in England taken rivers under their protection found considerable difficulty in collecting funds for the purpose of carrying out to the full the provisions of the Act. It had been suggested frequently that some amendments should be introduced into the Act, in order to give power for the formation of bodies for the protection of salmon, and to give these bodies jurisdiction over the whole of a river. Also that there should be a licence duty on rods, nets, and other engines for the capture of fish, so that means should be provided for the protection of fish during the spawning season. With this view he had at the end of last Session of Parliament laid upon the table of the House a Bill which had been during the recess circulated, and had been generally approved. The Reports of the Inspectors of Fisheries for the year 1864 contained an account of the meetings which had been held in different parts of the country, and it appeared that the concurrence of nearly all those interested in the fisheries had been given to the principles which were sought to be embodied in the Bill. Besides these two objects—the establishment of Boards of Conservancy and the furnishing them with funds by means of licence duties—there had been other suggestions made for the amendment of the Salmon Fisheries Act of 1861. A very important subject connected with salmon fisheries was that of “fixed engines.” They were defined in the Act of 1861 in two separate places, but these definitions were not consistent one with the other, and a very considerable doubt had been entertained with respect to the application of the term, “fixed engine.” There had been a decision upon an appeal before the Court of Queen’s Bench, from which it might be inferred that a net held stationary across a river was not a fixed engine. Under the Irish Fisheries Act such a mode of fishing would be clearly illegal, and it was perfectly apparent to every gentleman that a net held across a river by men on each side, ought to be considered as a fixed engine. It was, therefore, intended to make the definition the same as that adopted in the Irish Act. It was not intended to interfere with the Act of 1861, with respect to the reservation of the ancient rights of catching salmon. The House had determined that those who had exercised these rights at the time of the passing of the Act should continue to do so; but since then it had been found that these fixed engines had greatly increased. The expense and difficulty of prosecution, was such that he thought the House would feel it necessary to take some steps in order to prevent the increased number of salmon, which had been secured by the operation of the Act of 1861, being taken by these engines.

He proposed to introduce into the Bill clauses which would establish for England the same tribunal as that which existed in Ireland — namely, a Commission to inquire in every district into the legality of these fixed engines, and whether they were in use at the time of the passing of the Salmon Fisheries Act of 1861. There would be power of appeal from the decision of the Commissioners to the Court of Queen’s Bench. There would be other points of minor importance connected with salmon fisheries which would be introduced in the Bill, but which it would be better to discuss in Committee. He would be sorry to conclude his short statement without expressing an opinion which he believed was shared in by all who had paid attention to the subject, that the country was greatly indebted to the Inspectors of Fisheries, Mr. Ffennell and Mr. Eden, for the great ability which they had displayed in carrying out the intentions of Parliament, and the valuable advice which they had given to all parties consulting them.

Moved, That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Salmon Fishery Act (1861).—(Mr. T. G. Baring.)

MR. LYGON said, he wished to ask the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down how he proposed to constitute the Board of Conservancy. He quite agreed with what had been stated as to the beneficial working of the Act of 1861, but while it was desirable that Boards of Conservancy should be established, the House must bear in mind that there was another great question affecting our principal streams now under public consideration, and some comprehensive measure of legislation might be introduced, having reference to the drainage of towns into rivers, and perhaps giving powers to some public Boards to preserve them from pollution. It would, therefore, be wise to avoid imposing duties upon these Boards of Conservancy which other bodies might be appointed to carry out. It would be most inconvenient to have two public bodies having separate jurisdictions over the streams; and it might lead to similar confusion to that which we now saw in the streets of London. He concurred in what had been said as to the valuable services which had been rendered by the Inspectors of Fisheries.

MR. T. G. BARING said, the Bill which he introduced last Session fully explained the way in which these Boards would be constituted. They would be appointed at the Quarter Sessions of any county which contained a salmon river, and a joint fishery Committee would be appointed to determine the constitution of a Board of Conservancy extending over more counties than one.

Bill to amend the Salmon Fishery Act, 1861, ordered to be brought in by Mr. BARING and Sir GEORGE GREY.

CHARITABLE TRUSTS FEES BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, he had no intention to wage war upon the charitable institutions of this country, or to impugn the conduct or attack in any way the character or efficiency of the Charity Commissioners, than whom no body of public officers had fulfilled their duties with greater benefit to the country. But he believed that the expenditure entailed by the working of that Commission ought not to be borne entirely out of public taxation. Those who applied to it and benefited by it should contribute. The nation at large was not interested in the business done on behalf of local charities; and it was, therefore, contrary to sound policy that the nation should bear the expense, especially as a large portion of the business which the Commission discharged was formerly transacted at great expense in the Court of Chancery. Some fees were attached to nearly every court, but on the part of the Commission no fees whatever were required upon the large business that it conducted. He quite admitted that no fees ought to be imposed which would act as a check upon persons bringing their accounts under inspection; but a great many cases of a totally different nature came before the Commissioners. Orders were made in 1,700 cases, of which a certain number were for authorizing applications to the Court of Chancery, to the County Courts, or to the courts of common law; others for the appointment and removal of trustees; some had reference to the issue of certificates for the information of the Attorney General, with a view to the institution by him of ex officio proceedings; and there were a great variety of other matters of a nature totally different from the mere registering of accounts of the annual working of any charity. When, therefore, the business which the Commissioners now transacted entailed, under the former system, the payment of sums amounting in some cases to £100, he did not see what injustice there would be in the establishment of a small scale of fees. The Commissioners, when he applied to them on the subject, pointed out several cases which they held to be parallel. They said that the Drainage Commissioners, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and the Poor Law Commissioners all discharged their duties free of any such charges. The last he could not hold to be a case in point at all, for in the duties which the Poor Law Commissioners discharged the whole country, as distinguished from any single district, was interested. He could not see why, if trustees or others wanted advice for their own guidance, and which, but for the existence of the Commissioners, they would have to obtain from their own solicitors, fees should not be payable in the granting of such information. At present the information was supplied by the Commissioners gratis. Why, he asked, should the nation be bound to pay for an advantage conferred on private individuals, those individuals escaping scot-free? It might be urged as an objection to his proposal, that any imposition of fees would have the effect of discouraging charities from freely sending in their accounts to the Commissioners; but if the principle of the Bill were approved by the House, he was willing to insert a clause limiting the fees to sums so small that they should not prove such a drawback as was anticipated. The principle for which he contended was not at variance with that on which the Commission was originally established. Lord Lyndhurst contemplated at the time that it should pay its own expenses; but some observations having been made upon this head, it was thought better not to imperil the fair trial of so great an experiment by the interposition of any pecuniary difficulties, especially as it was then believed that the expenses of the Commission would never exceed £5,000 a year. They had risen, however, to £20,000 a year; and, as the benefits of the Commission enjoyed a more extended range, the costs of working would, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated in his speech in 1863, go on increasing. The Commission was doing good, but why should not the expenditure be borne by the parties who were benefited? It was to meet what he regarded as a growing evil that he asked the House to assent to this measure, which would not entail any personal charges on trustees, and which would not, he believed, lessen the real efficiency of any public charity.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

—(Mr. Thomson Hankey.)

SIR MORTON PETO said, he thought the hon. Member had succeeded in making out a very strong case against the Bill; for he had shown the House that the question was whether the expenses of a Government Department should be paid by the State at large, or out of charitable funds. There was a strong feeling in this country against the taxation of charities, and this was not the first time that a similar attempt had been made. In 1845, and again in 1846, Bills were introduced to establish Boards of Charitable Commissioners, and to provide for their payment by means of taxation upon charities. These Bills, however, were on each occasion successfully resisted by the great charitable interests of the country. In 1851 and 1852 similar Bills were introduced, but they met with the like fate, and the Government were at length compelled to concede that the expenses of the Charity Commission should be met out of the public Exchequer. It was not until the Government yielded to the general wish that the expenses of the Commission should be defrayed out of the public purse that the House passed a Bill sanctioning the appointment of the Commission. It was proposed by this Bill that all the former legislation on the subject should be revised. His hon. Friend should have left the Government to deal with this question, which was one of considerable importance to the charities. Being a question of taxation, it came within its province, rather than within that of a private Member. Many of them made returns of very small amount, and the tax now imposed would be practically and in the aggregate a large one, being directed against the poorest classes of the community. The expenses of the Education Department, of the Poor Law Board, and other similar Departments, were paid out of the public funds, and why should a different rule be established in the case of charities? He wished his hon. Friend had tried his hand on a more popular measure, and he trusted that the House would unanimously support him in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

MR. SELWYN said, that having himself given notice of a similar Amendment, he had no hesitation in seconding that of the hon. Baronet. He objected to the details of the measure, to the manner in which it had been introduced, and still more to its principle. With regard to the details, a glance at the Bill would show how vague and unsatisfactory its provisions were. It was, therefore, unnecessary to trouble the House further on this point. With respect to the circumstances under which it had been introduced, the hon. Member deserved some credit for the ingenuity with which he had managed to evade the constitutional rule that no Bill to impose taxation should be introduced except by the Government. About six years ago, and during the present Parliament, he (Mr. Selwyn) brought in a measure in which he proposed to do away with the exemption from probate duty then existing in favour of estates exceeding one million, under which exemption in the case of a man who died worth £2,000,000 his representatives were not called upon to pay upon the second million, while a man who died worth £200 was called upon to pay probate duty on the second hundred. He was then told that a private Member ought not to bring in such a measure, and it was afterwards brought in and passed upon the responsibility of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. With respect to the principle of the Bill, a tax upon charities was really a tax on those who received the benefits of those charities. The present Bill did not impose a tax on the governors or trustees, but upon the poor inmates of almshouses and hospitals and other recipients of the charities. He had recently been told by a governor of one of the largest and best managed charities in the metropolis—King's College Hospital—that it was in such want of funds that the governors were unable to pay their weekly butchers' bills. Yet the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Thomson Hankey) proposed to put an additional tax upon charities of that kind, at a moment, too, when the House expected to hear from the Chancellor of the Exchequer such a flourishing account of the state of the public revenue, as would enable him considerably to reduce the burdens of the country. But if the present Bill had been brought in by Her Majesty's Government he should have objected to it on principle. The very question at issue had been four times previously decided by the House—in 1845, 1846, 1851, and 1852, and that formed another reason why a private Member ought not to ask the House to reverse its repeated decisions. The Bill appeared to be founded upon the principle set forth in the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on Charities in 1863, which contained two fallacies. The first was that charities enjoyed certain peculiar exemptions from taxation, while in truth the exemption was that common to poverty; the exemption enjoyed by a legacy under £20, an income of less than £100, or a house of less than £20 rent. The next fallacy was that, because some charities were useless or mischievous, and because the trustees of some other charities had been guilty of misdeeds, it was right that all charities should be mulcted. That proposal of the right hon. Gentleman signally failed, notwithstanding the eloquence and ability with which it was supported. The hon. Member for Peterborough said that the Charity Commissioners conferred benefits on these charities, and that it was, therefore, just to impose upon them a corresponding burden. Parliament had already imposed upon Charity trustees the trouble and expense of making out two copies of their accounts—one for the Commissioners and the other for the Churchwardens—and now the hon. Member wanted to impose a tax upon a tax, and sought to levy a stamp duty upon these Returns. The Act of Parliament prevented the trustees of charities from granting leases or going before the Courts of Law in certain cases without the consent of the Charity Commissioners, and now the hon. Gentleman proposed to levy a tax upon the obtaining of this leave and consent. He (Mr. Selwyn) was a Governor of the Charity of “the Sons of the Clergy.” The hon. Member proposed to tax that as well as other charities; but it would not be a tax on the governors, but on the widows and orphans, who received the scanty pittance distributed by the governors. The governors acted on the opinion of their own officers, and did not want the advice of the Charity Commissioners, but they could not grant a lease for more than twenty-one years without their consent. The Bill sought to add an additional burden to this restriction, and it was, in these respects, even a worse measure than that produced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer two years ago. He thought that the feeling of the House had been sufficiently manifested against the measure, and he trusted that it would not be pressed to a division.

Mr. Selwyn

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day six months.”—(Sir Morton Peto.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the word ‘now’ stand part of the Question.”

MR. F. S. POWELL said, he concurred in the observations made in praise of the Charity Commissioners, who discharged their onerous duties most admirably. But the proceedings in the office were subject to great delay, and one of the grounds upon which he objected to the present Bill was that it would increase that delay which now formed a valid subject of complaint. He regretted that the hon. Member who introduced this Bill had not made his meaning more clear in reference to the charities which would be affected by this measure. That vagueness was not confined to mere figures, but extended to the language of the Bill itself. It was a great mistake to suppose that the charities of the country were of such a nature as justified the denunciation which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had employed in the now historical speech which had been referred to. From the 11th Report of the Charity Commissioners, published last year, it appeared that the total revenues of the charities in ten counties amounted to £430,000, and of that sum upwards of £150,000 was devoted to schools. The endowed schools of the country were now suffering under great pressure in consequence of the action of the Privy Council; yet this was the time selected by the hon. Member for trying to impose a heavy burden upon them. The hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield) would hardly support the second reading of the Bill, seeing that there were no less than £5,200 a year belonging to Dissenting schools and chapels which would fall under the operation of the measure. Another objection to the Bill was, that it would to a great extent involve a breach of trust, because upon the faith of what had been said in that House, and believing that no great change in the law would take place, the governors of charities had vested no less than £1,634,045 in the hands of the official trustees for various purposes. For these and other reasons he hoped the House would unanimously reject the Motion for the second reading.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, though he joined with the rest of the House in urging his hon. Friend not to press the Bill, he could not entirely concur with what had been said in opposition to it. There was much in the measure which had already received the sanction of the greatest authorities on both sides of the House. When Lord Lyndhurst was Lord Chancellor, under Sir Robert Peel, he had introduced Bills for the appointment of Commissioners, whose expenses were to be defrayed by the taxation of the charities themselves; and a Commission composed of the most eminent and competent persons expressed a decided opinion that a permanent Commission should be appointed, the expenses of which should be borne by the charities. In accordance with that recommendation a Bill was introduced by Lord Cranworth in 1851, the principle of which was somewhat similar to that of the present measure. In was a very intelligible proposition that the expenses of that which tended so much to the improvement of the charities should be borne out of the funds of the charities. But as to the question of expediency, after so many Governments had failed in their attempts to deal with the subject, and seeing that the action of the Commission had been of so much use in increasing the property of the charities and improving the application of their funds, the House would hardly consent to make any alteration in the present system unless it could be satisfied that the proposed economy would be made without danger to the improvement which was being gradually introduced into the administration of charities. Against the principle that the charities should pay for services rendered in the improvement of their property, nothing could be said; but the Bill of his hon. Friend proposed that by far the larger portion of the expenses should be borne not by the charities which might profit by the management of the Commissioners, but by those which, in accordance with the Act of Parliament, sent in returns of their balance-sheet. During the last year some 1,700 orders, dealing with the property of charities, had been issued, but no less than 14,000 returns had been sent in by the charities for the purpose of mere statistical information; so that by far the largest proportion of the cost would, by the Bill of his hon. Friend, be thrown upon the charities for supplying information to Parliament and the country. That such information should be given was of the greatest possible importance; but the effect of the Bill would be that it would cease to be afforded. Again, the machinery by which the Bill proposed to enforce the returns on which the percentages were to be levied, were the same as that now in force, which in practice was only employed in few and extreme cases. The orders sent down by the Commissioners for returns were in many cases disregarded, and it was only by an application to the Court of Chancery, and bringing the pressure of that Court to bear upon the trustees, that they could be forced to make the returns. The consequence was that out of some 50,000 charities only 14,000 sent in their returns. The principle involved in the Bill was one which would have to be dealt with by that House before long in a comprehensive spirit. He could not agree with the hon. Member for Finsbury in his estimate of the importance of these charities. No doubt many of them usefully applied the funds committed to their charge; it was equally true that a great many of them were useless, and some worse than useless. They were positively mischievous. Looking, however, at the measure as it stood, though by no means agreeing in much of the criticism which had been passed upon its details, he hoped his hon. Friend would withdraw the Bill.

Words added. Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT SUPPLEMENTAL BILL—[BILL 58.]—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. HADFIELD said, that the Bill proposed to take away an exemption in respect of rating at present enjoyed by houses of a certain small annual value in Sheffield. Two petitions had been presented against the repeal of this exemption, and though he approved the Bill generally, he thought the proper course under the General Local Government Act would be to refer the subject of this exemption and the right of the persons claiming it to a Select Committee, before whom they might be heard. He accordingly would move to this effect if the Speaker was of opinion that he could do so.

MR. SPEAKER said, that, according to the Act, the proper course was to move that the Bill petitioned against should be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. T. G. BARING said, he wished to ask the hon. Member to move, when in Committee, the omission of Sheffield from the Bill. He would then insert it in another Bill which was to contain certain opposed Orders, and which was to be introduced to-morrow, and then the question might be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. HADFIELD declined the responsibility of moving the omission of Sheffield from the Bill. He had no objection to the principle of the Bill, which he wished should be proceeded with; what he wished was that the petitioners should have an opportunity of appealing against the application to Sheffield of the clause he had referred to.

MR. T. G. BARING said, that the effect of opposing the going into Committee on the Bill would be to postpone all the other provisional Orders mentioned in the schedule.

Bill reported, with amended Title; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

SUPPLY.

Resolutions [April 24] reported.

MR. LAIRD said, he wished to ask for information respecting certain Votes for shipbuilding in the Royal Yards and by contract. It was just now a question of great interest whether vessels should be built of the same size as formerly, or of a smaller class; and he should like to know whether it was proposed to have small armourclad vessels combining great speed with the carriage of heavy guns. He was prepared to say that vessels of that kind could be built, and foreign Governments were providing themselves with vessels of 1,100 or 1,200 tons to carry the largest class of guns and steam at the rate of eleven or twelve knots. Other Governments were also preparing to provide vessels of 2,000 tons to carry two 600-pounders or four 300-pounders, steaming at the rate of twelve or thirteen knots. Vessels of that class, propelled by double screws and drawing a moderate draught of water—seventeen or eighteen feet—would run where our ships could not, and would be more formidable than anything we had. This was a subject which had excited a great deal of attention, and it was his distinct opinion that the proposition of the hon. and gallant Member for Wakefield (Sir John Hay) could really be carried out—namely, that a vessel of about 1,600 tons could be built to carry a 600-pounder gun or two 300-pounders.

Four vessels of that kind, with a speed of fourteen knots per hour, might be had for the cost of one Warrior. They could be worked with fewer hands in proportion and at less cost to the country, and would be fit to go to any part of the world as sea-going ships. He wished to know whether anything was being done in the construction of such armour-clad vessels. It had been stated that five or six vessels were being built of wood, of the Amazon class, and something like the Alabama, and he should be glad to know the size and the speed of these vessels. The great advantage of the Alabama was her sailing qualities, and her capability of going for weeks at a time without the aid of steam. He hoped that the noble Lord would be able to state that these vessels would be able to carry heavy guns and keep out of the range of armour-clad vessels, or a large shell would destroy them in the same way as the Alabama.

COLONEL SYKES said, he wished to refer to the employment of pensioners in the War Office. Many of them were men of high character and some of literary attainments. A little addition to their pensions would keep them in their status, from which they would otherwise fall, and therefore he expressed his hearty concurrence in the proposition for their employment as emanating from the War Office. It was equally politic and philanthropic.

MR. BENTINCK said, that the noble Secretary to the Admiralty had informed the House at an early stage of the discussion of the Navy Estimates that by the end of the year the country would have thirty-nine iron-clad vessels, and he wanted to know of what, in the opinion of the Government, the future British navy was to consist, because it was generally admitted that a wooden vessel could not compete in action with an iron-clad vessel. There was a large number of vessels belonging to the navy in various parts of the world, but those ships were, by the admission of all conversant with the subject, condemned as useless, and he therefore wished to know what class of vessels the country was in future to depend on for the defence of its commerce. Did the Government contemplate any further construction of iron-sheathed vessels than that which had been already announced, so as to place the British fleet in a position to entitle it to the name of a navy? There was another point on which he desired information. Supposing that the country possessed those vessels which were necessary, in his opinion, to make the navy such as it ought to be, where could the guns be found with which they should be armed? He was given to understand that even if a sufficient iron-clad navy existed at present the guns requisite for arming them did not exist.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that it was unfortunate the hon. Member (Mr. Laird) did not appear to have heard his statement when he brought in the Navy Estimates, as he then endeavoured to state the description of ships both built and building. He understood the hon. Member to express an opinion that it was desirable to combine small tonnage, armour-plating, heavy guns, and great speed. That was the very point which, as had been stated over and over again, the Admiralty considered to be fraught with great difficulty. A vessel of small tonnage might be made of great speed by giving her fine lines; but if made of great speed her buoyancy was, of course, by so much reduced, and therefore her power to carry heavy armour-plates. It was his duty to repeat this, notwithstanding that the hon. Member stated that some foreign nations were going to build vessels of 1,000 tons, with full armour-plates, heavy guns, and with a speed of fourteen knots. [Mr. LAIRD: Vessels of 2,000 tons or upwards.] Well, on the first night of the discussion on the Navy Estimates he stated that the Government hoped to build a vessel of about that tonnage on the twin-screw principle. He then said—

“We propose to build at Pembroke an armour-plated corvette. She will be a vessel of about 3,000 tons, with a very light draught, or 16ft., and with twin screws, and we propose to make her at the water-line of a thickness of 6in. of iron and 10in. of wood, besides a  $\frac{1}{4}$ -inch inner skin of iron. We hope that she will be able to carry eight of these 12-ton guns.”—[3 Hansard, clxxvii. 1158.]

If that succeeded, he asked whether anything which any foreign nation was going to build would be likely to offer a better prospect of efficiency. [Mr. LAIRD: What is the speed of the vessel to be?] His impression was that he had stated it would be thirteen knots. With regard to the vessels of the Amazon class, which the House was aware was an improvement on the Alabama, he understood the hon. Member to object to their being built of wood, and to say that the Alabama was built for a particular purpose, and that being a good sailer, with great stowage, speed was not of so much importance.

MR. LAIRD: I said that she combined sailing and steaming qualities, so as to enable her to hold her position with other sailing vessels.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: That was precisely what the Admiralty deemed to be necessary for their cruising vessels. Those vessels remained a considerable time absent from our ports at foreign stations; they performed a great part of their duties under sail, and it was of great importance that they should possess good sailing and stowage qualities. They proposed to arm the Amazon class with the 100-pounder 6 $\frac{1}{4}$ -inch rifle guns. It had not been ascertained that they could have a better gun than that for the navy; for, although the 12-ton guns would be very powerful, it was yet a question how far they would answer for seagoing cruisers. That was a matter of experiment still; and the Admiralty would be greatly to blame if they sent small ships of the Amazon class to sea, and put on board of them guns which they could not probably carry, and which might strain and damage them. What they were doing was done for the purposes of trial. They were giving to all the ships they built heavier guns and fewer of them; that is to say, they were reducing the number of guns in a ship and increasing their range and calibre. The vessels of which he was speaking would carry four guns on the broadside, whereas the ships built a few years ago carried nine. Nevertheless, the weight of iron thrown from the vessels with four guns would be 328lb., whereas their sister ships threw only 296lb. So, again, with respect to armour-ships. They were limiting the area of the armour-plating of their ships, but making it thicker. They might hereafter be able to place these armour-plates on a smaller class of ships; but as to what the hon. Member said about ships for foreign nations, they were always going to be beaten out of the field by some foreign nation. He had heard that story over and over again; but he was not aware that any foreign nation was much ahead of us in the construction of their ships, nor did he think they were likely to be so. He believed that this country would do as well as foreign countries in that respect.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he believed the noble Lord had expressed one or two opinions which he might venture to call heretical, and that were not in accordance with the knowledge which he himself would possess if he were outside of the Admiralty. It appeared to him that those who were in the Admiralty shut their eyes to facts which all the rest of the world knew. The vessel of 2,300 tons being built in this country for another nation, with two cupolas, each of which was made to carry a 600-pounder gun, was a vessel against which any ship in the English navy would be unfairly matched, because those 600-pounder guns on a turntable would be a more formidable armament than any we possessed. He was given to understand that the Admiralty had sent to Lisbon a very fine squadron including the Royal Sovereign, which had been sent to Lisbon without masts, and that she had been sent to make an experiment which would probably result in an unfavourable Report, because she would not be steadied in a sea-way by the amount of masting necessary for a vessel of that description. The noble Lord said it was intended to build vessels of the Amazon class with the 200-pounder broadside guns, but what the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Laird), the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), and other Members of that House had urged upon the Government was that these vessels should not be armed with broadside guns at all. They had no knowledge that the 12-ton gun could be used on the broadside principle, nor did he believe it could be used without having machinery adapted for the purpose, and that machinery would be much more easily worked on the turn-table principle. It was of the highest importance that the Admiralty should cease to rely on a principle which ought to be regarded as obsolete, and should avail itself of the mechanical ingenuity which could give them the means of carrying heavy guns at sea. He could confirm what the hon. Member for Birkenhead had said as to vessels of such a description being built in this country for foreign Powers. He wished to ask from the hon. Member for Pontefract an explanation of an item under Vote 10.

MR. CHILDERS said, that the items in question were sums paid for armour-plates for the Royal Alfred, which had been altered. In a Parliamentary paper giving the details of those sums, it was stated that the cost of 460 tons of 6-in. armour for the Royal Alfred, at £26 17s. 6d. per ton, was £12,362 10s., whereas the charge for 470 tons of 4½ in. armour, sup-

INNS OF COURT BILL—[BILL 44.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said, he wished briefly to explain the present state of the law, and the remedy which he proposed to apply to its defects. The Benchers of the Inns of Court exercised a very important jurisdiction of a criminal nature. They had a right to hear and determine complaints and charges against their own members; they had power to refuse admission to their Inn of Court to a person seeking such admission, and thereby of excluding him from a very lucrative and most important profession; they had the power, after a student had complied with all the regulations of the House, and so entitled himself to his call, to refuse upon charges against his character to call him to the Bar, thus inflicting on him very severe punishment and stigmatizing his character; they had also the power of expelling persons from their Inn of Court—a highly penal sentence. But the most important power they exercised was that of disbarring—that was to say, expelling from the legal profession barristers, even though they had the rank of Queen's Counsel. He need scarcely say what a severe punishment that was, depriving a man of the means of living by his profession, and casting a most grave stigma on his reputation. Such a jurisdiction, everybody would allow, ought to be exercised by a tribunal every way qualified to discharge such functions. Even the Judges themselves, with all the formalities of a jury and the procedure of the criminal law, often tried cases the consequences of which were not so serious as those to which he referred, and especially where persons of high standing in the profession might be disbarred. The jurisdiction in these cases was exercised by the whole body of the Benchers. He had no doubt that these gentlemen exercised their authority to the best of their ability for the purpose of administering justice properly and impartially; but he maintained that justice could not be well administered by such numerous bodies. He found that Lincoln's Inn had sixty-nine Benchers, the Inner Temple forty-five, the Middle Temple thirty-six, and Gray's Inn twenty. Cases heard before such numerous bodies as these could not be satisfactorily disposed of. In the first place, the tribunal was necessarily a shifting one. The same cases were heard by one set of Benchers on one day, and by another set of Benchers on another; so impossible was it to secure the attendance of the same Benchers on each day. The old saying of what was everybody's business was nobody's business held good there; and when they had a large body to hear and determine a case, some Members found it convenient to be present on one day and others on another. Not long ago it was shown that, in a case in which a Member of that House was concerned, on each day of the trial there was a great variation in the Court—A and B hearing it on one day, C and D the next, and so on all through the alphabet, and that some of the Benchers who determined the case were not present at all during the hearing. It was said, indeed, that the

Benchers who were not present at the hearing had an opportunity of reading the shorthand writer's notes, and thus of making themselves masters of the proceedings that had taken place in their absence; but he submitted that that was not a satisfactory state of things. It would never be borne that one man on a jury should be absent from the trial, and that, having only become acquainted with the evidence by perusing the shorthand writer's notes, he should afterwards join in giving the verdict. But there were other objections to the present tribunal. One was that the Benchers, in cases of a highly penal and important nature, had no power to administer an oath, and consequently persons might go before them and tell any falsehoods they pleased without there being any remedy by a prosecution for perjury. Another was that the Benchers had no power to compel either the attendance of witnesses or the production of documents. An important case illustrating the necessity for the first of those powers occurred some years ago. Mr. Whittle Harvey was refused his call to the Bar, and his case was heard before the Benchers. Without going into the merits of the case now, it need only be stated that the Benchers determined not to call that gentleman to the Bar. The same case was afterwards brought before a Committee of that House, composed of very distinguished Members, some of whom were still alive, and that Committee came to a conclusion directly the contrary of that arrived at by the Benchers. The Committee held that Mr. Whittle Harvey was entitled to be called to the Bar, and they recorded in their Report the reason why they had come to a different conclusion from that of the Benchers—namely, because they had the power of compelling the attendance of a particular witness, whereas the Benchers had not. Again, when a charge was made against any one, the accuser went before the Benchers with his evidence and his case prepared; but the defendant must beg and request it as a favour that his witnesses would come forward on his behalf, as there was no power of compelling them to do so. Therefore the person defending himself was placed under great disadvantage, and might be subjected to very great injustice. A witness whose evidence was material to his exculpation, might decline to leave his business to attend the tribunal. Every Court ought to have the power of compelling the attendance of witnesses, and so also ought it to have the power of compelling the production of documents material to the cases before it. Being devoid of both of those powers, the Benchers were, to a great extent, an incompetent tribunal. But another power essential to the administration of justice, which the Benchers did not possess, was that of committing for contempt, and maintaining the order of their proceedings. At present any one might go before the Benchers and commit any outrage he liked, and they had no remedy but taking him before a police magistrate. During a late important investigation before an Inn of Court (the Middle Temple) a witness having got possession of a document that was before that Bench, refused to give it up. The Benchers had no remedy. All they could do was to endeavour by force to get the document from him, but it so happened that the witness was strong enough to frustrate their endeavours. The police were called in, and the result was that the judges and the parties all went before the Inspector of Police at the station in Fleet Street. He asked whether such a state of things ought to exist? If the Benchers had had the proper powers of a Court, they would have simply committed the witness to prison, and obliged him to surrender the document of which he had so irregularly obtained possession. He now came to the remedy which he proposed by this Bill, for the evils he had described. He wished to apply to the tribunal of the Benchers of the Inns of Court the principle of the statute well known as the Grenville Act. Before the passing of that Act, all cases of contested elections were tried at the Bar of that House before the Whole House. That was a shifting tribunal, without the power of administering an oath, and the business was often done in a very unsatisfactory manner. By the Grenville Act, the House had the power to appoint Election Committees for the decision of these cases, and the powers necessary for the administration of justice were given to them. He proposed to do something of the same kind in regard to the Inns of Court. He proposed that instead of cases being heard before the whole body of the Benchers, the Benchers should have power to select a judicial committee for their determination, and that such judicial committee should be armed with all the powers that belonged to a court of law—that it should be able to administer an oath, to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of documents, and also to punish for contempt. Last year he introduced a Bill very similar to the present one; but he had sought to obviate the objections that were raised to the former measure. One of those objections was that he had made it necessary for the Benchers in every case of complaint brought before them to appoint a judicial committee to investigate and determine it. No doubt it might be inconvenient to interfere with what was called the forum domesticum by which the Benchers maintained due discipline among their own members; and, therefore, he proposed to leave it in the option of the Benchers to refer or not refer cases affecting discipline to a judicial committee. Therefore, in those cases they would be a sort of grand jury, deciding in the first instance whether or not the matter brought before them should be referred to the judicial committee. They would, of course, have the power of censuring members of their own society, even although they might not think that the case was sufficiently grave to undergo inquiry before the judicial committee. But he proposed that the Benchers should not be allowed to exercise the highly penal powers which he had mentioned—namely, that of refusing admission to the Inn, that of expelling from the Inn, that of refusing to call students who were entitled to their call, and, still less, that of disbarring, except through the medium of a judicial committee. The Benchers themselves would probably agree with him that that was a fair restriction. One very grave defect in the constitution of the existing tribunal was that its proceedings were invariably secret. Now, a secret tribunal was objectionable in principle, and altogether alien to the spirit of English law. When Mr. Whittle Harvey, then a distinguished Member of Parliament, had to appear before the Benchers, he was accompanied thither by twenty other Members of that House, many of them Members of great distinction, and one of whom, he believed, was the late Sir James Graham; but not one of them was allowed to be present during the proceedings. He did not mean to cast any blame on the Benchers for following a practice which they found established. There might, moreover, be cases in which it would not be right that the public should be present. His Bill, therefore, provided that if both parties concurred, the case might be heard in private ; but that, unless both concurred, it should be heard in public, with all the guarantees which publicity supplied. When the measure went into Committee, he should be happy to listen to any suggestions for its improvement. He had brought forward the Bill, not in any spirit of hostility to the Inns of Court or the Benchers—far from it. He had no doubt that those gentlemen exercised their jurisdiction, such as it was, to the best of their ability, and with the intention of doing what was right. The Bill was a remedial measure. It was a Bill to enable the Benchers to do justice, to give them powers without which they could not administer justice safely and satisfactorily. The hon. and learned Baronet concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

MR. ROEBUCK, in seconding the Motion, said, he thought the Bill an exceedingly good one. The former attempt of his hon. and learned Friend at legislation on that subject was of a different character, and he had been quite prepared to oppose it. The present measure, however, would give such powers to the Inns of Court as they now wanted, and as would render them what they ought to be—an efficient judicial tribunal. He was glad his hon. and learned Friend had not brought any charge against the Inns of Court. He must say that if they were merely to judge of the tribunal by its effects, it had as it stood attained all the ends for which any tribunal ought to be instituted. They ought to recollect that the Bar of England was overlooked by the Inns of Court, and he appealed to the House and to the world at large, whether there was anything in the result but honour to the Inns of Court. Two classes might be referred to in support of his assertion—the Judges of England—the advocates of England. He asked his hon. and learned Friend to look the world over and pick out any body of men superior, he might almost say equal, to the Judges in this country. As Judges they were above suspicion. He did not mean to say they had always been so ; but they had kept pace with the growing improvement of mankind and the advancing march of civilization, and they stood unchallengable as far as both intellect and honour were concerned. So far as regarded the first-class ; then as to the advocates, he said the character of the English Bar was such that no slur could be cast on it. There was no man, however weak or humble, he might say disgraced even, who could not find among their ranks some one thoroughly honest, able, and willing to defend him. That had been the result, and they need go no further for what the Inns of Court had accomplished. But it was not sufficient to have justice done ; they must have the confidence of the public mind that justice was done ; and no secret tribunal, as this had properly been described, could possess the public confidence. The trials in which he had exercised his power as a Benchers of an Inn of Court had been anything but agreeable. It was a jurisdiction which every member of the Court wished to throw off his shoulders ; but when they were compelled to appear in public with all the dignity of a Court, a great deal of that painful sensation would be removed, and the Inns of Court would more willingly accept accusations than they now did. The consequences of this Bill would not, therefore, be altogether so soft as his hon. and learned Friend imagined. He believed the jurisdiction would be very much more severe, and the consequences to persons charged much more painful than they were at present. It very often happened that the Inns of Court had to try accusations which were felt to be not only a scandal to the profession but most disagreeable to the public at large, and they exercised their jurisdiction with most cautious, almost timid, consideration for the feelings of all parties concerned ; but when the tribunal became an open one, when it exercised all the jurisdiction of a Court of Law, every publicity being given to their proceedings, they would almost necessarily bear more severely on the accused. While he willingly seconded the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend, he must add that when the Bill came into Committee he should invite the consideration of the Attorney General to one of its clauses, by which it was provided that the Inns of Court should be allowed to choose five persons as a judicial Committee, power being reserved to the individual charged to challenge three of them. Now, that appeared an unwise thing. There were many eminent men among the Benchers ; men of high character and renown would, no doubt, be selected by the Bench to act on this Committee, and it would not be agreeable to such men to be challenged. He would much rather the tribunal should consist of three chosen by the Bench, and that no power of challenge should be given. They would not sit as jurymen, but as

Judges, and in no Court in England was any man allowed to challenge the Judge.

ALL HOL. MEMBER: Yes: it courts-martial. Well, he really thought that courts-martial would be the last: it be cited as an example of what would be proper in the administration of justice. Will this exception be believed the tribunal, as it might be constituted, would conciliate the confidence of the public, and the Judicial Committee, as high minded men, would administer justice honourably to all parties.

Motion made, and Question proposed.
"That the Bill be now read a second time."—Sir George Bowyer

MR. LOCKE said, he was not a little astonished at finding the Bill supported by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sheffield. It appeared to him that in case whatever had been made out in favour of the measure. Indeed, both Mover and Seconded admitted that by it the present time nothing could be better than the existing tribunal. But there might be somebody or other not satisfied with it: and it would be mind of this somebody, who had not yet been pointed out, they were to adopt a totally different system. Why should they refer the powers of the Benchers of the Inns of Court to a Select Committee? If he were accused before him he should prefer being tried by the whole body rather than by a selected few of them. The hon. and learned Baronet saw the impropriety of this, for he gave the accused the power of objecting to more than half of the tribunal. What, then, was the use of all this? Where any man was brought up before the Benchers and stated no objection to any of their number, that Benchers invariably retired. In a case which occurred in the Inner Temple last year objection was made to more than one of the Benchers, and they retired from the inquiry. He had thought this was a permissive Bill; but it was no such thing. By the third clause nothing of importance could be done except by this Judicial Committee. That clause enacted that—

"No barrister shall be disbarred or suspended from practice, no barrister or other member of any Inn shall be expelled from such Inn, and no student shall be refused to be called to the Bar, and no person shall be refused admission as a student to any Inn of Court, except by decision of the Judicial Committee elected under the provisions of this Act."

It therefore appeared that the whole powers of the Bench would necessarily devolve upon this Judicial Committee. Now, he maintained there was no necessity for this. The hon. Baronet was bound to show that there had been some want of justice, some impropriety and misconduct on the part of the Benchers of the Inns of Court. There had been no complaint, no petition from the Bar or from the public in favour of the Bill. No voice had been raised in its favour but that of the Mover and the Seconded. If it was to give satisfaction to the public, it ought to be to some section of the public that had a cause of complaint. Although his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sheffield had been longer at the Bar than he had, and although he had been much longer a Benchers of an Inn of Court, still he believed that he (Mr. Locke) had had quite as much experience of the Bar as his hon. and learned Friend. Well, he knew what the feeling of the Bar was. He knew how matters were regulated upon circuit, and how far offences were there investigated. The proceedings on circuit had been always in accordance with the system of administration pursued by the Inns of Court. Now he did not want to see those things altered, and a new tribunal introduced, unless a very strong case could be made out for it. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sheffield did know something as to the general customs of the Bar, but the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Sir George Bowyer) had practised in a peculiar sort of court in a peculiar branch of the law, and therefore had never been thrown into contact with the general body of the Bar, had never gone the circuit, had never dined at the circuit mess, and never saw how charges made against the Members were disposed of. The hon. and learned Member had never seen that beautiful system for keeping men in order by word of mouth—on the cannon's mouth, as it would be, if the hon. and learned Member succeeded in bringing the principle of courts-martial into the Bar—the system of trusting one another, and looking to one another. They had their own circuit officers, their Attorney General, and their Solicitor General, and he was proud to say that he had had the honour to fill both of those positions. But they did not want this "dragooning" system, and trying everybody at the Bar of a Select Committee. In that House they had seen enough of Select Committees, and often had to spend day after day in correcting their proceedings. But what appeal did the Bill give from this Select Committee? [Sir George Bowyer:

The Judges.] The Judges!—the overworked fifteen Judges!—so overworked that they wanted now to appoint five more. And these overworked Judges were to sit as a Court of Appeal from all the Select Committees that might be appointed by the Inns of Court. Since he had had the honour of being a Bencher of the Inner Temple, though it was rather a stirring period, there had during eight years been only three cases; but if this Bill passed he had no doubt there would be plenty of them. He also sympathized strongly with the objection that the new tribunal would be one which certainly would not tend to the benefit of the accused. He therefore felt it his duty to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

MR. NEATE seconded the Amendment. He thought a sufficient case had not been made out by the hon. Baronet for any alteration in the constitution of the Inns of Court. The Benchers, as a body, formed a better tribunal than any Judicial Committee could be. If the subject were at all dealt with, it would be more desirable that the whole powers of the Inns of Court and the trusts reposed in or assumed by them should be inquired into in a full and comprehensive manner. He did not wish the House should in any way pledge itself, either by conferring new rights on the Inns of Court or by subjecting them to new restrictions, to recognize the expediency of continuing their powers.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Locke.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was not inclined, as far as his own personal feeling and opinion went, to offer any objection to the second reading of this Bill; without, however, in any way committing himself as to the course he should take if it reached a later stage without amendment. At the same time he sympathized to some extent with the observation of his hon. Friend behind (Mr. Neate) that it was not altogether satisfactory to deal piecemeal with this, which was a portion of a larger and more general subject—the relation of the Inns of Court to the Bar, and the administration of justice in the country. But his hon. Friend did not appear to bear in mind what had already been done in the way of inquiry on that subject. He also felt considerable regret that the Inns of Court themselves should not have thought it desirable to take a clear and decided course in this matter in order to assist the House in coming to some definite conclusion one way or another. It would have been far more satisfactory that legislation, if desirable, should have taken place with the concurrence of these learned bodies, and with the assistance they could have brought to bear on the subject; and, on the other hand, if it were not desirable, that the House should have been informed by them of the reasons why they had come to that conclusion. It was not the fault either of the Government or of the hon. Baronet (Sir George Bowyer) that this had not been done; on two former occasions the question had been agitated, and upon one of these the hon. Baronet had at his request allowed the measure to stand over, because there was a prospect at that time of something being done by the Inns of Court, an expectation on his part which was undoubtedly well founded, so far as regarded Lincoln's Inn. He, however, ventured to impress on his hon. and learned Friend that it was not satisfactory this subject should be discussed on a Wednesday, when it was exceedingly difficult for many Members of the legal professions to make arrangements to be present, all of whom might give important information to the House. He therefore hoped, if the Bill passed its present stage, that care would be taken to fix both the Committee and third reading for days when all Members of the profession would have a full opportunity of being present. Having said this much he wished the House to bear in mind the position of this question in connection with the general inquiry which some years ago was made into the constitution and functions of the Inns of Court, and what had since been done. He owned it was not satisfactory that this matter should be divorced from other important questions relating to the same subject. In 1854 a Commission was appointed—

"To inquire into the arrangements in the Inns of Court for promoting the study of Law and Jurisprudence, the revenues properly applicable, and the means most likely to secure a systematic and sound education for students of law, and provide satisfactory tests of fitness for admission to the Bar."—[3 Hansard, cxxxi. 147.]

They reported in favour of erecting or re-erecting the several Inns of Court into a great legal University, with a senate or council, elected partly by the Benchers and partly by the outer Bar, but without superseding in all respects the separate powers of the different Societies; and they expressly recommended that the Inns of Court should not be compelled to call to the Bar even those persons who had passed the examination which it was proposed to require; but that they should—

“Retain their present powers with reference to the calling of students to the Bar, and the disbarring of persons after their call, subject to the appeal to the Judges.”—[Ibid.]

He wished the House to understand what had since been done. They had not moved with very great rapidity; yet these learned Societies had shown, at least, a very sincere and zealous disposition to make important improvements in the direction pointed out, although they did not go so far as the Report of the Commission recommended. They had established a bond fide system of legal education, which gave advantages to the students who availed themselves of it, greater than any which prevailed at any former period; and at Lincoln's Inn the opinion of a majority of the Benchers, in a very full council, had been expressed in favour of the principle of a legal University; and he (the Attorney General) was glad to have the opportunity of stating in the House what he said at that meeting—namely, that he should be greatly rejoiced if all the Inns of Court would concur fully in the Report of that Commission. It was founded on a sound principle; he saw no solid objection to its adoption, and he thought that great public advantage might arise from it. In the hope that that might yet be done, he could not look with very great favour on piecemeal legislation, such as that proposed by the present Bill. With regard to this Bill all the hon. Baronet had said dealt with only one of four subjects comprised in it—the disbarring of barristers; that was, he admitted, a power of a penal nature; but he totally disputed the propriety of that observation as applied to the three other subjects dealt with by the Bill. They were not penal proceedings, and it was, he maintained, entirely inexpedient, unless the Inns of Court were to be abolished altogether, to supersede the authority, or interfere with the jurisdiction of the Inns of Court, as to the admission of students, as to calls to the Bar, and as to the exercise of discipline over the members of their own Societies. The case of Mr. Daniel Whittle Harvey had been referred to. He applied to one of the Inns of Court to be called to the Bar, and the Benchers, for reasons satisfactory to themselves, thought fit not to call him. They did not take from him any personal means of livelihood, or deprive him of any advantage he already possessed; but they declined to give him the new position which he asked for, and the reasons on which they had acted were, no doubt, such as they deemed satisfactory. The gentleman whom they had refused to call subsequently obtained a seat in that House, and obtained the appointment of a Committee to sit as a court of review on the judgment of the Benchers. On that Committee sat two gentlemen whose names had been mentioned—Mr. O'Connell and Sir James Graham—no doubt very distinguished men, but politicians who might have entered that Committee with minds not altogether free from a political bias. He could not therefore look on the opinion of such a tribunal as entitled to the smallest weight as opposed to that of the Benchers. Then they came to the crowning argument of a Committee consisting of twenty Members of that House bringing their whole authority to bear against the decision of the Benchers. The House of Commons in its own place had great authority, but in this matter it had really none at all. He could not therefore admit that the argument from the single case of Mr. Daniel Whittle Harvey had any force whatever. Still, however, speaking for himself, and separating the subject of disbarring from the rest, with great respect for his two hon. and learned Friends (Mr. Locke and Mr. Neate), he must say he agreed substantially with what had been said by the hon. and learned Mover and Seconder. He did not think the present constitution of the tribunal was satisfactory, or fit for the discharge of what was not undeserving the name of a criminal jurisdiction. He had himself sat when questions of a painful nature were brought before the Benchers, and he was struck by the anxious desire which every person evinced to do justice; but it was impossible to secure the uniform attendance of the same Benchers, and a difficulty arose respecting the evidence in consequence of the absence of any power to administer an oath. Without pledging himself to the Bill, he did think, as the hon. and learned Mover had taken no steps to deal with the subject themselves, and had not of their opinions upon this Bill, that it would be wrong not to give it a second reading.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, that he should be perfectly ready to consider, and if possible concur in any amendments that might be proposed in Committee by his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General. He had referred to the case of Mr. Daniel Whittle Harvey for the purpose of showing that the Benchers could not satisfactorily administer justice without the power of compelling the attendance of witnesses. In that case a witness refused to attend before the Benchers; the Select Committee upstairs, however, compelled his attendance, heard his evidence, and recorded their opinion that probably the Benchers would have come to the same conclusion with the Committee if they had possessed the power of compelling his attendance, and had heard his testimony. The Attorney General had admitted that the Benchers were too numerous, and it was therefore difficult to secure in any case the attendance of the same Judges throughout. Admitting that no special complaint had been made against the present system, he contended there were strong arguments for some change. The hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) had made a speech worthy of the days of Lord Eldon, and had used the old Tory arguments in favour of the present system. He (Sir George Bowyer) believed he had made out a case for some alteration, and he was perfectly ready to allow the Bill to go into Committee, and to take into consideration the suggestion made by the Attorney General, and he hoped his hon. and learned Friend would not press his Amendment, but allow the Bill to pass a second reading.

MR. LOCKE said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

METROPOLITAN TOLL BRIDGES BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS moved that this Bill be read a second time. He said he was willing to have it referred to a Select Committee, and thus neutralize any meditated opposition. The advantage of increased facilities for crossing the Thames must be obvious to every one, and to no class would this improvement be more favourable than to the working people, who now find great difficulty in obtaining houses and lodgings on the north side of the river. In the course of a century, while the population had greatly increased, the habitations for the working classes had not borne a proportional increase, but there was a tendency rather to diminish accommodation for them. In fact, the people were now cramped and confined to an extent which was most undesirable. Something should be done by that House in order to facilitate the means of crossing the Thames. It was necessary to try to purchase the existing toll bridges before projecting new ones. The Bill now before the House was permissive, and would give powers to the Board of Works and the City of London to treat with the proprietors of Southwark, Waterloo, Chelsea, and other metropolitan bridges, including Deptford Creek, upon which tolls were charged. There were some bridges across the River Lea which he thought ought to be included, but there was such a difficulty in dealing with so many jurisdictions that he had not ventured to bring them within the scope of this Bill. Since the question of tolls had been discussed last year there had been some attempt on the part of the corporation of London to treat with the proprietors of Southwark Bridge, and a temporary arrangement had been made by which the tolls had been stopped, and this arrangement would last for two or three months longer; but if powers were not given to the proprietors to make a permanent agreement with the corporation of London, the inhabitants would have the mortification of seeing the toll-gates replaced. He might mention that while over the Thames there were only three free bridges, there were twenty-seven at Paris over the Seine, and many of those twenty-seven had been opened during the last few years, while over the Thames there had been no new free bridge opened for nearly a century. Since the tolls on Southwark Bridge had been removed there had been a great increase of traffic, and the working classes were very anxious that the tolls upon all bridges should be abolished, so that they might have an opportunity of obtaining free access between the north and south sides of the river. On the south side land and house-rent were cheaper, and there was more room for the increasing population of the metropolis. There was scarcely a stronger instance of the crowded state of the poor population on the south side than that which was provided in the last Session upon the bill for the new law courts, which it will show that some seven acres of ground there was a population of 4,200 persons—a number equal to the population of a moderate-sized town. It was the duty of that House to enlarge the area for the free circulation of the working classes as much as possible. Eleven years ago a Committee had been appointed, of which Mr. Sturt was the head, to consider the question of tolls on bridges, and in the subsequent year another Committee, presided over by the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme, reported upon the same subject, and both Committees were unanimously of opinion that the tolls upon the bridges should be abolished, and the accommodation for the working classes increased; but since that time nothing whatever had been done. He earnestly hoped that this Bill would lead to some practical step being taken. He believed the metropolis was rich enough to secure the accommodation required. It possessed real estate property of the value of £15,000,000, with a population of 1,000,000 daily increasing in numbers.

Mr. JACKSON seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—Mr. Alderman Solomon.

Sir GEORGE GREY said, there could be no doubt whatever as to the desirability of the object sought to be effected by the Bill, which was to extend as far as possible the facilities for traffic between the north and south sides of the river, and to abolish the tolls. The whole question for consideration was as to the best means by which that object could be obtained. The Government had no objection to the second reading of this Bill upon the understanding that it should be referred to a Select Committee, which would have the power of inquiring into the whole subject. He hoped from the concluding sentence of the hon. Member that the City of London would be found rich enough to effect the object of the Bill without taxing their neighbours. The Government would object to the 6th clause by which an additional duty of 1d. per ton was proposed to be put upon coals brought within the metropolitan district. He should be very glad to see the whole subject inquired into, and he hoped the City of London would be found rich enough to purchase the tolls.

Mr. LUTHER said, he wished to make one or two observations, inasmuch as his name was on the back of the Bill. It had been placed there simply because it was on the back of the Bill of last year, which was a very different measure from that now before the House. He was not at all pleased with the present Bill, because it proposed to tax it an especial degree of discrimination, viz., while they would be very well content to pay a general rate levied throughout the whole metropolis for the abolition of tolls, objected to the extra duty of 1d. per ton upon coals coming into the metropolis, and the special tax proposed to be laid upon those ratepayers who resided in the neighbourhood of the bridges upon which the tolls would be abolished. The Bill of last Session was pure and simple in its object—namely, the removal of the tolls by the means of a uniform rate throughout the whole of the metropolis. No objection could be taken to that, because all who lived in London would be benefited by the measure. Putting an extra duty tax upon coals, as objected, was very objectionable. The manufacturing interests with which he was connected, as Member for Southwark, objected to that additional cost, because it would place them in a still more unfavourable position as competitors with manufacturers in the country, many of whom were enabled to obtain coals at 2s. 6d. whereas the price paid in London was generally 25s. a ton. Waterloo Bridge afforded accommodation to the inhabitants of the whole of the metropolis as a means of access to the South Western Railway. Why should a special rate be thrown upon his constituents for the opening of that bridge, which came into a corner of the borough? He could not see that any particular advantage would accrue to those living at the ends of the bridges, beyond that which could arise to the metropolis generally by the adoption of any such measure as that before the House. Again, with regard to Southwark Bridge, it was to be opened in order to relieve the traffic on London Bridge, and the ratepayers complained most strongly of the proposal to levy a special tax for this object, and he had presented petitions from vestries and all the local bodies in his constituency against this extra rate. A Bill, he believed, had already passed during this Session giving the sanction of that House to the Corporation of London and the Mayor of Works purchasing that it would therefore be taken out of the present Bill. When the twelve-months expired for which the City had made arrangements for the stoppage of the tolls, the bridge, no doubt, would be purchased by the corporation. A Bill had also been introduced with reference to Chelsea Bridge by the hon. Baronet the Member for Westminster (Sir John Shelley). Then there was Putney Bridge, for the purchase of which, by a new company, a Bill had passed that House last year, and an award had been made that the new company should pay the proprietors of the present bridge the sum of £40,000. If it were to be understood that the extra duty on coals, and the special tax on his constituents to which he had referred, should not be levied, but that it was to go to and come from the Select Committee pure and simple as the Bill of last year, he would not oppose the second reading of the Bill.

MR. AYRTON said, he had not the slightest objection to the course suggested by the Secretary for the Home Department. He believed it was the wish of the House that if the Bill passed a second reading, it would be on the understanding that they should not pledge themselves to a single clause in it. They merely desired to express a general opinion that it was extremely desirable that the tolls upon these bridges should be abolished, provided proper means were found for accomplishing that object without doing an injustice to any one. One objection to the Bill was that it was not sufficiently comprehensive. There was a bridge in the borough which he represented afflicted with such a toll that the collector felt it necessary to arm himself with a red-hot poker with the view of enforcing the money from those who might attempt to escape. Such a bridge as that ought to be included either in the present Bill or in any inquiry that might take place. Another omission was the toll upon roads. He could not discover the distinction in principle between the toll upon roads and that upon bridges. They were equally objectionable. Roads were found in the middle of London where persons had to pay a rate of toll which caused a greater obstruction to traffic than that levied on the bridges. It was desirable, therefore, that in any further inquiry into this subject, the whole question of tolls on roads and bridges should be referred to a Select Committee, in order that it should be ascertained whether any means could be devised for the purpose of relieving the metropolis from all these tolls. If the House adopted this course, he felt confident that the inquiry would lead to some practical result. He would be sorry to see any increase made on the duty upon coal, or any unjust tax levied for the object of the Bill. Both the corporation of London and the Metropolitan Board of Works had, he considered, neglected their duty with regard to tolls, because, instead of the inconvenience decreasing, it had largely increased, assisted by Private Bills. The question demanded serious consideration. He suggested that the Bill promoted by the hon. Member for Westminster should also be referred to the Select Committee.

MR. LIDDELL said, he was afraid, by assenting to the second reading, that the House would be embarking upon a dangerous course of action in regard to the question involved. It appeared to him that it might be subsequently thrown in their teeth by the promoters of this Bill that the House, in assenting to the second reading, had sanctioned a principle which they considered an important step gained. The mode of obtaining the money for carrying out the objects desired was so mixed up with the main question that it was difficult to separate them. It appeared, therefore, to him that it would be a better course to appoint a Select Committee to consider the whole question of metropolitan tolls, rather than to proceed as by this measure by piecemeal. As to the mode in which it was proposed to supply the funds which would be required in consequence of the abolition of tolls, he had to remind them that there was already levied on coal brought into the metropolis a tax of not less than 1s. 1d. a ton. The coal duty was originally imposed for the special purpose of building a coal exchange, which had been accomplished, but the tax still remained, and was now applied to metropolitan improvements. This should serve as a warning against imposing any additional tax, more especially as such a proposal was opposed to all the present principles of legislation. He had some objection to the Bill, but if the House thought that the whole question would be better considered by a Committee up-stairs he should not object to that course.

MR. JACKSON said, that the Bill fell short of the desired object. It did not embrace a sufficient area or include a sufficient number of the tolls already existing. It ought, in his opinion, to take in tolls of every description throughout the metropolitan area. A rate should be levied over the metropolitan area to purchase all these bridges, and everything else which was an impediment to free circulation in the metropolis. He presided over a Committee on this subject, and the unanimous opinion of the Committee was that a rate should be levied to buy the tolls and to improve the roads.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON said, he did not see why the metropolis should not be placed on the same footing as the counties throughout England with reference to bridges, where the expense of building and maintenance was paid out of the county rate. By adopting the present Bill, though the tax of 1*d.* per ton on coals might not be a heavy one, the poor would be taxed for the advantage of the rich. It would be very desirable if the Committee would take this point of defraying the expenses by a county rate into their consideration.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, it was agreed on all hands that it was advisable to get rid of tolls as far as possible, whether in London or elsewhere, and the question was simply as to how the object was to be carried out. It had been agreed that this Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, on the understanding that the House should not be pledged to any of the provisions of the Bill, and the Committee would simply consider how these tolls could be done away with. He had the greatest possible objection to an extra duty being put upon coals, or a special tax upon those persons who did not go about in carriages to relieve those who did. Nothing could be more absurd than the 9th clause of the Bill, which gave the Metropolitan Board of Works power to levy a special tax upon vestries and districts in which the bridges were situated. He had presented several petitions against this proposal from the inhabitants in the Strand, and he would ask how the Strand could be supposed to be benefited more than any other district in the metropolis from the opening of Waterloo Bridge to free traffic. To put a special tax upon the Strand rate-payers for such an object would be unjust. He agreed with the hon. Member opposite, that a county rate ought to be levied, if necessary, for the object of the Bill.

Mr. Jackson

Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>, and committed to a Select Committee.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee, to inquire into the existing Tolls on Roads and Bridges within the Metropolis, and the best means of abolishing them.—(Mr. Ayrton.)

And, on Wednesday, May 10, Select Committee nominated as follows :

Mr. Alderman SALOMONS, Mr. CUBITT, Mr. JACKSON, Sir BALDWIN LEIGHTON, Mr. AYRTON, Mr. CHARLES TURNER, Sir JOHN SHELLEY, Mr. LIDDELL, Mr. LOCKE KING, Mr. STANHOPE, Mr. ADAM, Sir WILLIAM JOLLIFFE, Mr. COWPER, Lord JOHN MANNERS, Mr. HANBURY, and Mr. TITE:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

LOCOMOTIVES ON ROADS BILL.

[BILL 63.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Clause 1 (Certain Sections of "Locomotives Act, 1861," repealed.)

MR. AYRTON said, that on the introduction of the original Bill the promoters of the measure appeared to be very much in love with the Secretary of State, for in spite of his opposition to the plan the regulation of these locomotives had been lodged in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman. He wished for an explanation why the supervision of the use of locomotives on roads by the Secretary of State for the Home Department was to be dispensed with and no other provision of a similar character made. He was opposed to the Secretary of State being made supervisor of the actions of the whole of the community, and he was glad that that part of the Act had broken down. He hoped that in future no Bills brought before the House would allow the Secretary of State to exercise a similar power. He should very much like to see some provision made with reference to the exceptional condition of the metropolis, where the horse and carriage traffic was so much greater than in ordinary towns. He should like, therefore, to receive from the hon. Member who had charge of this Bill an assurance of the introduction of some special clause referring to this point. The slower these engines travelled the greater obstruction would they offer to the ordinary traffic, and he almost believed that the metropolis a speed of ten miles an hour would be better than two, as less would ensue.

GREY said, that he desired to call the attention of the House to one clause, as the purport of the whole Bill was virtually embodied in it. By the Act of 1861 for regulating the use of locomotives on the public roads, power was given to the Secretary of State, upon representations made to him of danger and inconvenience arising therefrom, to restrict their use in any district by prohibiting their use during certain portions of the day. He was not anxious to retain that power, but he thought it ought not to be abolished without substituting some other means of control. He was not aware that this legislation had broken down, or of the grounds upon which the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets made that assertion. There was no law determining the hours at which these engines should run, but the power for regulating their time in different districts was intrusted to the Secretary of State. Since the passing of the former Act he had received several representations from the inhabitants of certain districts, backed by the magistrates of the petty sessions or of those districts. Those representations had been referred to the chief constables of the counties for examinations into the facts alleged in them, and though the use of these locomotives had in no instance been forbidden their employment had in several cases been restricted to certain hours—generally from ten or eleven o'clock at night until six or seven in the morning. Those restrictions, he had reason to believe, had given great satisfaction to the inhabitants of the district, though they had also led to what he regarded as a reasonable complaint on the part of the machine owners and of the agriculturists, who urged that such restrictions interfered with their operations, as the engines were required to be constantly travelling from one farm to another. At the same time it should be remembered that these engines were formidable affairs in narrow lanes. Instances of fatal accidents had occurred, and it was only when the representations had been shown to be reasonable that the order regulating the hours had been issued. He had no reason to believe that any complaint had been made of the undue exercise of the discretion vested in the Secretary of State. He should be glad to see some other mode devised by which they could provide for the safety of the public without any undue interference with the extensive use of these machines for agricultural purposes.

The only restriction imposed by the Bill was that these machines should not travel faster than four miles in the country and two miles in towns. The hon. and learned Member objected to the power being vested in the Secretary of State. He (Mr. Ayrton) wished, however, that the use of these machines should be restrained in the metropolis; but if it was unsafe to use them in London, surely it was equally so in Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, and other large towns. He should be quite willing to resign the power that was lodged in his hands. The clause before the House, however, proposed an unconditional repeal of this power, relying simply upon the provisions contained in other portions of the measure.

MR. WYKEHAM MARTIN said, that during the last seven years locomotives had been used in the streets of Rochester and Chatham without any danger having arisen, and he had received a certificate from the municipal authorities stating that during the seven years they had been so employed no accident had occurred. They were used in the narrow streets of Rochester and Chatham, and also in what was called the "Khyber Pass," the very narrow street which connected Chatham with Rochester, and no accidents had resulted therefrom. He had continually met them in the street, and they passed his own door day after day. Horses soon became perfectly accustomed to their appearance, and were much more liable to fright on passing underneath a screened bridge with a locomotive passing overhead than they were on meeting the engines in the streets. Leamington and Warwick were both famed for hunting, which was extensively engaged in in the neighbourhood of these towns. Consequently the number of high-spirited horses was much larger in these towns than would usually be found elsewhere, and yet the continual use of locomotives had only been attended, to his knowledge, by one accident, and in that instance the locomotive was passing over a screened bridge.

MR. HENLEY moved the postponement of this clause until the remaining clauses had been disposed of. As it was merely a repealing clause he thought it better it should be postponed until they could see what they could do with the body of the Bill to give facilities for the use of these locomotives on common roads. He believed that the general wish was that as much facility as possible in the employment of these engines should be granted to the agriculturists; but it was the duty of the House at the same time to protect the public from the inconveniences which might be caused by their use. High bred horses usually would not get frightened at meeting these engines because they possessed pluck enough to go ahead without caring for anything, but the low bred horses would generally become timid on seeing the locomotives. He hoped that the hon. Member who had charge of the Bill would agree to the postponement of the clause.

MR. HOLLAND consented.

Clause 2 (Imposing Rules for the manner of working Locomotives on Turnpike Roads and Highways.)

MR. HOLLAND moved the insertion of the words "on foot." He said the effect would be that the man who accompanied the engine for the purpose of keeping a lookout would be compelled to walk, and would thus be able to perform his duty in a manner which would better secure the safety of the public.

MR. FELLOWES said, he should be sorry to oppose so valuable a Bill as respected agricultural interests, but they had a duty to perform to the public, whose safety they had charge of. He thought that the man ought to walk some distance in advance of the engine, and that the safety of the public would not be insured by a distance of sixty yards between the attendant and the engine itself. He believed that 100 yards would be better, and he therefore moved an Amendment securing that provision.

SIR WILLIAM MILES said, he believed sixty yards to be far enough. The word "precede" would be quite sufficient. A man at the distance of 100 yards would often not be seen at all by the driver of the engine, especially near towns. It would therefore practically be of no advantage.

MR. BENTINCK said, he was glad to perceive a disposition on the part of the House to regard with some favour the interests of the agriculturists, who as a class did not generally receive that consideration from the House to which they were entitled. He believed that the safety of the public would be best secured by the attendant walking immediately in advance of the engine instead of at so great a distance as sixty yards. He thought the words "on foot" should be retained, omitting either the "sixty yards" or the "100 yards."

COLONEL SYKES said, that there appeared to be a panic with reference to the safety of the public, especially when it was borne in mind that these engines had constantly been travelling about the country for years. Horses were much more apt to take fright from seeing the heaps of stones which were usually kept at the sides of roads and the "guys" who were employed in breaking them up than they were at the sight of these engines. The locomotives generally travelled only from farm to farm, and he could not therefore see any necessity for compelling the attendant to precede the engine either by sixty or 100 yards.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY thought the attendant might as well be in the next parish as precede the engine by 100 yards. He believed it would be absurd to specify the precise distance at which the man should walk, and he should therefore move the insertion of the words "not more than sixty yards."

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 4, to leave out the word "less," and insert the word "more."—(Sir John Shelley.)

MR. JOHN HARDY said, that 100 yards was not an inch too far, as a horse and carriage driving rapidly in a narrow lane would occasionally be upon the engine before its proximity could be ascertained in sufficient time to prevent an accident. He should certainly vote for the man's preceding the engine by at least sixty yards.

MR. WARNER said, the real security to the public lay in the liability which the owners of these engines incurred in case of accident, and that the danger arising from noise in working and other similar causes might be obviated in the manufacture of the locomotives.

MR. D. ROBERTSON said, that the best plan would be to postpone the Bill for the present. He thought that the regulation of the locomotives should be left to the local authorities, who would best be able to determine what was necessary.

SIR EDWARD DERING said, he thought it hardly possible that the Committee could decide accurately the precise distance at which the attendant should precede the locomotive. In a straight road in the country it might be desirable that the man should be 100 yards or even more in advance, but in a town or in a narrow lane with turnings, the distance would oftentimes be curtailed with much advantage.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON said, that unless the attendant were compelled to precede the engine he would, except in a town, be in all probability usually engaged in conversation with the man on the engine.

The Committee divided: — Ayes 32; Noes 90: Majority 58.

MR. FELLOWES then moved to insert 100 instead of sixty yards.

Another Amendment proposed, in same line, to leave out the word "sixty," and insert the words "one hundred."—(Mr. Fellowes.)

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he thought the Amendment would defeat the hon. Gentleman's object.

SIR JOHN HAY said, it would be better to leave the responsibility upon the persons in charge of engines.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 73; Noes 35: Majority 38.

Upon the Motion of Mr. HUNT, the following words were inserted:—

"And shall warn the riders and drivers of horses of the approach of such locomotive."

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH proposed to add the words—

"All superfluous steam shall be condensed in such a manner as that no steam shall blow off while the locomotive is upon the road."

MR. HOLLAND said, he thought there was no necessity for the Amendment, as there was no difficulty in rendering locomotives harmless upon roads. The protection of the public had been fully considered by those who had drawn up the Bill.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, if the Committee did not accept his Amendment, he must leave the responsibility for any danger that might arise to those who opposed it.

Upon the Motion of Mr. HOLLAND, the following words were added:—

"Sixthly. Any person in charge of any such locomotive shall provide two efficient lights to be affixed conspicuously, one at each side, on the front of the same, between the hours of one hour after sunset and one hour before sunrise."

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the House, in sanctioning the use of these locomotives under certain restrictions, should take care that they did not hamper the right of persons to bring actions for injuries sustained by them from the results of any carelessness on the part of the owners of locomotives or their servants. He, therefore, moved to add the words—

"Provided that nothing herein contained shall affect the right of any person to recover damages in an action at law in respect of any injury or damages sustained by him in consequence of the use of such locomotive."

MR. HUNT said, he wished to call attention to the provision in the clause affixing penalties upon conviction for certain acts, but it did not appear what parties were to be liable to those penalties. It could not always be the owner of the machine, because he might send out the proper number of attendants, and one of them might neglect his duty, in which case it would be unjust to punish the owner.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he thought the clause did require some amendment in the case suggested by the hon. Gentleman, and it should be considered before the Report.

MR. HENLEY said, he hoped the clause would be made more clear, because, as it stood, he could not tell who would be responsible for anything. As the words "not more" had been introduced, it seemed as though the men in charge of the engine should have a string round their wrist to prevent them from exceeding the limit of distance and exposing themselves to the mercies of informers.

Clause 4 (Size and Weight of Locomotives which may be used.)

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to call the attention of the hon. Member in charge of the Bill to the words in this clause which were different from those of the second clause. In the second clause the words "turnpike road or public highway" were used, but in the clause the words were "turnpike or other road." As a different construction would be placed upon the different words, he should propose to strike out the word "other" and insert "public highway."

MR. FELLOWES said, that as the locomotive machines might be nine feet in width, and the lanes and by-roads some-road would have to be left unploughed. He had often seen steam ploughs at work, but he never remembered an accident from any horse taking fright.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON said, he did not see why these engines when used for ploughing should be treated with more favour than a thrashing engine, which was not allowed to be at work within twenty-five yards of the road except under a screen.

MR. HUNT said, he thought the risk of one of these engines being at work within twenty-five yards of the road was no greater than that caused by level crossings, which were now permitted all over the country. Horses, in fact, were getting more used every day to steam-engines and their noises, and were not so apt to be frightened by them.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that that was the case, but he thought there must always be danger when an engine was at work so near the road. If the engine when it got into the field was to be fixed, why could it not be placed on the side furthest away from the road? If that could not be done with convenience, he thought the safety of the public would be best consulted by leaving the law as it at present stood.

MR. HOLLAND said, he should have no objection to add the following words to the clause :—

“Provided a person shall be stationed in the road, and employed to signal the engine driver when it shall be necessary to stop and to assist horses and carriages drawn by horses in passing the same.”

Clause 6 (How Penalties may be recovered.)

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to ask what was the object of saying that the summons should be served seven days before the hearing? Ordinarily petty sessions in the country were held weekly; and the provision in question would have the effect of postponing a decision for a fortnight. Unless there was good reason for a contrary course, he hoped the clause would be omitted.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the Bill followed the course prescribed by the Act—the Locomotives Act 1861—which it was intended to amend. The clause was unnecessary.

Clause 7 (Short Title of Act.)

Clause 8 (Extent of Act.)

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the existing Act contained the clause (which restricted the Act to Great Britain), which it was therefore unnecessary to re-enact.

SIR COLMAN O’LOGHLEN said, he wished the provisions of the Bill to be extended to Ireland, and proposed to bring up a clause on the Report to effect that object.

Clause 1 (Certain Sections of “The Locomotives Act, 1861,” repealed.)

MR. AYRTON said, the clause gave no control whatever over the passage of locomotive engines in large towns. He proposed that the local authorities in the metropolis, and in large cities, should have power to draw up certain rules on the subject, which should be approved by the Secretary of State. He objected to the Secretary of State issuing regulations at the instance of the police authorities.

MR. HOLLAND said, the promoters of the Bill had no objection to meet the views of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets so far as they related to the metropolitan area, but a good deal of inconvenience might arise were engines used for agricultural purposes compelled to make a long round out of their direct course in order to avoid all the large county towns.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets would lead the House to imagine that the Secretary of State never consulted any persons but the police with reference to the regulations necessary to be issued respecting locomotive engines; but the truth was that no order had ever been made in reference to them except at the request of the local authorities, backed by the magistrates of the district, and by the chief constable of the district. No order of the kind had ever been made at the sole instance of the police. He thought some provisions ought to be made for the control of those engines in large county towns as well as in the metropolis. He suggested, therefore, that the hon. Member should bring up a clause on the Report to that effect. He wished the local municipal authorities in every city and borough should have power to transfer the law of which provisions are made in the Bill to the Police Regulations and to the Police Act.

Mr. BARRY said that the Bill would be a very good one, and that it would be a very good one.

Sir WILLIAM MILES said, that if the public wanted a good body of police they must not object to provide for a liberal superannuation; but he advised his hon. Friend, under the circumstances, to withdraw his proposed clauses.

MR. WHALLEY said, he wished to ask what would be the nature and object of the Committee to be appointed.

MR. BARING stated, that the Committee, the appointment of which he recommended, would consider only the superannuation of the county, and not that of the metropolitan police.

MR. HOWES said, he would withdraw the clause.

ASSASSINATION OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN.—NOTICE.

EARL RUSSELL gave notice that on Monday next he would move—

"An humble Address to Her Majesty to express the Sorrow and Indignation of this House at the Assassination of the President of the United States; and to pray Her Majesty to communicate these Sentiments on the Part of this House to the Government of the United States."

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that he hoped that the noble Earl and the Government had taken pains to ascertain that there was nothing unusual—he did not say unprecedented, because the circumstances were almost unprecedented—but he hoped that the Government had taken pains to ascertain that there was nothing in the form of the Motion rendering it in the slightest degree doubtful whether a unanimous assent would be given by the House to the Motion as proposed. With regard to the substance of the Motion, he was quite certain that the expression of sorrow and indignation at the atrocious act which has been committed in the United States, would not only meet with the unanimous assent of their Lordships' House, but would represent the feeling of every man, woman, and child in Her Majesty's dominions.

EARL RUSSELL said, that the noble Earl was correct in saying that the circumstances were happily unprecedented; and he hoped that there would be nothing in the form of the Motion which would cause objection to be taken to it.

DISTRICT CHURCH TITHES BILL. (No. 45.) SECOND READING.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said, there were two Acts of Parliament under which Peel parishes were formed, under both of which powers were taken to form separate and distinct parishes. The object of this Bill was to enable incumbents of district churches to exchange any portion of their existing endowments, whether in land or sums of money, for any tithes that might exist within the limits of those parishes. Such a provision would complete the work, and give to these new parishes a full and distinctive parochial character. The Bill gave power to rectors or vicars to agree with the incumbents of district churches for the annexation by the latter of the tithes arising in respect of property situate within the district. Such agreements, however, were not to be valid unless they were assented to, on the part of the rector or vicar, by the Archbishop or Bishop of the diocese, and, on the part of the incumbent, by the patron of the district church and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. He also proposed that, in any case in which the tithes arising within the limits of parishes and district churches became part of the endowment of that church, the incumbent should receive the designation of rector or vicar, according as the tithes were either rectorial or vicarial. That proposal in the Bill was only prospective; but he was informed that there were a great many churches in which this exchange of tithes had taken place, and he proposed at a future stage to make this clause retrospective, so that where any tithes had been already assigned the incumbent should be designated a rector or vicar accordingly.

Bill read 2<sup>a</sup>, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

QUESTION.

LORD CHELMSFORD, in rising to call attention to the imprisonment and severe treatment to which a British Consul and other British subjects had been exposed by the orders of the Emperor of Abyssinia, and to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What steps had been taken to relieve our fellow-countrymen from the severities to which they had been subjected, and to which it was believed they were still subjected, said, that several of our fellow-countrymen had been kept in imprisonment at Gondar, exposed to the most cruel sufferings, and a general impression prevailed that these sufferings were attributable to the want of prompt and judicious measures on the part of the English Foreign Office. Mr. Plowden, the British Consul at Massowah, a few years ago was met by an overpowering body of the rebels against the Emperor of Abyssinia. He was taken prisoner, but was ransomed, and afterwards died of his wounds. In July, 1862, Captain Cameron, the new Consul, who was the bearer of certain presents sent by this Government to the Emperor of Abyssinia, met with a most flattering reception at the hands of that Sovereign, who expressed a desire that the negotiation for a treaty between the Government of Abyssinia and this country, which had fallen through in 1849, should be renewed. An autograph letter of the Emperor to Her Majesty was delivered to Captain Cameron in November, 1862, who thereupon forwarded it to this country; the Emperor being at that time with certain did not arrive here until February, 1863. Shortly after this an invasion of the northern parts of Abyssinia by the Egyptian Government took place. Captain Cameron endeavoured to settle the dispute, but was compelled to desist from his pacific endeavours in consequence of the remonstrances of the Egyptian authorities. Captain Cameron having ceased to exert himself in favour of the Abyssinian Emperor, that Sovereign felt himself much aggrieved, especially as he had received no reply to his autograph letter to this country. Unfortunately, further cause of offence arose. In November, 1863, Mr. Stern a missionary, sent out by the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews, sought an interview with the Emperor. He was accompanied by two servants as interpreters; but as they did not perform their duty to the satisfaction of the Emperor, he ordered them to be scourged, and one of them was beaten to death. Mr. Stern, in his excitement, turned away from the sight and bit his tongue; and he was thereupon ordered to be beaten, and for some time his life was in danger, and he was chained to an Abyssinian soldier. Two days afterwards, the missionaries, including several ladies, were seized and sent to a prison, where they were treated very rigorously; and all the Europeans in Abyssinia, including Captain Cameron, were loaded with chains and put in prison. The Emperor called a great council of his grandees, and before it Mr. Stern and Mr. Rosenthal, another missionary, were charged with using offensive expressions, which amounted, in the eyes of the Abyssinian law, to high treason. The Council found the prisoners guilty, and some of the grandees were of opinion that they ought to be put to death. Fortunately, milder counsels prevailed, and these unfortunate persons were ordered back to prison. As if to complicate matters just at this time a letter arrived from England, which, instead of being a reply to the Emperor's letter, simply directed Captain Cameron to return to his post and not to interfere further in the Egyptian dispute. In consequence of this neglect of Her Majesty's Government to reply to the Emperor's letter, Captain Cameron was loaded with heavier fetters, and was treated with far greater severity, and the heads of the prisoners were chained night and day. Captain Cameron was ordered to get the Emperor's letter to England:—

"Myself, Stern, Rosenthal, Cairns, Bardel, and M'Killoie, are all in chains here. Flad, Staiger, Branders, and Cornelius, sent to Gaffat to work for the Emperor. No release till a civil answer to Emperor's letter arrives. Mrs. Flad, Mrs. Rosenthal, and children, all of us well. Write this to Aden and to Mrs. Stern, 16, Lincoln's Inn Fields.

"To C. Speedy, Esq., Massowah."

This letter did not reach England until May 25, 1864, and on the 3rd of June a question was put in the House of Commons to Mr. Layard the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, upon this subject; in answer to which that hon. Gentleman stated that Her Majesty's Government would, of course, do all they possibly could to obtain the release of Captain Cameron and of the missionaries, and that the most likely way would be to send some person to that country in order to get them set free; but Her Majesty's Government were afraid that any person sent for that purpose would be likely to share the fate of the Consul and the missionaries rather than succeed in obtaining their release. The question was, how to get at the Emperor without endangering the liberty of others; but he trusted that means would soon be found of communicating with the Emperor; and that the subject was under the serious consideration of the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office. The autograph letter of the Emperor arrived in this country in February, 1863, and remained unnoticed until June, 1864, and then what the Government did amounted to a condemnation of their own conduct. In that month a letter was prepared to be sent to the Emperor of Abyssinia; but if it was right to send a letter in June, 1864, much more necessary was it to have sent a letter shortly after the month of February, 1863. There could be no doubt that if a letter had been sent with presents and conveyed by an Englishman of some rank, the release of these unfortunate prisoners would have taken place. At last when a letter was sent the person selected to deliver it was Mr. Rassam, an Asiatic gentleman, Assistant Superintendent to the Political Agent at Aden; a man of great experience and ability, but just the sort of person who ought not to have been selected for the purpose; and the consequences which occurred were just such as might have been expected. Mr. Rassam took the autograph letter, as also one of introduction, to the Coptic Bishop. The letter of introduction he sent to the Emperor; but he received no reply, and up to March of the present year Mr. Rassam appeared to have received no reply to his intimation that he had the autograph letter. On the 17th January, 1865, a letter was received from Mr. Stern, from the prison of Amba Magdala, in Southern Abyssinia, in which he stated that sixteen months of unparalleled sufferings had rolled over him; that he was not mad, sick, or dead, but must be attributed to the interposition of a gracious Providence, and describing generally the nature of these sufferings, which had not been put an end to, although a friendly letter had arrived from the British Government. Let their Lordships, then, consider the situation of those unhappy persons during the whole of the present year. Under those circumstances, he thought that he was fairly entitled to ask why the autograph letter of the Emperor of Abyssinia, which arrived in February, 1863, was utterly disregarded until the month of June, 1864; because the omission to answer that letter might have occasioned, or, at all events, considerably aggravated the sufferings of the prisoners. He (Lord Chelmsford) could not move formally for papers, as he had not given notice for the particular documents which he wished to have laid upon the table, but he would take an early opportunity to do so.

EARL RUSSELL said, he felt a great difficulty in addressing the House on this subject, lest anything which fell from him might give offence to the King of Abyssinia and expose Consul Cameron and the other prisoners to greater hardships than they had yet suffered. He would briefly refer to the chief circumstances connected with this matter. The former Consul, Mr. Plowden, had been very well received in Abyssinia, and when he died the King paid respect to his remains. When Captain Cameron was appointed Consul he was ordered to convey presents to the King and a letter from Her Majesty thanking him for the kindness he had shown to the late Consul. But at the same time the Consul's proper place was at Massowah, and he would have returned there had he not been violently interrupted on his journey. The noble and learned Lord (Lord Chelmsford) seemed to think that when the King had written an autograph letter to the Queen it would have been a very simple matter to answer it civilly at once, and to send out some person to deliver the reply. But many difficulties stood in the way. The letter of the King of Abyssinia asked permission to send an embassy to this country. The state of Abyssinia was unsettled at that time, and it had become more unsettled since. The King complained that the Turks and Egyptians encroached on his territory, and he wanted the English and French to interfere and take part in his wars — a course which Her Majesty's Government thought by no means desirable. It became, therefore, matter for consideration what answer should be given; and the question being one of Eastern policy, the Secretary of State for India had to be consulted before any answer was returned. It appeared that in the meantime the King of Abyssinia had taken great offence at the conduct of some missionaries. On this fact being officially communicated to Her Majesty's Government, Her Majesty was advised to forward a letter to the King, replying to certain complaints made, and expressing regret at the occasion of them. The noble and learned Lord seemed to think that Mr. Rassam was not a proper person to be charged with this duty. But Mr. Rassam was a man of considerable experience and importance in the service; and when he (Earl Russell) found that he held the office of first Assistant Secretary to the Political Resident at Aden, he thought no better person could be selected to execute this mission. Mr. Rassam was, accordingly, sent with this letter of Her Majesty, and the King of Abyssinia was informed that he was the bearer of a letter from the Queen of England. That was in August, 1864. By the last accounts it did not appear that the King of Abyssinia had actually received that letter. It was very difficult to publish the information communicated by persons residing in the territory without exposing them to considerable danger; he might, however, state that, according to the most recent information received from that country, it appeared that the chains were taken off the arms and legs of the Consul, and that he was not fastened to any other person. The King of Abyssinia had been all this time engaged in a war with some of his own people who were in rebellion against him, and with some of the neighbouring chiefs; he had left his capital in consequence of this war, and it was said that as soon as he came back he would most probably take steps to liberate the missionaries. No doubt endeavours had been frequently made to excite the mind of the King of Abyssinia against certain persons, sometimes English and sometimes French subjects. Her Majesty's Government never thought it advisable to use or threaten force in any way. The King was, in fact, told that if those prisoners were liberated no reparation would be required. There was, however, no justification for the conduct of the King of Abyssinia. Some months ago it was suggested that some person in official uniform should be employed to demand the release of the prisoners; but he (Earl Russell) must confess that he was by no means sanguine as to the efficacy of such a measure. He believed that the real grievance felt by the King of Abyssinia was the fact that no aid had been given by this country to His Majesty while he was engaged in the wars to which he had alluded. The Government of Her Majesty had used all the means in their power to procure the release of the prisoners. Some persons thought that if we sent out a magnificent mission with presents to the King, it would be the means of attaining their object and securing the respect of the people; but to him it appeared that the natural inference from such a proceeding would be that the way to obtain consideration and respect from this country would be to imprison one of our Consuls. The matter had been fully considered by the Foreign Office, but he had no further explanation to offer. He trusted that the noble and learned Lord would not move for papers, because a great deal of the information in the possession of the Government came from persons who would be exposed to danger if it were published.

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

UNITED STATES—ASSASSINATION OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN.—NOTICE.

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, in order to give this House an opportunity of expressing those feelings which I am sure every Member entertains, and which pervade the whole country, with reference to the assassination of the President of the United States, in the absence of my noble Friend at the head of the Government, I beg to give notice that on Monday next he will move a humble Address to Her Majesty, expressing the feelings of deep sorrow and indignation with which we have heard of the perpetration of that atrocious crime, and our sympathy with the Government and people of the United States, and humbly praying that in any communication which Her Majesty may make to the Government of that country of Her own sentiments she may be graciously pleased at the same time to convey a feeling of condolence on the part of this House.

NAVY—THE "ACHILLES."—QUESTION.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is true that the Achilles, of 6,100 tons burden, and constructed to carry forty guns, was only able to carry twenty, and those only 100-pounder Somerset guns; and, if it is so, whether he thinks that a satisfactory result of the first attempt of the Admiralty to build iron ships?

Lord CLARENCE PAGET said, in reply, that the Achilles was originally intended to carry fifty guns, but that that number had been reduced to twenty. When the Achilles was first designed it was intended to limit the armour-plating, as in the case of the Warrior and other of the earlier ships, to the central portion of the vessel. It was, however, found advantageous to carry the armour round the water-line but with this alteration there had, of course, been a great increase in the weight of the armour-plating. As the guns now placed on board the Achilles were of very much superior power to those which were at first intended, he might say, in answer to the Question put by the hon. Member, that he regarded the alteration as satisfactory.

CASE OF MARY GREEN.—QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he rose to ask the President of the Poor Law Board a Question with reference to the conduct of the Parochial Authorities in refusing medical aid to a woman named Mary Green, who died in childbirth. According to the published account of the case, the husband of the woman sent for a doctor named Butler, who had purchased the practice of a former doctor. Mr. Butler came to the house and looked around, but seeing that the people were very poor, and that he was not likely to get his fee, he left the place, recommending the people to send for the parish doctor. The man went to the workhouse at Islington, stated the case, and asked for the assistance of the parochial doctor. ["Order!"] The man was told that medical assistance would not be afforded to the woman unless he produced the marriage certificate. He then secured the services of another medical man, but by the time that the latter had arrived, the child was dead, the woman herself dying shortly afterwards. He wished, therefore, to ask, Whether it is the rule of the Poor Law Board that the medical officer shall not attend poor women under similar circumstances without the production of marriage certificates, and also, if such is the rule, whether Her Majesty's Government will take any steps to have it repealed?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, in reply, that he had seen the report of the case in the newspapers, but he was not yet perfectly informed as to the details; but he had already sent for the depositions taken before the Coroner, and should shortly know what had precisely occurred. As soon, however, as he saw the report, he had requested an Inspector to make inquiry at the workhouse at Islington, to know more of the matter, and though he learnt that the case was substantially as described by the hon. Member, yet it did not appear that any authorities at the workhouse had been to blame. The poor man who had applied for medical assistance for his wife was not a pauper, but an independent artizan, and he had never intended seeking relief. On the contrary, expecting his wife to be confined, he had made an arrangement with a medical man to attend her during her confinement. In the meantime, however, the doctor had sold his business to another practitioner, and with it transferred all the engagements he had contracted. When, therefore, this poor woman was taken ill, she sent for the doctor who had purchased the business, and it was true, he believed, that being struck with the apparent poverty of the people, he declined to attend her, and said it was a case for the parish. Upon which the husband went to the workhouse, and applied for medical relief, but, unfortunately, he only applied to a man standing at the gate, who was no officer, but a pauper and inmate of the workhouse, and he told the man that they would not give him medical relief unless he produced his marriage certificate; on which, unfortunately, the man went away. It so happened that the relieving officer was always at the workhouse, and his directions were to provide medical relief immediately in all cases of emergency, and in this case that relief would certainly have been provided, had he been apprized of the matter. The man, upon leaving the house, called upon another doctor, who readily went to the poor woman's assistance, but when he arrived it was too late, and shortly afterwards the poor woman died.

THE JEWS IN MOROCCO.—QUESTION.

Mr. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that the Emperor of Morocco has withdrawn the Firman, delivered last year to Sir Moses Montefiore, promising to the Jews in Morocco the security and protection of regular justice; whether any information has reached the Government of the imprisonment of twelve chiefs of the Jewish community of Tetuan, for the alleged non-payment of a Moorish guard at the gates of the Jewish quarters; and, whether any steps have been taken to ascertain whether any of the twelve chiefs were British subjects?

Mr. LAYARD said, in reply, that he had no reason to believe that the Firman delivered by the Emperor of Morocco to Sir Moses Montefiore had been withdrawn. On the contrary, he believed that the Emperor of Morocco had the strongest desire to carry out the Firman, but it was quite possible that some of the local authorities, imperfectly acquainted with the wishes of the Emperor, might have exceeded their authority. Sir Moses Montefiore, whom he had met about two days previously, had brought with him a communication from some Jews in Morocco, stating that the persons arrested had been released. He believed that the accounts which had appeared in the newspapers had been much exaggerated, and Sir Moses Montefiore expressed his satisfaction at what had been done. Frequent cases of oppression had occurred in Morocco, but, as far as he was aware, the Emperor wished in no way to depart from the Firman which he had delivered to Sir Moses Montefiore.

WAYS AND MEANS—FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

Order for Committee read.

WAYS AND MEANS considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Mr. Dodson—There is, Sir, upon the whole, a somewhat remarkable contrast between the opening and the closing incidents of the life of the present Parliament.

Almost at the moment when the Parliament first met, we had been involved, although we did not know it at the time, in complications which were to issue in a costly and difficult war with China. The harvest of the year which succeeded proved to be the worst that had been known for half a century; the recent experience of war had led to extensive, costly and somewhat uncertain re-constructions, and although the Italian war had terminated in the summer of 1859, yet for some time afterwards clouds hung over the continent of Europe, in such a manner and degree as to occasion vague but serious alarm in the public mind. Since that period, Sir, those clouds have moved westward across the Atlantic, : } a } it in a tempest perhaps the war } devastated a

guished, indeed, on both sides by the exhibition of many most marvellous and extraordinary qualities, by valour, heroism, effort, and perseverance almost without example; of a war, I may add, which in all its tragic history has presented no scene so entirely painful as the last, that scene of murder, which at this moment causes one thrill of horror throughout Europe. But as far, Sir, as this nation is concerned, we have been mercifully spared. We have been exempt from shock and danger; we see the state of the public mind tranquil and re-assured, and the condition of the country generally prosperous and satisfactory. Moreover, the history—the financial history—of this Parliament has been a remarkable one. It has raised a larger revenue than I believe ever at any period of peace or even of war, after taking into account the changes in the value of money, was raised by taxation within an equal space of time. The expenditure of the same period has been upon a scale that has never before been reached in time of peace. The amount and variety of the changes introduced into our financial legislation have been greater than within a like number of years at any former period; and, lastly, it has enjoyed this distinction attained, I believe, by none of its predecessors within our memory—that although no Parliament ever completes the full term of its legal existence, yet, in finance, it bears the burden and wins the honour of the term of seven years, for this is the seventh annual occasion on which you have been called upon to make provision for the financial exigencies of the State.

I will now proceed, Sir, to state the figures of my case, as far as they relate to the year that has just expired. The expenditure of the year 1864-5 was estimated at the time of the Budget at £66,890,000; in the Appropriation Bill, which had not materially varied the particulars, it stood at £67,073,000; and the actual expenditure has been £66,462,000, or less than the Estimate by the sum of £611,000. The variations between the Votes and the actual results as they are represented in the Exchequer account down to March 31, are not of very great consequence so far as the army and navy are concerned, because the final accounts of the expenditure in these great Departments for the year are not yet, and will not be for a considerable time, made up. But the Miscellaneous Civil Expenditure, which was estimated at £7,638,000, has, I am glad to say, only reached £7,257,000; which may be taken as the final result for the year.

And, Sir, perhaps it may be of some interest to the Committee briefly to compare that Miscellaneous Expenditure with what it has been in former years. For the purpose of greater clearness, I add to it the other items which properly make up our Civil Expenditure—namely, first what are called the Consolidated Fund charges, which do not form the subject of annual Votes by this House; secondly, the Packet Service; and thirdly, an occasional payment made last year for the redemption of the Scheldt Toll, amounting to £174,000. The total Civil Expenditure of the country under these four heads which may be said to represent the real Civil Expenditure of the country was £10,203,000. In 1859-60—that is to say, in the first year of the present Parliament—it was £10,820,000. Therefore, it shows a reduction of £617,000. In 1858-9, however, it had been less; it then only amounted to £10,040,000, being apparently smaller, by the sum of £163,000, than in the year that has just expired. Since, however, the expenditure of the year which has just ended was augmented by the payment of the sum of £174,000 under no ordinary head of charge, but for the special purpose of redeeming the Scheldt Toll by a capital payment, the total for 1864-5, on a fair comparison of the accounts should, perhaps, be taken at £10,027,000, or about the sum at which it stood in the last year of the preceding Parliament. So that this House of Commons is in a condition to state, at the close of the term of its existence, that the ordinary Civil Expenditure of the country, as a whole, has ceased to exhibit an increase.

If we turn our attention to the total expenditure of the country, and compare it with the expenditure of former years, in order to make the comparison a fair one it is necessary to make several changes in the figures as they appear in the annual and familiarly known accounts of the Exchequer. It is necessary, first, to add the special charge incurred under special Acts of Parliament for the erection of fortifications; it is necessary, next, to deduct all those heads of charge which, in a comparison with former years, do not appear in the first of the years that we bring together, but which do appear in the last; that is to say,

£67,128,000. The actual Revenue has been not less than £70,313,000, showing a surplus beyond the Estimate of £3,185,000. And that surplus extends, I may venture to say, to every material head of the Revenue. It extends even to the Miscellaneous Receipts; but the difference on that head has little to do with the actual condition of the country. It runs all through the really important heads of Customs, Excise, Stamps, Taxes, Income Tax, and Post Office. The most remarkable of these augmentations of Revenue, as compared with the Estimate, are those which have taken place in the department of Customs, and in the branch of the Excise. The augmentation in the case of the Customs is no less than £752,000 over the Estimate. But in the case of the Excise the excess has reached the large amount of £1,538,000. In the instance of the Customs there has been a very general increase on the several articles of the tariff; and the only important instance of decrease has been one upon which I, for one, always look upon with great satisfaction—I mean the duty received on the import of foreign corn. The decrease of the Revenue from foreign corn, which is the test of the goodness and abundance of the home supply—the decrease on the year just expired, as compared with the preceding year, is no less than £184,000. The wine duty has increased by £75,000; and the experience we have now had of the working of the new system of wine duties would appear sufficient to prove that there is a tendency to a pretty steady increase from year to year. But the most important item, and the one in which the greatest interest will be felt, is the article of sugar, on which Parliament operated by the legislation of last year. The legislation of last year was calculated to give the consumers of sugar a relief to the extent of £1,719,000. That relief, partially compensated by the recovery, it was calculated would entail upon the Exchequer for the year a loss of £1,330,000. But the circumstances have been favourable. The prices of sugar in bond have fallen in combination with the operation of the reduced duty, and hence it has come about that the actual loss to the Exchequer has only been £926,000; a result showing a recovery of no less than £404,000 beyond the recovery on which I had calculated in the Estimate of last year.

If next we look to the remarkable case of the Excise, the Committee will, doubtless, have been struck with the large excess of receipts over the Estimate. That excess is more than £1,500,000 beyond the estimated sum. Now it is well that the Committee should always bear in mind that a new element of uncertainty has recently been introduced into the Estimates of Revenue from the Excise, as a result of the change which, for a very important purpose, has been made—I mean the shortening of the malt credits, and the collection of the duty on malt within a less period after the charge has been incurred than at former times. Before this change was made, nearly the whole revenue from the malting of each year came to credit in the year following; and thus when the estimate was made the charge had in the main been already fixed. But the alteration has had the effect of including within the receipt of the current year a large portion of the Revenue accruing from the malting of the year, and therefore of subjecting the Estimate of the Revenue to a portion of the uncertainty attendant on the goodness or badness of the harvest, and the fitness of the barley for the production of malt. The excess of a million and a half under the head of Excise, to which I have just referred, may be accounted for under three heads. First, the general prosperity has led to a general increase of the items included under the head of Excise; but the two important items, in which the mass of the increase has occurred, are malt and spirits; I mean, of course, spirits of home manufacture. Malt was estimated to produce £5,800,000; it has yielded £6,377,000, or an excess of £577,000 beyond the Estimate. British spirits were estimated at £9,650,000; they have yielded £10,173,000, a sum showing an increase beyond the Estimate of £523,000. While such is the increase of the receipt from the spirit duty over the Estimate, the augmentation over the receipt of the preceding year is £432,000, under the head of British spirits, and £309,000 under the head of spirits imported from abroad; making together a total increase in the receipts under the heads of Excise and Customs jointly from the article of spirits, of £741,000 within the year 1864-5, as compared with the preceding year.

Now, looking to the comparison between the Revenue of the year and that of the preceding year, I must state that we had estimated for a diminution by the sum of £3,080,000. But in lieu of that but of which the effect was postponed to the year 1859-60, and we must, on the other hand, deduct from it certain taxes, which were repealed in 1864, but the repeal of which will only take effect in 1865-6. We thus find the real and true balance of taxes repealed over taxes imposed may be taken, with sufficient accuracy for the present purpose, at £6,718,000. During the same time, the increase of the Revenue has been £3,968,000; we thus obtain a total of £10,681,000, and, dividing this sum among the six years, we arrive at the remarkable result that the rate of annual growth in the income of the country from the same sources, which had been for the first period £1,030,000, and for the second period £1,240,000, was for the third period £1,780,000.

Now, Sir, having represented a state of things which is evidently satisfactory, as bearing testimony to the increasing power and vigour of the country, I must, of course, remind the Committee that this annual growth is not a growth which can at any time be safely relied upon prospectively for a single year; because, at any time, not only calamities of a rarer kind, but the ordinary calamity of a bad harvest, might either greatly reduce the improvement for the season, or even cause it to disappear altogether.

I have next, Sir, to state briefly to the Committee the condition of the Public Balances. On the 31st of March, 1864, they amounted to £7,352,000, and on the same day in 1865 they were £7,690,000, showing an increase of £338,000. The account for advances and repayments in respect to Public Works, which has usually contributed to feed the balances, has during the present year, from causes which will soon cease to operate, and especially from the effect of the Lancashire Loan—acted as a drain upon them. The advances made were £2,069,000, and the repayments £1,706,000, showing an excess of advances over repayments amounting to £303,000.

I will next glance at our operations with respect to the Public Debt. The amount of debt paid off in the year has been as follows: of Exchequer Bonds, £300,000; of Exchequer Bills, £2,100,000; and of Stock purchased with surplus Revenue, £939,000; making a total of £3,338,000. During the year we have also liquidated debt to a further extent of £2,006,000, either by the acquisition of stock in other modes, or through the medium of Terminable Annuities. We thus arrive at a total of £5,340,000. On the other hand, we ought to make a deduction of the amount raised for fortifications, which has been £726,000; so that we have only effected a real reduction of debt to the extent of £4,614,000. I will now attempt to state to the Committee what is the real condition of our debt as a whole. And here I have to take, in a certain degree, blame to myself—although I share it with those who have gone before me—for never having on previous occasions stated, with the same approach to precision as I shall now do it, the absolute amount of the Public Debt. We are obliged, in fact, to the Statistical Department of the Board of Trade for having recently adopted a very simple but effectual method of showing the full amount of the National Debt. Our ordinary practice had been, in estimating the capital charge, to look to the Funded and the Unfunded Debt alone, and to make no allowance for the very heavy capital sums which we have been liable to pay prospectively in the form of Terminable Annuities. These annuities, I need hardly remind the Committee, represent partly a payment of interest on capital, partly a re-payment, from year to year, of portions of the capital itself. In the statement of the Debt now presented by the Board of Trade from year to year in the “Statistical Tables,” there is included a valuation of the full capital amount of such Terminable Annuities as we still have to pay. I have before me that full account brought down to the 31st of March. Of course, the effect of this more full elucidation of the case is, as commonly happens, that our Debt is somewhat larger in amount than we have commonly believed it to be; in order to make a just comparison of the total Debt of the country, as it now stands with any former year, we must take care not only to reckon the particulars of the Funded and Unfunded Debt, but also the capital value of the Terminable Annuities, as it stood at each period respectively. This must be carefully borne in mind before comparing the statement of the Debt, as I shall now give it, with any current statement of it taken from the accounts for any of the years before the capital value of the Terminable Annuities was included in the computation. With this explanation, by way of caution, I may state that on March 31, 1859, our total of cotton-waste, has informed me by letter that in 1860, when middling Orleans cotton cost him 5½d. per lb., he could get 22s. per pack for his sweepings; but now, when he has to pay so much more for his cotton, he cannot get more than 9s. a pack for the waste. I assume that the quality is the same. And the figures appear to show that the British paper-maker has an increased command of raw materials.

As regards the exports of paper and paper goods from this country, they have risen from 136,000 cwts in 1859 to 142,000 cwts in 1864; and, finally, the number of paper-makers, which had progressively sank from 505 in 1838 to 365 in 1859, has ceased to show any sensible decline from that time onwards: in the year 1864 it was 364.

I will now, Sir, proceed to notice our trade with France, which has happily become a subject of special interest to this country; and there I find as regards the aggregate trade a continuous increase. This trade varies, however, in its form; and although the export of British produce has slightly diminished from what it was two or three years back, yet the total increase of trade with France has been steadily on the increase in point of imports as well as exports. In 1859 the total amount of our trade with France was £26,431,000, and in 1864 it was £49,797,000; showing an increase of £23,366,000, or nearly 90 per cent. And there has not been a single year in that period in which, if we take our exports of all kinds together, our exports to France have not shown an increase over the preceding year. In 1859 we exported to France of British, foreign, and colonial produce, £9,561,000; in 1864 this total had risen to £24,157,000.

After thus adverting to the condition of our trade with that country, I would desire to occupy a moment in removing a common misapprehension with regard to the comparative amount of the public expenditure in France and England respectively. It is believed—and it has been used by some of us as a consolation under the burden of our great expenditure—it is believed that the public expenditure of France is much higher than the public expenditure of this country. That belief is erroneous. It has been encouraged, probably, by the mode in which the accounts are rendered, and by the system under which local charges in France are passed through the medium of the Imperial Treasury. I have no account later than that for the year 1862. It is well known, that although the French accounts are esteemed to be perfect models of scientific precision and clearness, yet they do not appear—I mean that the final accounts do not appear—until considerably in arrear of the period to which they refer. But for the purpose I have in view it will do just as well to take this account; and the result is of great interest. In 1862 the apparent expenditure of France was £88,493,000; but of that expenditure a large proportion was for purposes of a local character, and for other purposes which do not at all appear in the Imperial expenditure of this country. The expenditure of France in that year, after withdrawing those items which do not enter into the comparison with that of this country, was £60,815,000; and the expenditure of this country in the year 1862-3—the nearest period I can take—was £70,352,000. These figures would show an excess on our part of about £9,500,000 over the expenditure of France. The account, I think, now stands somewhat better. We have made a sensible progress since that period in reducing our charges, but I am not quite sure that our neighbours and friends across the channel have as yet been so fortunate, although we are informed, and I hope correctly informed, that they have at length a prospect of moving in that direction.

As regards the whole trade of this country, I stated last year the immense amount which it had reached. I think the total then exhibited was not less than £445,000,000. It has, however, undergone a large further increase in the year recently passed. The accounts of the year ending the 31st of December, 1864—for we do not take notice of the financial year as regards the accounts of trade—those accounts show that our imports amounted to £274,000,000, and our exports to £213,000,000. Thus the two together give a total of £487,000,000; or an increase of more than £219,000,000 since the comparatively recent period of 1854, when the total was £268,210,000.

And here, Sir, I come to a question of very great interest which may well deserve and repay a few moments of our attention. There is, again, an erroneous apprehension that while the increase of the trade of this country of late years has been undoubtedly a remarkable increase, yet that it has been less, and less remarkable, than the simultaneous increase which has taken place in the trade of foreign countries.

Now this is a matter which is by no means exclusively historical or speculative. It touches not only the reputation of the Parliaments of England, which for the last twenty-five years have attached so much consequence to the removal of shackles from industry and commerce, but it likewise appears to bear materially upon the wisdom or necessity of continuing that policy for the future. Now, it is quite true that the trade of France exhibits a larger relative increase of late years than ours has done; but I will venture to say it would have been strange indeed if this had not been the case. And why? The trade of France languished, after the close of the great war, for a lengthened period. Her productive power had, I apprehend, undergone a great diminution. During that war, and especially during its last years, there had been an enormous loss of life, and this loss of life fell upon the male population of the age when the career of productive labour is commencing. Thus, although the difference in the aggregate numbers of the nation may not have been remarkable, yet the productive power of France had really undergone a crushing and wasting depopulation, which it required the lapse of a full generation completely to repair. It was not surprising, then, that for thirty or forty years that great country should have remained under a considerable though a progressively diminishing degree of unnatural depression as regarded its trade. Nor could it be wonderful, accordingly, that the trade of France should, after that depressing influence had ceased to operate, show a greater relative increase than that of England, a country which has never lost the energy and vigour of her manufacturing and commercial operations, and which happily has not been subjected to such sweeping losses of her best blood through the desolating influence of war. In illustration of what I have said I am only able to compare the exports of the two countries; but they are quite sufficient and effectual for the purpose. The total exports of France in 1854 were £78,000,000, and in 1863 they were £141,000,000; showing an increase of 81 per cent. The total exports of the United Kingdom in 1854 were £116,000,000, and in 1863 £197,000,000; thus they show an increase of little more than 70 per cent. That is not a very unfavourable comparison; but still I grant that if that fact stood alone it would authorize you to say that a country, which had done little in the way of relaxing its commercial laws, had achieved relatively more than a country which had done much, and had made great progress on the road of commercial freedom. But when we look at the absolute condition of trade what do we find? We find that while France added in these years £63,000,000 to the total previous amount of her exports, England, with a smaller population, added no less than £81,000,000 to her previously vast aggregate; so that the absolute increment of trade was greater by nearly 30 per cent in England than it was in France.

But if we seek to have a fair comparison of progress, we should not select for the purpose a country like France, which has been placed under circumstances so abnormal in consequence of the ruin and ravages of war; let us take two neighbouring countries with free institutions, countries which have not undergone the same amount of suffering, which have been in a more nearly normal condition, and which have been nearly exempt both from war and also from revolution. Unfortunately it is difficult to find countries on the Continent which have been free from war and revolution; but let us take, as perhaps the best for our purpose, Belgium and Holland, neither of which have suffered under the one head or the other in a degree comparable to France. And it is material to remember that both have enjoyed largely the advantages of railways. Indeed, there is perhaps no country of Europe which has benefited more fully than Belgium, from the application of the railway system.

Now the increase in the exports of England, as I have shown, from 1854 to 1863, has been about 71 per cent; but the exports of Belgium, perhaps the most flourishing of all the countries of the Continent, only grew in the same period from £28,000,000 to £40,000,000, or 43 per cent; and the exports of Holland only grew from £24,000,000 to £30,000,000, not 71, but 25 per cent. These results appear to me to be remarkable; and I doubt whether they are commonly understood.

There again, Sir, is another country, which more than Belgium, more than almost any of the countries of Europe, exhibits the mischievous results of commercial restriction. It is Austria. With regard to Austria it is difficult to make a fair comparison. It is really lamentable to find that in a country of that vast extent and of that immense capability, the exports amounted to no more than £11,000,000 in 1844. In 1858 they had only risen to £22,000,000. Between the same years, the British exports had risen from £58,000,000 to £116,000,000. The relative increase of 100 per cent was, therefore, the same. But while the absolute increase was in Austria £11,000,000, in the United Kingdom, with a much smaller population, it was more than five times as much; it was £58,000,000. Let us hope that my right hon. Friend (Mr. Hutt), who is now in Vienna, engaged in the good work of communicating to Austria the results of our experience, may succeed in persuading the Imperial Government, not that it is a matter of vital, or even of sensible, importance to England that they should alter their tariff, but that it is of vital importance to themselves to follow our example; and that if they will act in that spirit, with a view to their own interests, we shall be perfectly satisfied with that share of benefit which must necessarily redound to us, for a process of this kind always blesses both him that gives and him that takes; but him that gives, as we have found by a happy experience, even more, and much more, than him that takes the gift.

Upon the whole, I come to this conclusion—that we have indeed derived enormous—almost boundless—advantages, from the inventive spirit which has distinguished the mechanism of the present age, and from the application of new principles of locomotion. I believe that the railway companies at present receive from the public for the services they have performed above £30,000,000 sterling per annum; and I think it would be a moderate estimate to say that a further sum of £30,000,000 per annum may perhaps not unfairly represent the addition to the wealth of the country, which has been gained by the introduction of the railway system, even after making every just allowance requisite for the capital invested in other modes of locomotion which have been either wholly or partially paralyzed by the introduction of railways. But after all that has been said on the subjects of machinery and locomotion, all these figures go to place it beyond doubt that immense advantages have also resulted from the apparently simple but in practice sufficiently difficult business of removing the bars, fetters, and obstructions, devised by the perversity of man himself, from the processes of human industry, and of trusting to the simple expedient of freedom for the development of the productive power of a country. And, Sir, it is no small honour to the kingdoms of the Queen that, as in regard to locomotion, so in regard to the freedom of trade and industry, it has been given to them to lead the vanguard and bear the banner of civilization. In the words of one of our own poets—used to describe the establishment of justice and order after barbarous anarchy, and not less justly applicable to the changes we have now in view with all their long train of consequences, it may be given to our acts—

And be the fair beginning of a time.”

To be the beginning of a time, richly fraught not only with economical advantages—not only with results which can be exhibited in statistical tables—but fraught more richly still with results which promote and confirm the union of class with class among ourselves, and even, as we may hope, of nation with nation throughout the wide surface of the earth.

And, Sir, in closing such a survey as this, I hope I shall not trespass too much upon the patience of the Committee if I avow that I cannot here forget or overlook the man who bore a larger share than it was given to any other man to bear, in securing those great benefits for his country and for the world. Well and justly has testimony been borne to him in these walls by higher authority than mine, and it may be nothing less than impertinent in me, if I presume to make any addition to the acknowledgments already better paid. Nevertheless, closely associated as I was with Mr. Cobden in all the transactions connected with the conclusion of the Commercial Treaty with France, I cannot forbear from rendering such a tribute as may be within my power, both to his acts, and to a character worthy of, and perhaps greater than, the acts themselves. The praises which have been bestowed upon him here, and the sorrow which has been felt for him by his countrymen, have not been confined to us; they have been shared by the civilized world. Those praises have been re-

be the same in one case as in the other. If, then, a loan be raised for foreign purposes in this country the operation will, in future, be subject to the same charge as if it were wholly domestic. Again, Sir, an application has been made to the Government, which I think is a proper one—to the effect that the stamp on the letting of small tenements for periods less than a year should be reduced. Though small in amount, yet in certain cases it is now felt to be very burdensome. The stamp, so far as the sum paid conveys an idea of it, does not present this appearance—for it only amounts to 6*d.*; but when we come to consider that in many places houses are let for a week, a fortnight, or a month, at such low rents as 2*s.* 6*d.*, 3*s.*, and 3*s.* 6*d.* a week, it may form a sensible or even a heavy tax, and it appears highly probable that the payment of the present stamp has a certain measurable effect in deterring people from using the form of a written agreement, which we certainly ought not to discourage. We, therefore, propose to reduce the amount from 6*d.* to 1*d.* in the cases of these small lettings. In the case of the present minimum duty levied on appraisements of property under £50 we propose to make a reduction by a proportionate scale. We propose that if the property only amounts to £5 the duty shall be only 3*d.* instead of the present £50 duty of 2*s.* 6*d.*, and from 8*d.* we shall go upwards in proportion to the amount of the property. We propose to give relief to a certain class of gentlemen who labour under an unequal charge. How this anomaly arose I do not know. Special pleaders and conveyancers now pay the same licence duties as attorneys and solicitors; but the latter have a very equitable allowance of half duties for the first three years, while special pleaders and conveyancers have not that allowance. We propose to give them the benefit of that partial remission. Then, with respect to the stamps on various ecclesiastical licences, we propose to make a reduction. It appears that in several cases the present licences are so high as either to be felt as a burden or to prevent altogether the use of the instrument to which they apply. We propose, again, to make an alteration with regard to the stamp on what is called a “charter-party.” The law affecting it is at present in a very unsatisfactory state; and this will be a matter of some importance to several ports, especially in the north of England. The present duty on a charter-party is 5*s.*; but we propose to reduce it to 6*d.*, subject to certain conditions as to drawing the document, which we shall require in all cases where it is to have the benefit of the reduced charge to be put on paper previously stamped, and bearing a printed form; which form, however, may be altered in every case as convenience may dictate. We think it better to have a 6*d.* duty enacted by law and to get it, which we expect to do, rather than a 5*s.* duty which, except in a few instances, we are not so fortunate as to receive. We also propose a change in respect of policies of marine insurance, to the effect that policies issued abroad shall not be recoverable here except they be brought home to be stamped within a certain time. The purpose of this change is to prevent what may be regarded as an evasion. We also propose to remove the present limit of time for claiming returns of duty in cases of marine re-insurance, as the existing limitation is found to be attended with inconvenience in the case of time policies in that department of business. The last change we propose in respect of assurances is one to make more equitable the arrangement of the stamp duties on assurances given by certain companies for a variety of minor purposes. Some of these duties require re-consideration, and we shall endeavour to make a proposal which will have the effect of charging them at a very moderate rate on an harmonious and consistent principle.

And now, Sir, paulo majora canamus. I have said that the disposal of the surplus is difficult. It is difficult, not so much in itself, as by reason of the view which has been taken of the claims upon it. I come to a great subject which, during one evening of this Session, received the attention of the House and formed the topic of an interesting debate. I refer to the Malt Duty. Sir, when that subject was under discussion on the occasion to which I allude, my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, expressed their sense of the great importance of the question, and stated their conviction that, at any rate, whether they might be sanguine or not as to the result, it deserved and would receive careful and laborious consideration at their hands. My right hon. Friend stated so fully and clearly the reasons which prevented the Government from agreeing to the Resolution moved by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir FitzRoy Kelly) that, in addition to the cost of the beer itself. Meanwhile, I have to give precedence to some other topics.

The next accusation against the Malt Duty is that it seriously restricts the application of malt for the feeding of cattle. I am persuaded, however, that, as far as the purposes of serious discussion are concerned, we have heard nearly the last of that charge. A long series of experiments has been made, which has incontestably established this proposition; that if malt is to be used beneficially in the feeding of cattle it must be used only exceptionally and occasionally. In the vast operation of feeding stock, even what is exceptional and occasional may still be important, nay extensive. I do not question the importance of the use of malt for this purpose: but it is I think only adapted for particular classes of cases, and is not intended to be a substitute for any of the great modes of feeding heretofore generally in use. That, however, is but an opinion; and if that opinion be false, and if it be held by any person that malt is extensively available—available in a wholesale manner—for the feeding of cattle, then I say that under the Act passed last year there are ample means now existing of applying it for that purpose. Twenty-eight malt houses were opened for the purpose of preparing malt for feeding cattle, after the passing of the Act of last year. Out of those, eleven have since been closed; some of the remaining houses are doing a very active business, and others, I believe, are doing a business less active. Now, shall I be told that this comparative narrowness of result has been caused by the burdensome and restrictive character of the regulations which are imposed by the Excise on those houses? There is no evidence in support of such a proposition; but there is this significant fact on the other side—that not one of the persons who have closed their malt houses have alleged that their having taken that course had any connection whatever with the regulations imposed by the Excise on their industry. Their reason has been merely this, that they have not found a sufficient demand for feeding malt, and that they consider it more profitable to use their malt houses for the purpose of preparing malt to be applied to its ordinary use in the manufacture of beer. I have here the names of several of those gentlemen who have permitted me to quote their letters stating the cause of their having closed their malt houses. I would read extracts from those letters to the House if it were desired. But perhaps it may suffice to say that in not a single instance has the closing been attributed to difficulties arising from the restrictions imposed on the trade.

The next charge commonly brought against the Malt Duty is that it operates injuriously upon the price of the middling and lower barleys. That is a charge of great importance, and to it I will presently, with the permission of the Committee, recall attention for a few moments.

I think that the last serious charge against the operation of the duty is that it discourages brewing at home. Now, it is impossible that that charge should be maintained by those who say that the Malt Duty, although producing only £6,000,000, yet, through the medium of the brewer, costs the consumer £20,000,000; because, if the duty should be repealed, the man who brews at home will be relieved only of his share of this £6,000,000, while at present he pays a proportionate share, not of £6,000,000, but of £20,000,000. It is evident that if all these factitious additions are made to the burden of the Malt Duty before the beer reaches the consumer, the present system is that which offers the highest possible premium upon brewing at home; because, instead of paying these enormous sums, in which he is mulcted through a factitious medium, all that a man has to do is to pay 21s., or whatever the precise sum is per quarter, and then he can brew for himself; whereas, according to the allegation made, he must, in buying from the publican, submit to a charge of more than three times that amount.

Now, Sir, I would ask what is the question before us? Are we asked to consider the abolition of the Malt Duty, or are we only invited to attempt its reduction? I own that I put aside, as remote or even visionary, the question of the abolition of the duty. The abolition of the Malt Duty, by which I mean the abolition of all duty upon the principal one among all the strong drinks of the country, would be the death-warrant of the whole of our system of indirect taxation. It is idle and futile to the last degree to suppose that having beer made free from taxation you can tax wine and spirits on the one side, and can tax tea and sugar on the other. The only consistent man who supports the repeal of the Malt Duty is, if so I may presume to say, the sly but determined foe of indirect taxation. I can quite understand the speeches which are made by such Gentlemen in favour of the repeal of the Malt Duty—"Take it away," say they, "it is a very improvident and a very improper tax." They make speeches in this House which are received on the opposite side with loud cheers, and they are on these occasions welcomed as allies with remarkable cordiality; the Gentlemen who so welcome them not perceiving that the real end of all this must be the imposition of the whole burden of our taxation upon property. The repeal of the Malt Duty, in the absence of other forms of taxation upon beer, is, I repeat, the death-warrant of indirect taxation. I assume, therefore, that the question before us is not that of the repeal, but that of the reduction of the Malt Duty.

Now, our confining the question to the reduction of the duty, it must be admitted, somewhat weakens the argument; because we shall still, when the duty has been reduced, have all those magical terrors which are connected, in the imagination of the opponents of the duty, with the operation of the system of Excise; and, more than that, we have all the real disadvantage of restrictions, which must always amount to something, and which must continue as long as you maintain an Excise upon malt at all. I take it for granted, however, that the practical question for the present occasion is, at what cost can we make such a reduction of the Malt Duty as will sensibly lower the price of beer? That inquiry, I hope, states the question fairly and honestly. To answer such a question, we must carefully ascertain what is the proportion of the present price of beer which is really due to taxation. I say now "to taxation," and not "to the Malt Duty," because, although the bulk of the taxation consists of the imposition upon malt, there is also the commutation of the hop duty, which comes out in the shape of the brewer's licence; and there, moreover, is a trifling charge for the maltster's licence, of which, small as it is, yet account should be taken.

Now, Sir, this is a subject on which it is not possible for me to ask the Committee to accompany me through all the details of the inquiry through which we, however, as we were in duty bound, have patiently passed. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade stated that the Malt Duty imposed upon beer a tax of  $12\frac{1}{2}$  per cent; and I am able to say two things—first of all, that I believe that that statement of my right hon. Friend was a rigidly just one, in every sense of the word, for the purpose with a view to which he used it—namely, for the purpose of comparison with the duty now imposed by law upon tea; and secondly, that very high authorities connected with the trade, men intimately conversant with all the details of the brewing trade, have, upon being applied to, given the very figure that was mentioned by my right hon. Friend, namely,  $12\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, as the true value, in their judgment, of the Malt Duty. The other minor duties of which I have spoken would not conjointly make an addition of more than from 1 to 2 per cent—so that undoubtedly, upon that showing, the duty altogether would not amount to more than from 14 to 15 per cent. However, I think it is possible that the computation I have now mentioned may have in view the price to the consumer in retail. It may be more proper that I should take it upon the barrel of beer. That is the fair way, as it appears to me, for the purpose of comparing the burden of this duty with the burden of the tea duty upon the chest and half-chest of tea; and having, on the one hand, caused the officers of the Revenue Departments to make a most careful and sifting examination, and having, on the other hand, conferred with those whom I believe to be best informed, and who, at my request, have kindly gone with great care into the details, I am prepared to allow that the taxation upon beer, as sold in barrel, of which all but 1 or perhaps 2 per cent is the Malt Duty, may, for the sake of argument, be taken, on a liberal estimate, as high as at 20 per cent. I believe that I am safe in challenging any attempt seriously to impugn that statement.

Well, then, Sir, the next step is this: if 20 per cent is added to the price of beer by the duty upon malt, how much must we take off that duty in order to produce a sensible effect upon the price of beer? I mean the price to the consumer; because, although thus far I have been speaking of the price per barrel, the great bulk of beer is not ultimately sold in the barrel but by the pint or quart; and I do not think that anything which would reduce the price less than a farthing a quart ought to be regarded by Parliament as a sufficient object to induce us to interfere with the Malt Duty. I even think that is a moderate statement of the case. Some might go beyond it; but I will assume with confidence that you must, at the least, reduce the price by a farthing a quart. What, then, is the reduction of the Malt Duty that would be absolutely necessary in order to reduce the price of beer by a farthing a quart? It must be reduced, according to the best calculation I have been able to procure, to somewhat less than one-half of the present amount. It is now 2*s.* 8½*d.* a bushel; and it must be reduced to 1*s.* 2*d.* a bushel, in order to give to the consumer a reduction of a farthing a quart in the price of beer. Now, I have to ask, what would be the cost to the Exchequer of such a reduction? Because when the advocates of the repeal, and the strong advocates of the reduction of the Malt Duty, come to this question of the cost to the Exchequer, they have a dangerous habit of dealing in generalities, and they delight in assuring us, with smiling countenance, that in one way or other, especially by increase of consumption, the cost to the Exchequer will be very greatly reduced, or indeed, in the view of some, altogether neutralized.

Now, I will state, first, what would be the first cost; and then what would be the effect of the increase of consumption. The proper time of the year at which to reduce the duty, if it were reduced at all, would, I think, beyond all doubt, be about the 1st of October. That is the period at which the stock of malt in the country is the lowest; and it is, therefore, the period at which we should have to pay the most moderate amount of drawback. At that time we estimate that we should have to pay drawback on about 15,000,000 bushels of malt, costing £1,160,000; and we should have an estimated loss in duty charged, for the remainder of the year, amounting to £1,320,000. That is to say, that we cannot touch the Malt Duty for the purpose of giving to the consumer one farthing upon the quart of beer, at a less cost to the Exchequer for the first financial year than £2,480,000. But that is not the worst of the story. That is the cost of the first year; but what will be the cost of the second year? In the second year the reduced duty would operate for the whole twelvemonth. According to the estimate formed at Somerset House, the cost for the second year of the reduction from 2*s.* 8½*d.* to 1*s.* 2*d.*

would be no less a sum than £3,360,000. I might almost rest upon these figures; they are far more eloquent than any comment that can possibly be made upon them; but I must not omit still to touch upon one topic that might possibly be raised, and that is the increase of consumption. We may be told that there would be a great recovery arising from the increase of consumption. Now, Sir, what I venture to say is this—that in the case of malt not only would there not be a great recovery from increase of consumption, but that there would be no recovery at all; and, on the contrary, it is probable that the increase of consumption, with whatever other advantages it might be attended—and I am not considering those advantages, for at this moment I am engaged in an inquiry purely fiscal—that the increase of the consumption of beer would in all likelihood be attended with a further loss to the Exchequer. Gentlemen may hear these words with some surprise; but the explanation is easy; for if there is a large increase in the consumption of beer, a portion of that increase displaces the consumption of spirits. [“Hear, hear!”] Very good! Oh, set out upon your mission of philanthropy, and I am ready to travel with you, perfectly ready to be your companion; but then I beg you to find me the money from some source or other. Do not, however, let us confound together things which are distinct and separate. We are now, Sir, looking at this question from the driest point of view, that of pounds, shillings, and pence; and, after all, setting apart the hustings, and the poll, and everything else, the discussion will at last come to that very sober issue. Now, supposing that of every additional thousand pounds laid out upon beer after this reduction one-fourth part should displace an equal expenditure on spirits—and I do not think that an extravagant estimate—I believe that probably a larger portion of this increase would be in substitution for spirits—but, taking it at one-fourth, what would be the effect upon the Exchequer? Why, Sir, it would take £8 laid out upon beer after this reduction to bring into the Exchequer what £1 laid out upon spirits now brings in; and if £2 worth of spirits are displaced by the additional consumption of £8 worth of beer, it follows that the Exchequer would lose £1 for each £8 added to the consumption of beer. Thus, then, so far from gaining it would lose, and lose heavily, from every eloquent addresses in bringing this subject before the House were overspread and coloured by a tone, I will not say lugubrious, but at least somewhat tragic. I am confident they will feel after what I have said that they may go home with hearts at least partially disburdened, and may give to their future disquisitions on the Malt Tax something of a more cheerful hue.

But what, let me ask, is now the consumption of beer in England? In some instances it is astonishing. I am about to relate an anecdote in connection with this point, which I may preface by saying that I have had the best reason to look upon it as authentic, though I confess I was disposed to be a little incredulous for the moment when first I heard it. The authority from which it came, however, entirely forbids the continuance of any sceptical feeling. The subject of my tale is a labouring man, whose ordinary avocations are on the River Thames. There is nothing peculiar in the heat or atmosphere in which he works, but his employment requires great muscular exertion. An accident occurred to this man's hand, and he went into an hospital at the east end of London. One of the surgeons there dealt with his case, but the result was not quite satisfactory. The surgeon accordingly announced that he should wish to open the hand again, but that before he performed the operation he was anxious to be assured that his patient was in every sense of the word a temperate person. He asked some persons who knew him whether he was temperate, and they informed him that he was. He put the same question to the man himself, and he said, "Certainly, I am temperate, and have always been so." "What quantity of beer do you usually drink?" asked the surgeon. The reply was, "Never more than eight quarts a day." I inquired, that being the consumption of a temperate man, how much an intemperate man of the same calling might be supposed to drink: and I was told that the quantity would run from twelve to sixteen quarts a day. Such an instance, however, is of a class that must be exceptional. But now let us reckon the consumption for the whole population of the country. If hon. Gentlemen will have the goodness to take the number of barrels of beer brewed annually in England, to reduce them to quarts, to make a fair deduction for the population of Scotland and Ireland, who drink but little beer; for women, who drink but a small proportion relatively to the men; and for young persons under fifteen, who likewise drink only a very small proportion of the whole quantity consumed, they will find that every adult male in England consumes not far short of 600 quarts every year; and when you take into account the pauper, the criminal, the sick, the wealthy, too, whose consumption of malt liquor is not great, and that very large and respectable class, who pass under the soubriquet of "teetotalers," all of whom enter more or less into the calculation, I do not think the demand for the repeal of the Malt Tax can be supported by the argument that access to a sufficient quantity of beer is hopelessly difficult, or that the consumption of it is insignificant or is gradually dying away. More than £40,000,000 sterling is, as far as we can learn, laid out by the population of England every year in the purchase by retail of this valuable beverage. So much, then, for the consumption of beer, which I think I may fairly say is not declining, but is, if slowly, yet rather steadily on the increase.

But what is the condition of the producer of the grain that makes the malt?—because, although I deprecate class legislation, I admit it is material that we should see whether the producer of barley is suffering any hardship. Now I will try the point I have thus indicated by the fairest of tests; I am not now dealing with the question between the better and the worse class of barleys, but with those tests which relate to the general value of this grain in the market. These tests are two. The first, what is the average price of barley, relatively to that of wheat, now, as compared with former years; and the second, what has been the price of barley absolutely, and without reference to that of any other product, during the same period?

Taking first, Sir, the average price of barley relatively to that of wheat, I find it to be as follows. For the ten years before the repeal of the beer duty—the years from 1820 to 1829—barley was worth very little more than half what wheat was worth; the price of barley in those years was as 54 and two-thirds to 100. For ten years after the repeal of the beer duty (1830–39), it was as 57 and one-seventh to 100. For ten years further (1840–49), as 58½ to 100; for ten years further (1850–59), as 62 and one-eighth to 100; for the year 1864, the year in which this great being 2s. 6d., or 50 per cent. The common clarets imported from France for popular consumption are sold, duty paid, at about 2s. a gallon. The duty upon them is 1s. a gallon, or at the rate of 50 per cent. This class of wines, therefore, which alone can enter into any real competition with ordinary beer, is subject to a taxation approaching 50 per cent; while beer itself contributes but 20 per cent. Even in the cases I have quoted, the competition is but partial; for while beer is sold at 4d. per quart, the cheapest of these wines is sold at more than 1s. per quart.

I pass now, Sir, to the other side of malt—for malt lies, we may say, half way between the stronger liquors, such as wine, and especially such as spirits, on the one hand, and the article of tea on the other. And now I appeal to Gentlemen who make such honourable manifestations of the strength of their disapproval of the consumption of spirits. It is quite evident they consider strong liquors very dangerous. I apprehend I shall find a way to their hearts without any difficulty when I plead for moderation in the impost upon tea. If beer ought to be taxed more lightly than the wines which compete with it, and more lightly than spirits—as I grant it ought to be—then, I put it confidently to the House, ought tea to be taxed more heavily than beer? I ask attention to that proposition, because it is one fertile in consequences. If the principle that tea ought to be taxed more heavily than beer be sound, then it is desirable to uphold that distinction; but if the principle be unsound, then it is very much to be wished that it should in practice be abandoned. The tax on beer, as I have already stated, is about 20 per cent; the tax on tea, the charge which it bears of 1s. per lb., cannot be stated at less than 40 per cent. The short price of tea varies at different times, but for some years past it has not been above 1s. 6d. per lb., sold by the chest; a few days ago it stood at no more than 1s. 3d. If we take the price at 1s. 6d., the tax of 1s. per lb. upon tea will be at least 40 per cent; if we take the price at 1s. 3d., the tax will be about 45 per cent. Now, I think it requires no great hardihood to assume that, in the mind of Parliament, to state this case is to prove it; that it will not be attempted to justify a state of things in which tea is taxed twice as heavily as beer. Under the circumstances, then, of such undue relative taxation, I ask, what ground is there for making the vast sacrifice of Revenue that I have shown would be entailed by reduction of the Malt Duty? And do I not further show that up to this moment we have failed to do full justice to the consumers of the article of tea?

There is but one point connected with this case of the Malt Duty, upon which the Committee have heard me with so much kindness and patience, with which I have still, as I just now intimated, to deal, and it is this. It is alleged that injustice is done relatively to the lower and middle classes of barley as compared with the better sorts of barley by the present system of raising the Revenue from malt. I have shown that there has been a progressive and steady rise in barley, not merely year by year, but in periods of ten years after ten years; and I might easily have shown that the relative inequality is, at least, not greater than it was, and, consequently, that the growers of the lower and middle classes of barley have participated in the advantages of these improved prices. But, Sir, I do admit that the incidence of the Malt Duty does press on barleys of the middle and lower qualities; that is to say, it alters the natural relation of value between them and the superior barleys. The duty is laid on a certain measured quantity of malt—which, for the purposes of this discussion, is just the same as if laid on a measure of barley—and a bushel of barley of high quality is known to yield more valuable malt than a similar quantity of barley of lower quality. We have been asked whether it is not possible to devise something in the nature of a remedy for the inequality created by the operation of this system; and I am happy to say that we have found, what we think is at least a partial remedy, even if it would be too bold to hope it will prove something more than a partial remedy. Now, it would be very unjust to alter the form of the duty absolutely from a duty by measure to a duty by weight; because many persons might not wish to adopt the substituted system, and the growers of fine barley especially might believe that their interests would be injuriously affected. But what we think may be done, and what we shall ask the House to do, is to give to the maltster the option, if he thinks fit, of having the duty charged by weight. Hon. Members will at once perceive the operation, or at least the aim, of the proposed plan. Those who wish to be charged by measure will not be subject ful stimulus to the consumption of the commodity; and will, we trust, place this most valuable and most healthful of all the luxuries of the poor within the reach of many who now do not enjoy it at all, or who only enjoy it in a very limited degree. Under this head then, Sir, Her Majesty's Government have to make a very considerable proposal; and I do it, in their name, with a distinct intimation that if the Committee when it comes to vote upon the subject should agree to the change, it will not be in our power, with propriety, to make any other proposal bearing upon the subject of indirect taxation during the present year.

The estimated consumption of tea, apart from the reduction of duty, for the year 1865-6, was 92,000,000 lb. The loss upon this amount of consumption, at 6*d.* in the lb., supposing it were all loss, would amount to £2,300,000. I have taken, however, the recovery from that loss from the increased use of tea to an extent of 9,000,000 lbs. to be £225,000, and I think that with favourable circumstances the recovery may go even beyond that limit; but no higher figure could be taken in conformity with the usual rules of prudence which guide the Department of Customs in the advice they tender us on a subject of this kind. Probably, therefore, the change would cause for the full period of twelve months a loss of £2,075,000; but a portion of the year would have elapsed—and indeed nearly a month has already elapsed—before the change could come into operation. And here I may take the opportunity of saying that if it be agreeable to the Committee, as I trust it will, I shall ask them to vote upon the Resolutions I am about to submit on the subject as early as on Thursday next. On the assumption, then, that about one-tenth of the year will have elapsed before the new duty will come into operation, and therefore deducting one-tenth or £207,000 from the sum of £2,075,000, the loss for the financial year by the reduction of the duty will probably be £1,868,000; while in the year 1866-7 we shall have to reckon on a further loss of £207,000.

The next subject upon which I have to trouble the Committee—and I am happy to say we are now passing rapidly through the matters I have to lay before them—is the question of the Income Tax. Now, I think that if this Parliament were challenged as to the reason why it has not dealt with the Income Tax in a more sweeping manner than that which it has actually adopted, it would be easy to point for an answer to a single one of the many figures which I laid before the Committee at an earlier period of my address, showing that even after the reductions of the last few years, yet ten or twelve millions a year had been added since 1853 to the expenditure of the country. Besides this we must bear in mind that it would have been impolitic, not to say impossible, to suspend all other remissions of taxes for the purpose of applying our whole force to the reduction or the abolition of the Income Tax. Now, even without allowing for the relief from the long Annuities in 1860, I have pointed out that £10,000,000 a year has been added to the gross total of the public expenditure. Undoubtedly, notwithstanding this great augmentation of charge, if Parliament had thought fit to forego every other object, we might now be in a position to extinguish the tax on incomes. But I do not think it would have been conformable to the equity and fair dealing, which usually distinguish the proceedings of this House, if any such plan had been adopted. Independently of this consideration, there is an opinion more or less widely spread in the country and in this House, an opinion which, for aught I know, may be the opinion of the majority of this House, but upon that point I do not undertake to say anything—that the Income Tax is a tax fit to be permanently retained. [“Hear, hear!” “No!”] I am not now referring to my own personal opinion, which is the same it has ever been. But that is an affair of infinitely small moment. Neither do I wish it to be taken for granted that either the House or the Government has committed itself finally on the highly important question, whether the Income Tax ought or ought not to be retained as an ordinary and permanent part of our system of finance. Whatever may be our individual opinions, this question is a subject of great importance, which in another Parliament may have to be considered with a view to a practical issue. There are, indeed, those who hold that there is an obligation affecting me personally, and affecting no one else, which binds me to bring about the extinction of the Income Tax. In that view I cannot participate; for the extinction of the tax must depend on the judgment of the country and of Parliament, not on mine. But, take. Indeed, the two sums which I have given—£1,868,000 for the Tea Duty, and £1,650,000 for the Income Tax, amounting together to £3,518,000, show that there remains to us but a narrow margin. At the same time, that margin is sufficient to enable us to meet the expressed wish of the House.

Now, Sir, the measure of last year relating to this subject will require notice from me for a few moments. The portion of the Fire Insurance Duty with which we dealt last year was essentially distinct from the portion with which we did not deal, in this respect—that the former was a tax upon trade, upon industry, and, therefore, virtually a tax upon consumption, whereas the remaining portion is a tax upon property. But let not the House be afraid that, in stating that distinction thus broadly, I am about to venture upon urging it as an argument for the imposition of a difference of rate of tax. The desire of the House for an uniform rate has been clearly and unmistakably expressed, and we have not the smallest idea of disputing it. It is, however, desirable to keep in view the essential distinction between the two portions of the tax. The experiment of last year has not yet been fully tried; it has been only nine months in operation, and we have not as yet got so much as a full year's receipt of the new duty upon stock-in-trade; but I am bound to say that, as far as it goes, the experiment does not enable us to be very sanguine as to the ultimate results of the reduction in producing a recovery of Revenue by the increase of the practice of insurance. There seemed to be high authority for taking a more sanguine view at the time; but although my estimate was not very exalted, for it was framed upon the assumption of a moderate recovery—namely, an increase of 10 per cent in all, in which was included the ordinary annual increase—the result has shown a figure even less. It was stated, and stated strongly, by hon. Gentlemen in the discussion of last year, that when we came to deal with that portion of the Fire Insurance Duty which affects property the result would be more satisfactory, and that a larger increase, and a larger recovery of Revenue, would take place in regard to that portion of the tax. How that may be I do not presume to say; but undoubtedly, as far as stock-in-trade is concerned, the remission has not, up to this moment, proved very successful in its results. Still, I do not grudge the reduction which has taken place, because that tax, as applied to stock-in-trade, was unquestionably a tax upon industry, and the benefit of the remission and of any consequent increase of insurance, whether in itself small or great, is certain to find its way to the consumer of those industrial and commercial products which are the subject of the tax.

Now, Sir, it has been a common thing to say in the House of Commons, that the tax on Fire Insurance is a tax on prudence. In such arguments as I have ever employed, so far as I can recollect them, in resisting Motions for the repeal or reduction of the duty, I have not been used to defend the tax upon its merits. My arguments have, I believe, been mainly based on the doubtful nature of the very sanguine anticipations of recovery upon which most of those Motions have, to a great degree, been founded. However, I think that the definition of the tax, as a tax on prudence, may be amended; and that we might call it, as to the chief part of it, with greater accuracy a tax upon property, but with a double exemption; the one being an exemption in favour of improvidence; and the other an exemption in favour of those large holders of property in the form of houses and buildings, who are able to take their chance, and perform for themselves the function which is called self-insurance. I must say that no part of the argument ever used on the subject of Fire Insurance has appeared to me to tell so strongly against the present state of the law as this, because it is said, and, as I think, said unanswerably, "If you are to make insurance against fire the means of imposing a duty upon property"—and my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham, I think, (Mr. Hubbard) showed clearly that the duty of 3s. per cent was equivalent to an Income Tax of 7d. in the pound upon houses and buildings—"it ought to be imposed equally, and there ought not to be a virtual exemption on behalf of large holders of property." That, as it appears to me, is an argument to which there is no reply.

Now, as I have said, the general expectation of the House is that if we make the reduction which is pointed out by the Resolution adopted on the 21st of March there will be a considerable recovery of Revenue from increase of insurances against fire. Whatever recovery there is will undoubtedly be a very great good, because it will indicate a mitigation in the inequality now caused by a large exemption from the tax; and it will also show that the inducement to self-insurance is operating with less force than that with which it has heretofore operated. We, therefore, at once admit, and we admit especially in deference to the authority of the House, that the experiment is perfectly well worth putting to the proof; and as we have still remaining at our command the means of trying the experiment, we intend to place in your hands, Sir, a Resolution for the purpose of giving it effect. If the experiment should succeed—if, relatively to the amount of reduction, the recovery should be large—then, as I have said, a great good will be accomplished. If the experiment should appear on the whole to fail, then undoubtedly it may be the duty of another Parliament, of perhaps another Government, to look further into the question, and to consider maturely, whether Fire Insurance ought not to be placed on a footing yet more, and far more, liberal and free. I know there are those who hold that insurance against fire is a thing which ought not to be encouraged, because it is an encouragement to carelessness. I take it, however, that the House has deliberately adopted the reverse of that proposition, and that it desires to see Fire Insurance placed upon the best possible footing, and carried to the greatest possible extent. It may, therefore, be the duty of some future Parliament, and of some future Government, to re-examine the question, in case the results of this measure should not be satisfactory; and if it should be found necessary to give a further relief at some future time from the Duty on Fire Insurance, undoubtedly the House will be disposed to look at the elements of which the duty is composed; one of them being a tax upon property, which must be considered in conjunction with other taxes imposed upon property, and as such forming an essential part of our fiscal system; and the other a Tax on the act of Insurance, which is in itself purely a commercial operation, and which, as it would seem, ought to be looked at in regard to the nature of the risk, rather than to the value of the property to which it applies.

I come now, Sir, to explain the estimated financial effect of this reduction. The Revenue from Fire Insurances in 1865-6, apart from any change, was taken at £1,450,000. We propose to reduce the duty to an uniform duty of 1s. 6d. from June 25. We shall add to the Resolution of the House a further change of minor consequence, which was not indicated in the Resolution, but which I am quite sure will be universally approved, and that is a diminution of the duty of 1s. upon the insurance policy, which is quite distinct from the 3s. imposed annually on the renewal of the policy. That charge of 1s. forms a serious impediment to small insurances. In the larger, and even in the middling insurances, the Company takes upon itself the payment of the shilling; but in insurances from £300 downwards the Company requires the insurer—and it is not at all unreasonable—to bear this charge. The consequence is that the man who is insuring £100 has to pay 4s. per cent upon his first year, and the man who insures £200 has to pay 3s. 6d. per cent. We, therefore, propose to substitute for the shilling duty a penny stamp; but at the same time expressly to require the penny stamp to be put upon the receipt given for the money, which the spirit of the present law requires, though I am not sure that it has been practically enforced. The financial result will then be this. The actual payment of this duty is usually three months in arrear, and the change will only take effect at the close of the first quarter of the financial year. Accordingly for the first half-year we shall receive the old duty. The old duty was taken at £1,450,000, and half of that would be £725,000, which we shall expect to receive. The yield of the new uniform duty of 1s. 6d. we take for a whole year at £930,000. That is a reduction of £520,000 for a full financial year by the measure you are now invited to adopt, and this sum of £930,000 includes an estimated increase of 10 per cent upon the description of insurances we are now going to reduce. One-half then of the old Revenue which we should get would be £725,000. On the remaining half-year we should receive one-half of £930,000, or £465,000; and putting these two sums together we have £1,190,000, instead of £1,450,000, showing a loss for the present year of £260,000, while we necessarily have to reckon for the next year on a loss of £260,000 more.

Sir, I will now state very succinctly the results of the several changes which we ask the House to adopt. First, I will give the total amount of relief which these changes will afford to the public when they have come into full operation. The full relief given upon tea will be £2,300,000; upon the Income Tax, £2,600,000; upon Fire Insurance, £520,000; the total of these figures, representing the whole of the operations you are now called upon to sanction, will be £5,420,000. I now come to the actual loss which we must expect to encounter in the financial year already commenced. The loss from the reduction on tea will be £1,868,000; from the reduction in the Income Tax, £1,650,000; and from Fire Insurance, £260,000. The total loss for 1865-6 would thus be £3,778,000. In 1866-7 there will be a further loss upon tea of £207,000; upon the Income Tax, of £950,000; and upon Fire Insurance, of £260,000; showing a further burden for 1866-7 of £1,417,000, or a total amount of loss to the revenue, for the two years taken together, extending to the sum of £5,195,000. The figures, however, at which we have to look most minutely now are those which state the total amount of the loss for the present year—namely, £3,778,000. So much has to be deducted from a surplus which I stated at £4,031,000; and the remainder, the very slight surplus which I ask the Committee to permit us to retain in our hands, will be £253,000. It will be seen that, after deducting that surplus from the burden of loss to be laid upon the year 1866-7 by the legislation proposed for the present year, there will still be an estimated charge of about £1,160,000 which we are now imposing upon the resources of the next year. And it may be asked whether that is a prudent measure. My answer would be twofold. In the first place, when you deal with taxes upon property, you deal with taxes which are receivable in arrear of the period to which they refer; an inconvenience which has been much mitigated by the change introduced in 1860, with respect to the Income Tax, but which we have not been able wholly to remove. Therefore in such cases it is absolutely inevitable that our legislation should, to a considerable extent, affect the balance of the year succeeding that for which we immediately legislate. That is my first answer. But I likewise remark that, looking to the state of the country, and to the fact that we are dealing with the Revenue, not of one year, but of two years, and that the increment of the Revenue even for one of these years would, in the natural and ordinary course of things, come to a larger sum, I do not think that the Committee need scruple on the score of prudence to accede to the proposition which Her Majesty's Government have instructed me to submit.

There is, however, Sir, another request which I have to make of the Committee, and which I trust they will be disposed to grant. It is that they will join with us in shielding resolutely against any sort of invasion that modest, possibly too modest, sum of a quarter of a million which I ask that we may be permitted to retain. Sir, we have felt ourselves to be like persons enclosed within a secured and well-girt precinct, while outside the door we have crowds of hungry claimants. The more prosperous the country is, the larger the surplus available for the remission of taxes, the greater is always the number who demand remissions. We see the famishing crowd without, on all sides and of all kinds—

We have opened the door to those who we thought had in equity the strongest claims, and whose claims we might be able to satisfy. But there remain many behind. There are many Customs duties with which it may still at a future time be desirable to deal. It is not necessary to name them. There are duties still remaining upon raw materials, and there are other duties which undoubtedly it would be most desirable to repeal. But I hope the Committee will think with us that we have acted wisely in proposing a heavy reduction on the great article of tea, rather than in distributing what we have been able to afford in smaller and less effective amounts. Then passing beyond the department of Customs there is the claim to the abolition or the reduction of the duties on public conveyances. That is, I think, a claim for which there is much to be said; and glad shall I be when the time comes at which a favourable ear may be given to the applications which bear upon that subject. There is, again, the powerful claim of those who are connected with the business of marine insurance. I cannot say that I think their case is by any means so urgent; yet, at the same time, it may be, within certain limits, a fair subject for future consideration. These are specimens; and, Sir, there are also many other claims immediately hanging over us in respect to which I trust that the House will support us in declining to make further inroads upon the Exchequer. And now I have especially in view a matter to which I was understood previously to refer—a proposal that will, as it appears, be made for the relief of a particular class from a duty which they have for some generations been liable and accustomed to pay. I am sure that if the House is prepared to enter upon the question of the relief of one particular class from duties which it now pays, whether in the shape of an annual licence, or in the shape of a stamp upon admission, it must, in order to satisfy the demands of justice, similarly be prepared to consider the case on behalf of the whole body of the interests so affected; but to deal with the whole body of those interested or, indeed, to deal with any of them, is neither compatible at the present moment with financial prudence, nor with the elementary principles on which the conduct of Parliament in fiscal matters should rest. I trust, therefore, Sir, that we shall have that support from this House for which I have asked, if it thinks that our proposals are upon the whole reasonable and just, and that they have, likewise, been carried to an extent as wide as the circumstances in which we stand will warrant. I must confess that I cannot but entertain a very sanguine hope as to their acceptance. I am so sanguine as to believe that the immense difficulties I have described as lying in the way of any effectual dealing with the Malt Tax at the present juncture may have made some impression even on minds which were favourably predisposed towards its remission. It is a great satisfaction to myself, as it is also to my Colleagues, to believe that the proposals we now tender are proposals which may be not unacceptable to hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House. They are few—they are simple—they are intelligible. If it had been compatible with my duty to submit them without illustration or explanatory statement, they might probably have been imparted in fewer words than those of any Budget that has ever dealt with an extended remission of taxation. And, Sir, we are strong in the persuasion, first of all, that they are likely to win the approval of this House; and second, that they will likewise obtain the favourable verdict of the nation whose interests it is our duty, to the best and the utmost of our power, to study and defend.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER then moved that the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

MR. WHITE: Sir, with the greatest respect for the high authority of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I regret to say I differ from him in accepting the magnitude of our exports as an infallible test of the prosperity of the country. I cannot admit that the greatness of a nation's exports is a significant or sufficient criterion of the aggregate well-being of a people. The right hon. Gentleman, as a proof of our superior prosperity, has adduced the fact that the exports of Holland and Belgium have not increased in the same ratio as our own, but he has forgotten that the social condition of the great bulk of the population of those small but flourishing kingdoms is incontestably better than our own. We all know the vast value of the exports of the Southern States of the American Union prior to the civil war, yet who would aver that the slaves—the producers of those great staples, cotton, tobacco, and sugar—shared in the wealth which their own labour had created? To come nearer home, I must say that this assumption of the right hon. Gentleman is negatived by the fact that Ireland largely exported articles of food when her own inhabitants were in the very agonies of a famine. The best test to my mind of the prosperity of a country does not consist in the magnitude of its exports, but in the social well-being and comfort of the great bulk of the community. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has told us that the condition of the country is prosperous and satisfactory. Glad should I be could I concur with this view of the case, but I cannot do so, when from the official report of the medical officer of the Privy Council I learn that quite one-fifth of the whole population obtain, owing to the scantiness of their earnings, too little food to keep them in proper health and vigour. Has not the recent report of Dr. Hunter on the Public Health told us that the household accommodation and domestic circumstances of a large portion of the labouring classes is in the highest degree deplorable, if not absolutely revolting? Almost every page of Dr. Hunter's Report bears terrible testimony to the truth of the recent declaration of an eminent constituent of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer—I refer to the Professor of Political Economy at Oxford—namely—

“That the English field labourer has no parallel in the civilized portion of the earth. Paint his life in the darkest colours, and you have not even then described the wretchedness of his condition.”

If this can truly be said of the rural population, how stands the case with the same class in our cities and towns? Why, it cannot be denied that a large portion now exist in a state of ghastly poverty, herding together in filth and squalor indescribable, heedless or unconscious of the ordinary dictates of morality or decency. The history of the world would hardly exhibit a parallel to the co-existence of so much privation in one portion of the community, and so much prosperity in another—the almost unbounded wealth of the few, with the unceasing poverty of the many—a marvellous augmentation of the resources of the realm with the very scantiest increase of the comforts of the people. That this statement is not exaggerated I can prove by the latest Poor Law Returns. They are from 655 places in England and Wales, and show out of a population of 19,885,912, there were 1,011,753 paupers, and of that number nearly 50 per cent were able-bodied. When, in addition to these, we remember that there were millions who were always on the very verge of pauperism, I cannot, in spite of the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman, regard the present condition of the country as satisfactory. Nor is this all, for though we expend some £16,000,000 for paupers, police, public justice, and private benevolence, we yet learn from the judicial statistics that we have 130,000 known criminals at large to prey upon the rest of the community. It was stated at the last Social Science Meeting, and the statement was not contradicted, that the average wages of an adult agricultural labourer in the South Western counties was 9s. a week. Such a miserable stipend—with all our boasted prosperity—must be regarded as a social anachronism, to use no stronger language. By the Poor Law Returns the average earnings of our agricultural labourers, forming one-third of the whole of our working classes, was not more than 11s. per week, and it must not be forgotten that during the last half century quite six millions of our population have been constrained to emigrate. It is not, I consider, satisfactory to find how little better off is that class by whose hands such vast wealth has been created. Hence, whilst the Chancellor of the Exchequer might justifiably point with exultation to the stupendous magnitude of our exports, the marvellous growth of our imports, and the amazing development of our revenue, I must be pardoned if I venture to think that the scant and inadequate recompense for ordinary manual labour is a practical condemnation of our present social condition. Whilst it is very gratifying to find that the growth of the revenue during the last five years is at the rate of quite two millions per annum, still I should have been much better pleased if our legislation had tended more to the diffusion than the accumulation of wealth. That such is the case would seem obvious when we reflect how little the creators of our opulence participate in the enjoyment of it. It is calculated that two-thirds of the total product is the share of but one-seventh of the public; whilst the remaining one-third is distributed among the other six-sevenths of the community. I should have been glad to have learned from the Chancellor of the Exchequer out of his grand total of £70,313,000 how much was derived from direct and how much from indirect taxation. Then, perhaps, it would have been too apparent, that whilst only some seventeen millions were obtained from the realized wealth or property of the country, we still raised forty-two millions of our revenue by Customs and Excise duties on articles of ordinary domestic consumption by the great bulk of the people. Moreover, might not a further elucidation have demonstrated that of this total of forty-two millions of Excise and Customs duties, more than one-half was extracted—may I not say extorted—from the physical necessities (they have become such) or the physical enjoyments of the unenfranchised, unrepresented portion of the working classes? And yet the constitutional text-books lying on the table before me tell us that taxation without representation is—tyranny. In my humble judgment, property pays too little and poverty too much under our present fiscal system; for whilst we have been abandoning Customs duties paid by the rich, we have continued taxing for a vast revenue, articles mainly consumed by the poorer classes. With regard to the Revenue Estimates of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the coming year, he must forgive me if I presume to say that I think he put his figures too low by one million at least. About a month ago I made my own Estimate and was bold enough to publish it. I then put the expenditure for the year ending the 31st of March next at £65,500,000, and the revenue at £71,000,000, which amount would have left more than five millions available for the reduction or remission of taxation. I am sorry the Government will require for the coming year £639,000 more than I had deemed possible by my calculation. Assuming no alteration in the existing scale of taxation—allowing for the reductions of the past Session which will come into operation in this financial year; in fact, adopting the same basis of Estimate as the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I still hold that my own Estimate will yet prove correct when the outturn of next year's income is known. I can well understand why the right hon. Gentleman habitually puts his probable income at too low a figure; for by so doing he avoids many importunate demands for relief from taxation, and moreover enjoys the satisfaction of having an annual surplus available for the diminution of the National Debt. Contrasting the present condition and the probable future of the country, the prospects of a favourable outturn of the revenue are more encouraging than at the corresponding period last year. Then the minimum of Bank-rate was 7 per cent, and it is now 4 per cent. Then the price of cotton was double what it is now. Then the early termination of the American contest was dubious. Judging by the recorded average price of wheat which, on the 15th instant, was precisely (namely forty shillings and one penny a quarter) as at the same date last year; one would infer that the prospects of the harvest were no better last year than at that date. Further, wool last year was 25 per cent higher than now, and other raw materials of manufacture were at enhanced rates compared with those now ruling. At this time last year sugar was 30 per cent higher, and stocks 35 per cent less—tea 12 per cent higher, and stocks 15 per cent less than at the present time. Moreover, throughout the whole of the past year loanable capital was excessively dear, and the minimum Bank-rate of 1864 reached the unprecedentedly high average of 7 1-16 per cent. By comparison with last year the employment of labour on the construction of railways and other home enterprizes must be greatly facilitated, and the consequent consumption of articles liable to Customs and Excise duties must be greatly promoted; as also by the political saturnalia of a general election and the disgraceful expenditure it will involve. Seeing that the anticipated revenue is drawn from the same fiscal sources as heretofore; and besides, as far as I can make out, the average increment of the last three years' revenue has been at the rate of two-and-a-half millions per annum; I am constrained to think that we shall have on the 31st of March, 1866, quite as good a result as during the preceding three years. Before I sit down I must thank the Chancellor of the Exchequer for his judicious boldness in proposing such a telling reduction of the Tea Duty. On a recent occasion I recorded my opinion that in justice to the working classes the duty on tea should be forthwith reduced, but I confess that at the same time I avowed my belief that I did not expect the right hon. Gentleman would have the courage to propose the reduction of a duty which had been so recently lowered by Parliament, at his own recommendation. In conclusion, the Chancellor of the Exchequer must pardon my remarking that I think he claimed undue credit for the diminished scale of expenditure for the past two years and for the ensuing one. I must be forgiven if, as a humble Member who has uniformly, albeit ineffectually, protested against the extravagant expenditure of the Government—if I presume to say that I do not accept the greater prodigality of the past as a valid excuse for the lesser but still incontestable wastefulness of our present expenditure. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has referred to what the new Parliament may be called upon to do. Hence I would express my hope that it will find itself bound by every obligation of duty, and by every principle of political honour, to press upon Ministers the urgent necessity of public thrift and judicious retrenchment. I feel so strongly on this point, that I trust one of the earliest Resolutions of the new Parliament will declare that no Ministry is worthy of confidence which shall venture, in a normal condition of public affairs, to ask for more than sixty millions per annum for the whole Government expenditure. I am quite confident that that amount is more than is really needed to discharge every public obligation, and to maintain in full efficiency all the establishments of the Government. In this conclusion I am fortified when I recollect that sixty millions are quite seven millions in excess of what sufficed for the average annual expenditure of the ten years preceding the Russian war. During the whole of that period the average yearly expenditure, adding the cost of collection, was fifty-five millions; but then also was included the payment of £2,149,000 per annum, the amount of the Terminable Annuities, which expired in the year 1860. We have since remained at peace in Europe, and yet during the last five years we have been expending annually sixteen millions more than on the average sufficed during the ten years prior to the Russian war. What we have got for this stupendous outlay as regards international influence and prestige may be gathered from the Dano-German debate of last Session. What we have gained by this enormous expenditure in home strength and external power may be learned from our recent discussions on the Army and Navy Estimates. According to the concurrent testimony of right hon. Gentlemen and gallant Officers, sitting on both sides of the House, we have now no guns and no ships which are able to do efficient service. It is true we have fixed forts, but on movable foundations, at Spithead; iron-clad ships wholly unseaworthy, but admirably adapted for shore batteries, and a highly interesting collection of smashed targets (a specimen of which can be seen at the Crystal Palace), which accurately represent the sides of that ship of the future which, by no conceivable chance, could ever be exposed to such rough treatment. In conclusion, whilst I deliberately record my protest against the magnitude of our present expenditure, I wish I could indulge the hope that Parliament and the country would never again be deluded by Ministerial declarations into mistaking costly inefficiency and unproductive expenditure for permanent security and national strength.

MR. BENTINCK said, he had listened with great interest to the very eloquent speech of the right hon. Gentleman, but he wished he could say that his satisfaction had equalled his interest. He was somewhat amused to observe that the first class of persons for whom the right hon. Gentleman had thought proper to express his beneficent intentions were the special pleaders, and he was bound to say the latter portion of his speech explained the grounds on which the right hon. Gentleman looked so favourably on that particular profession. But the right hon. Gentleman had gone beyond special pleading, and in one part of his speech had dealt in vague and unfounded assertion. Taking every opportunity of putting forward the completeness of his conversion to the doctrines of free trade, the right hon. Gentleman told them he not only objected to protection for Englishmen against the foreigner, but that he protested as strongly against protection for the foreigner against the Englishman. Was the case of rags for the manufacture of paper, or the position of the riband and silk weavers, present to the mind of the right hon. Gentleman when he made that statement? Had he not in these instances been the champion of protection for the foreigner? He did not think those afflicted interests would regard the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman on that subject with any satisfaction. But the particular object he had in rising on the present occasion was to advert to the manner in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had thought proper to deal with the question of the duties on malt. The right hon. Gentleman said that those who sought the reduction of the malt duties had no right to ask for any favour, for no class of industry had been so favoured by legislation. Now, he would tell the Chancellor of the Exchequer what class had been favoured, clearly, distinctly, and grossly, to the prejudice of the rest of the community. It was the class which had embarked in the special industry of publishing penny newspapers. Was it not clearly and distinctly a case of class legislation when the duties on paper were repealed? All that had been said about the advantages of the diffusion of knowledge might be classed among the "Flowers of Rhetoric." It was not a question whether they should enable the people of this country to have access to a larger amount of information at a lower rate—every man in the country, however small his means, might have obtained any amount of the cheapest literature before the repeal of those duties—but the object was to give a substantial money benefit to a small but influential class, who were able in return to give very powerful support to the Government. When, therefore, the Chancellor of the Exchequer called on those who desired a repeal of the malt tax to forego their complaints on the ground that no other class had been unfairly favoured by legislation, he begged to deny the assertion. So long as the wisdom of Parliament considered it right to maintain the present legislation on the subject of paper, every other class would have a right to complain of gross and unjust class legislation. The right hon. Gentleman had made another remarkable assertion, which showed how far he was trusting to information received from others. It had been proved, he said, that malt was not a good description of food for cattle; but in the rural districts the right hon. Gentleman would find a large number well qualified to form an opinion on that question who took a totally different view of it. Another assertion was still more startling. He said that even if malt was beneficial as food for cattle, his Act of last year provided every possible facility for applying malt to that purpose. Why, it was well known that the Act of last Session was encumbered by so many provisions and vexatious arrangements that it was practically inoperative. The right hon. Gentleman asked whether those who complained of the malt duties sought for their reduction or entire abolition. Now, he (Mr. Bentinck) would frankly avow his belief that no reduction of the duties on malt short of their entire removal would be really beneficial to those who complained of them in their present state. Whether it was possible to do away with the tax at once was another question; but he should not be dealing frankly with the House did he not state that, while he and those who agreed with him merely asked at present for a reduction of the tax upon malt, they looked forward in the course of time to the total abolition of a tax which pressed so unfairly upon a particular portion of the community, and which was so vexatious in its character. The right hon. Gentleman stated that beer drinking was on the increase, and that therefore the growers of barley ought to be satisfied; but in making that assertion he had not taken into consideration one or two points which bore strongly upon the subject; for instance, he had not taken into account the very great increase of late years in the quantity of beer exported. The real grievance of the consumer was that by reason of the existence of the duty on malt beer was both bad and dear, while what he (Mr. Bentinck) anticipated that by the reduction of that tax was that he should obtain a better and a cheaper article of consumption. The right hon.

Gentleman entered into a somewhat singular calculation, and endeavoured to console those who sought for the repeal of the duty by referring to the comparative price of wheat and barley, and told them they ought to be content when there was so little difference between the prices of the two articles. That, however, was a total misconception of the real state of things. Thanks to the right hon. Gentleman and to others who had dealt with our finances for many years, the price of barley had not been raised to that of wheat, but the price of wheat had been forced down to that of barley. He (Mr. Bentinck) did not consider that much ground for consolation. The right hon. Gentleman proceeded to say it was not right to lay a heavier tax upon wine than upon beer. Of course, he did not expect to receive the assent or sympathy of the right hon. Gentleman and of those Gentlemen who were wont to say that such a thing as a Protectionist could scarcely be discovered in England; but, nevertheless, he felt bound to assert that many millions of his fellow-countrymen would infinitely prefer that a tax should be laid upon the Frenchman's wine instead of upon the Englishman's beer. Therefore, when the right hon. Gentleman proceeded to draw parallels between the tax upon wine and that upon beer he was only carrying out that most mischievous portion of the doctrine of free trade which postponed the interests of the Englishman to that of the foreigner. The right hon. Gentleman, in order to wind up with one of those pleasant suggestions he knows so well how to make, told them that, although he was not going to deal with the malt tax now, they must not despair, as he did not say that at some future time some future Government might not deal with the duties on malt, and that perhaps they might look forward to the question being attended to by the House of Commons when the income tax had been repealed. Certainly, that prospect was but poor consolation to those upon whom the tax was now pressing with great weight. The right hon. Gentleman concluded his speech by saying that he believed the nation would approve his Budget. He wished to know what the right hon. Gentleman meant by the words "the nation?"—because it would appear that he had fallen into the very common error of regarding as the nation that portion of the community which was most frequently represented in that House, and who, therefore, held the control of the financial measures of the Government. If that body were to be regarded as "the nation," no doubt "the nation" would approve the Budget of the right hon. Gentleman. But he ventured to think that there was another portion of the population and the wealth of the country which had been lost sight of by the right hon. Gentleman, and which was entitled to be considered as coming within the pale of "the nation," who would not approve the statements which had been put forward that evening. He could only express the hope that that part of the community to which he had alluded, and which had been so long endeavouring to procure a remission of one of the most unjust taxes that ever existed, would not relax their efforts, but would see that their only chance of forcing upon any Government any remission of this unjust burden was by trusting to their own unaided energies and by relying upon their own unceasing exertions.

MR. MARSH said, he could not agree in the remarks of the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck), for he regarded the reduction of the price of wheat as one of the greatest blessings ever granted to the country. His right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his most admirable financial statement, had argued that the increase in the imports of the raw material for the manufacture of paper showed that the repeal of the paper duties had acted as a strong stimulus to the manufacture of paper in this country; and then, against this increase in the importation of the raw material, he set an alleged decrease of the English raw material, from the supply of cotton-waste having diminished. But the contrary was the case. The waste of Indian cotton, of which a large quantity had been imported during the last year or so, was 20 per cent greater than that of American cotton, and therefore the decrease of cotton-waste must have been but small, and could not be regarded as counterbalancing the large increase in the importation of the raw material for the manufacture of paper. The right hon. Gentleman's argument with reference to the malt tax was most conclusive and unanswerable; but in one respect he might strengthen it to some extent. The right hon. Gentleman, in estimating the consumption of beer, had excluded women and children from his calculation, but had omitted to exclude the cider drinkers of the country, who might be taken roughly to amount to a million persons. His right hon. Friend had mentioned the fact that wine was sold in this country at the present time at 5s. per gallon. He had tasted that wine at some of the railway stations, and had been satisfactorily convinced it was most horrible stuff. It was retailed at the railway refreshment stalls at 6d. a glass, and as there were twelve glasses to a bottle, there resulted to the vender a profit of about 700 per cent. This was a state of things he wished to see altered, and he believed the only way to enable the public to obtain good cheap wine was to make the sale of wine a free trade. The sum received by the Exchequer from the sale of wine licences was but small, and the desire to retain it should not be allowed to prevent the public from obtaining cheap wine. The duty upon tea was to be reduced 6d. in the pound, which would relieve the poor man who consumed four ounces a week to the extent of 6s. 6d. per annum, the loss to the revenue being £1,700,000. If the poor man had a large family he would have to buy a bushel of flour a week, the duty upon which at 1s. a quarter would amount exactly to the same sum—namely 6s. 6d. a year. He wished the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with the boldness which characterized his operations in finance, had reduced the tobacco duty one-half. Tobacco was a very great comfort to a poor man, and often kept him out of mischief. He had lived in a country where there was free trade in tobacco, and where the working man was able to buy the best negro-head. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer had proposed such a reduction he had no doubt that in two years the Exchequer would be fully recouped and he would confer upon the poor man, upon whom the greater part of the duties were levied, a real boon. One of the most anomalous imposts remaining was the duty on timber. The duty on raw timber was 1s. a load; if it were split the duty was 2s. a load; but if it were worked up into pianofortes or a chest of drawers, it was not taxed at all. A ship built in America was taxed at 1s. per ton. Timber from Nova Scotia paid a duty of 1s. a load; but a ship built in Nova Scotia paid nothing at all. This was protecting not British industry, but the industry of other nations. The result was to a certain extent to induce farmers to grow ash trees in hedge rows, where they exhausted the soil, and to cause the larger trees to be cut down when they were very ornamental. At the same time he must express his approval of the Budget generally, and especially of the reduction of the duty on tea, which would be a great boon to the poor; and he should always rejoice to see their interests continue.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, that he, in common with the rest of the House, had felt the influence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's eloquence, and there was one part of the right hon. Gentleman's masterly statement which gave him more than ordinary pleasure. He was nevertheless somewhat disappointed by his proposition with regard to Fire Insurance, for he had ventured to hope that his views might have taken a wider range, and that his policy would have been to reduce the duty to 1s. all round. He had submitted statistical evidence to the House which he hoped would convince the right hon. Gentleman that the effect of such a reduction would be to bring quite as large an amount to the Exchequer. But the right hon. Gentleman had not given the duty a chance of replacing itself, and he, therefore, for one, had no confidence in the result. He accepted the reduction, however, as a further instalment; and his only consolation was in hoping that in the next Session of Parliament the state of the finances would warrant him in applying for, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer in conceding, a further reduction of the duty to 1s.

MR. DU CANE said, that the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Marsh), who thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer had forgotten the important fact in reference to the [malt tax that those who drank cider did not drink beer, appeared himself to have forgotten that those who live in cider counties used to know how to take care of themselves in matters of taxation better than those who grew barley; for when Sir Robert Walpole proposed to levy a cider tax they nearly got up a rebellion. Those who lived in barley-growing counties, however, sought for redress in a quieter manner. He did not wish, on the present occasion, to discuss the details of the Budget; but, as the representative of a barley-growing constituency, he could not help expressing, not his sense of disappointment, for he had never had much hope on the subject, but his sense of the injustice with which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had met the fair and temperate claims of the agricultural interest in respect to a reduction of the malt tax. Several of his friends were sanguine enough to believe that the Chancellor of the Exchequer's mysterious silence on the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend (Sir FitzRoy Kelly) was neither more nor less than the silence of consent, and that they had only to wait until that evening to be thankful to the right hon. Gentleman for a pleasing surprise upon the malt tax question. For himself, he had not shared, in the slightest degree, in that delusion. He had always thought the prize was one of far too much value and importance to be parted with by the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon any smaller compulsion than that of a majority of the House of Commons. But the weapons which the right hon. Gentleman employed against the advocates of the reduction of the malt tax were quite worthy of such a master as he had always shown himself in the art of evading pitched battles on the main question at issue. Last year he met the agitation by his Malt for Cattle Bill, the utter inutility of which the right hon. Gentleman had shown that night by his own statistics. The Motion of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for West Suffolk the right hon. Gentleman met this year by a Report from the Board of Trade, which affirmed statements that were at variance with the conclusions of nine out of ten of every practical farmer whose opinion he (Mr. Du Cane) had consulted. To-night the right hon. Gentleman had in the same spirit evaded the main question by a fanciful scheme for levying the duty by weight instead of by measure. As the right hon. Gentleman had told them that this would form the subject of a separate Bill, he (Mr. Du Cane) did not wish to discuss the details or prejudge the question. But without committing himself to a hasty opinion, he could not help fearing that the only effect of this change would be to open the door to frauds on the revenue without conferring any benefit upon the growers of inferior barley. The right hon. Gentleman had paid a feeling and a just tribute to the memory of Mr. Cobden; but he did not think that hon. Member had ever spoken more to the purpose than in one of the last speeches he addressed to the House, when speaking of the malt tax last year he warned the opponents of the tax that there would be quite as much difficulty in putting on the coping-stone of free trade as there had been in laying the foundation stone of the edifice; and when he also expressed his conviction that the advocates of the repeal of the malt tax were only at the beginning of a long and arduous campaign. What had happened that night had proved the truth of the prediction; and he (Mr. Du Cane) could not help thinking that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had thrown away a golden opportunity of doing the agriculturists justice. He found himself in possession of a surplus far larger than for many years past, and larger also than any Chancellor of the Exchequer might expect to have for many years to come, and his financial policy was on the eve of trial before the constituencies. He (Mr. Du Cane) had no wish to see the malt tax repealed at a single blow, and the deficiency made good by the income tax. He disliked the income tax, the tea duty, and the malt duty; but he thought that all taxes should be fairly considered in their turn. During the last four or five years the tea duties had been considerably reduced, the income tax had undergone successive reductions, the paper duty had been abolished—an instance of that class legislation which the right hon. Gentleman this evening had correctly described as a mistake of the grossest order—and surely now the time had arrived when it was the fair turn of the malt tax to be considered. The right hon. Gentleman had thrown away a great opportunity, for if he had reduced the income tax by one penny, dealt as he proposed with the Fire Insurance Duty, and had then employed the rest of his surplus to get rid of one-half of the malt tax, as an instalment towards its future repeal, he would have retained all his present friends, and would also have conciliated many who, as matters now stood, would be found in future to be his opponents. It was probable, looking to the result of the division which recently took place upon the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Suffolk, that the present House of Commons would approve the right hon. Gentleman's financial scheme; but when an appeal was made to the constituencies he believed that a very different opinion would be expressed. No doubt cheap tea and cheap beer were equally acceptable to the working classes; but they ought not to be put in the same category as regarded the question of taxation. The duty on malt was a violation of a fundamental principle of free trade, because it fell on the raw material of an article of both home production and consumption, but the duty on tea was levied exclusively on an article of foreign growth and manufacture. The fact was that if malt was, in this case, to be compared with anything it ought to be compared with corn or bread and not with tea and sugar. Then as to the respective incidence of the income tax and the malt duty. If the mass of the labouring population and of the farmers were asked which they most objected to, they would reply that they would prefer the tax upon an article of absolute necessity to them to be reduced rather than the income tax, which they did not pay. The pressure of the malt duty, especially in barley-growing districts, was treble that of the income tax. For instance, a farmer cultivating 300 acres of land in a barley district would consume for himself and his labourers some 100 bushels of malt a year. Supposing his rent to be 30s. an acre it would amount to £450 a year, and the income tax upon one-half that amount at the present rate would be £6 5s. while the tax upon 100 bushels of malt would be £13 10s. Therefore the proposed reduction on the latter tax of 2d. in the pound would save him only £2 annually, while a reduction of the malt tax by one-half would save him upwards of £7. The right hon. Gentleman had made use of the old argument, of a comparison between the prices of barley and wheat, and showed that as the former maintained its value the farmer had no grievance to complain of. But that argument was a gigantic fallacy. No one ever denied that first-class barley always fetched a good price; but the effect of the Excise duty was to create a monopoly and to render all but the first-class barley unsalable for purposes of malting. The averages of prices, too, which the right hon. Gentleman had quoted were not fairly struck because they were taken solely upon first-class barley. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman said "No;" but statistics, he thought, would prove his (Mr. Du Cane's) statement. However, he would not pursue that point; but would only add that if the hon. and learned Member for Suffolk should think it right to renew the contest he would be found again under the hon. and learned Gentleman's banner; but it was upon the hustings that the great battle of the malt tax must be fairly fought out, and he believed that when that battle was fought the right hon. Gentleman would find that he had reckoned without his host, and that an approval of his Budget would not be pronounced by a large portion of the taxpayers of this country.

SIR FRANCIS CROSSLEY said, he had listened with interest to the eloquent statement of the right hon. Gentleman, and approved of the main proposals of his financial scheme. He did not think that hon. Members were to blame for bringing under discussion such questions as the insurance duty and the malt tax even before the Budget, as it was their province to suggest to the Government what kind of Budget would be pleasing to their constituents. He had voted against the repeal of the malt tax and for the repeal of the insurance duty, and he was therefore glad to find that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made a concession in respect of the latter duty, but he must not expect too great results from the modification. He had told the right hon. Gentleman last year that he must not expect too great an increase in the insurances on stocks, because manufacturers and merchants like himself had before the reduction always insured, when they were charged 7s. or 8s. per cent for extra risks; but when the premium was only 1s. 6d. upon furniture it would be questionable whether parties would insure to a large extent. Even with the reduction now proposed as there would still be a tax of 100 per cent upon prudence; and when the duty on beer was only 20 per cent surely that was an excessive rate. The hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) had challenged the right hon. Gentleman's calculations as to the consumption of beer since 1722, because of the increased exportation of that article; but the hon. Gentleman himself overlooked the number of total abstainers in this country now who were not to be found in former times. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that Parliament ought to make some further effort to reduce our enormous National Debt; and in that opinion he (Sir Francis Crossley) entirely concurred. He should like the Government to set aside every year £500,000 for the purchase of terminable annuities, to expire at the end of 100 years; that sum thus set aside would ensure, at that period, a reduction of the Debt by a sum of £10,000,000, and that he thought would be a much better safeguard against future wars than our present enormous expenditure. He was glad that the duty upon tea had been reduced to so large an extent, as the consumer was likely to get the benefit from it; and he also approved of the manner in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had dealt with the income tax.

MR. BARROW said, he could not share the satisfaction which had been expressed in the hon. Gentleman's proposition; for, although he was desirous to see a reduction of the income tax, he had no desire to be relieved at the expense of those who suffered grievously from the incidence of the malt tax. He protested against the charge, that in asking for a reduction of the malt duty, they were seeking for class legislation. No manufacturer paid duty on the article of his manufacture. The small farmer was very little affected by the income tax, but he was very largely concerned with the malt duty, which was a tax upon an article that he largely consumed; in fact, that tax fell as heavily upon him as the income tax did upon the large proprietor. It was said that if the malt tax was repealed, the landowners would raise their rents by an equal amount, but he had too good an opinion of the landlords to believe that statement. He differed from the remarks which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made respecting the barley averages, and considered that his conclusions were drawn from incorrect premises. It was a fallacy to calculate the price of barley from the average price returned from the markets, for the average price to the grower was much lower than that. He was not asking for class legislation or favouritism, but as the manufacturer did not pay a tax on the articles of his manufacture, the farmer ought not to be taxed for barley, which entered so largely into his consumption for various purposes.

MR. WHALLEY said, that he had always been opposed to the malt tax, and he thought that if the hon. and learned Member for Suffolk had proposed to the Chancellor to repeal it, and to increase the income tax 2d. in the pound, that that right hon. Gentleman would have agreed to the proposal. He rose to express his satisfaction generally with the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and particularly with the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. Looking at the reduction of the income tax and at the promises made by the right hon. Gentleman with regard to that particular tax, he inferred that it was his intention of still further dealing with that tax in the event of a surplus next year. As a direct tax, the income tax was harsh, oppressive, and demoralizing.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that on the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer's own showing, he had the means of making an important reduction of the malt duty; but, on the contrary, the right hon. Gentleman had gone out of his way to show that he was not inclined to conciliate the good feelings of the agricultural class. He had never been one to contend that, with such an Imperial expenditure as we had to meet, beer was an unfit subject for taxation; and he admitted that it would be difficult to relieve beer altogether from taxation so long as alcoholic drinks were subject to taxation. Although, therefore, it would be difficult to remit the duty altogether, he thought it would be far better if it were levied on beer instead of malt. He was inclined to think that if the malt tax had been one that affected the trading and manufacturing interests it would long ago have been re-adjusted. A tax on beer instead of on malt would be acceptable to the farmers, and would prevent them feeling that their interests were not duly considered by the Government. Among the agricultural classes the feeling was that the right hon. Gentleman did not pay that deference to them which he paid to other classes. The right hon. Gentleman now proposed to reduce the duty on tea, of which nobody complained. The right hon. Gentleman, in support of his proposal, had been guilty of gross fallacy in his comparison of the relative proportion of taxation on a barrel of beer and on a chest of tea. Before such a comparison could fairly be made the tea must be put into the pot and made an article for consumption; and the same fallacy existed in the comparison which the right hon. Gentleman had drawn between beer and spirits. He thought that the right hon. Gentleman ought to have taken that opportunity to re-adjust the malt tax.

MR. J. B. SMITH regretted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not taken this opportunity of repealing the timber duty. It was an indefensible anomaly that we should admit the manufactured article free of duty, and impose a tax upon the raw material, more especially as timber was now the only raw material upon the importation of which any duty was levied. He was aware that it would have been impossible this year to repeal this duty without making a corresponding reduction in our expenditure; but the expenditure was, in his opinion, far beyond what it ought to be, and he hoped that next year it would be so reduced as to render possible the measure which he was advocating. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had reduced the income tax, for he thought that if placed on a proper footing it would not be an unpopular tax; and he did not desire to see it totally abolished. Seeing that our direct taxation was so small as compared with indirect taxation, he thought all reductions should now be confined to the latter. The duty upon tobacco was so enormous as to lead both to smuggling and adulteration. At the time that he was President of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce some tobaccoists of Manchester brought before the Chamber the losses to which honest traders were subjected by having to compete with those who undersold them by selling adulterated instead of real tobacco. The Chamber sent a person to buy a small quantity at twenty tobaccoists shops, and it was found that only two out of the twenty were genuine tobacco. He believed that if the duty were reduced by one-half there would be no loss to the revenue.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had never been more sanguine than on the present occasion; but despite the right hon. Gentlemen's sanguine anticipations that after the speech which he had delivered that evening he should never again hear, either in the House or out of it, the arguments which had been used against the retention of the malt tax at its present amount, he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that all the arguments which had induced him to recommend the diminution of that duty remained in full force. He had never heard any remarks of the right hon. Gentleman which were more full of fallacies and assumptions than those which he had made that evening with reference to the malt tax. After having endeavoured to show that unless they went very deeply into the reduction of the tax they had better leave it alone, the right hon. Gentleman referred to no less than four sources of diminution of revenue, the last of which was the article of spirits, and he argued that the revenue would lose as much or more by the decrease of the consumption of spirits as it would gain by the increase of that of beer. Was there ever an assumption so entirely and absolutely without proof? At the very best it could only be an assumption; but it was an assumption that was not justified by any experience they had had of past legislation, or of the legislation of the right hon. Gentleman himself. The right hon. Gentleman greatly reduced the duties upon wines, and he told them in glowing language that the cheap wines which would come in would find their way into the consumption of classes of people who, up to that moment, had never had the opportunity of consuming wine of any sort at all. Well, and what had been the effect? The consumption of beer, spirits, and tea had increased, and the consumption of wine, which he told them had greatly increased, had taken place pari passu with that increased consumption of popular beverages. Then, he asked, why was not a similar recovery to take place in the consumption of beer to that produced by a corresponding diminution in other taxable and potable articles? All analogy was against the right hon. Gentleman, and he challenged him to his proof. The right hon. Gentleman went on to state that it was not fair to contrast wine with beer, wine being a costly article and beer a cheap one. The true comparison between beer and any other popular drink would be in the article of tea, which, according to the right hon. Gentleman, was to come into popular rivalry with beer. Well, in the present Budget he was going to reduce the duty upon tea one-half, and he contemplated most naturally—and justly, as he (Lord John Manners) believed—that the increased consumption of tea would very greatly recover the first loss to the revenue; but he did not anticipate any falling off in the consumption of beer—not a bit of it—but he assumed that the consumption of beer would go on increasing without the slightest reference to the great increase in the consumption of tea. He had no doubt the right hon. Gentleman was correct in his anticipations as to the increased consumption of tea; and therefore he contended that, on his own showing, taking his own figures, the assumption of the right hon. Gentleman, that by dealing with the malt tax they would reduce the revenue on other articles, was an assumption not worth the breath that conveyed it to the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman fell back upon an argument which he thought he was entitled to the sole merit of discovering. He told them that if he ventured to reduce the duty upon malt without touching the duty upon spirits every Irish and Scotch Member would be up in arms against the proposition. Now they had had this question discussed two or three times during the last two or three years; and he had a vivid recollection of a speech made last year by an Irish county Member, strong and argumentative, in favour of the reduction and ultimate repeal of the malt tax. That speech was made by the hon. Member for the County of Westmeath (Mr. Pollard-Urquhart), who sat behind the right hon. Gentleman, and was also a Scotch landed proprietor. The right hon. Gentleman had really invented this argument; for he could not suppose that a proposal which promoted the physical comfort and moral improvement of the people of Ireland and Scotland would be opposed by the representatives of those countries, because the Chancellor of the Exchequer might not be disposed to make a corresponding diminution in the taxation upon spirits. He entreated the right hon. Gentleman, when next he addressed the House, not to endeavour to raise sectional and national differences upon a question which ought to be treated upon broad and Imperial grounds, and which, in reality, affected for good the people of Ireland and Scotland equally with the people of England. Then the right hon. Gentleman stated that he had found most clearly from the operation of his most wonderful Act of last year that the farmers of England and others did not want any alteration in the malt tax; because, whereas some twenty-eight people had taken out licences under that Act eleven of them had already given up the precarious boon offered them; and he had letters from some of them (he did not say how many), informing him that they had done so, not in consequence of the stringency of the regulations in that Act, but because they could not find a market for the article. He (Lord John Manners) should like to know how many of the eleven persons to whom he referred had written for information to the right hon. Gentleman, and how many of them had told him that the reason why they had given up their licences was because they found the farmers, whose custom they hoped to obtain, did not wish to go some miles to purchase an article which they wished to be allowed to manufacture for themselves out of their damaged or inferior barley. The fact was that the right hon. Gentleman's scheme had failed, and fallen to the ground. He (Lord John Manners) would not now refer at length to the nibbling at the malt tax, to which the right hon. Gentleman had alluded; but as the measure of last year had failed, so assuredly would this nibbling attempt on the outposts of the malt tax. The right hon. Gentleman would find that neither his concessions nor his arguments would have the slightest effect in convincing that large section of the community who felt that they were aggrieved, and insulted even by the maintenance in undiminished severity of a burden which pressed heavily upon them. But the right hon. Gentleman denied, in somewhat grandiloquent terms, that any repeal, or reduction of taxation had of late years taken place for the benefit and at the instance of any particular class. On this he joined issue with the right hon. Gentleman. He could not suppose that hon. Members had forgotten that the abolition of the duty on the importation of raw cotton was in the first instance sought for by the class which it chiefly affected. It must also be borne in mind that all remissions of taxation must be regarded as conducing in the long run to the benefit of the community generally, and he had no doubt that the whole community would ultimately derive considerable benefit from the repeal of the malt tax even though it could be proved—as it undoubtedly could—that the malt tax pressed with unusual severity on the cultivators of the soil. But the right hon. Gentleman went on to argue that those who advocated the repeal of that tax were, after all, only playing into the hands of those dreadful beings who had their headquarters at Liverpool, the financial reformers, who sought to prepare the way for the remission of all indirect taxation. But were there no reasons founded in justice and common-sense why the malt tax should be dealt with without necessitating the repeal of every other indirect impost? Was not the malt tax essentially a burden on production and industry, and might it not be fairly classed with those duties which the right hon. Gentleman himself had been among the most earnest to denounce and repeal? It really seemed as if that part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's exposition which regarded the malt tax had been originally designed as a reply to the arguments of the hon. and learned Member for Suffolk (Sir FitzRoy Kelly), but that for some reason or other it had not been let off. He thought, he might add, that the right hon. Gentleman had not scanned very carefully the division list in connection with the hon. and learned Member's Motion, for if he had done so he would have found that the financial reformers to whom he alluded, although they might occasionally find it convenient to entrap unwary country gentlemen into alliance with them by expressing their hostility to the tax, yet were silent in debate on the subject and absent or hostile upon a division. Of course, he should be glad to have the support of those Gentlemen if they were willing to give it; but then he would observe that he hoped when the time came to discuss the total abolition of the duty on spirits and other articles which were the objects of indirect taxation, the right hon. Gentleman would be able to make out a better case against their abolition than he had against the repeal of a duty on industry which ought, on his own principles, to be done away with at once and for ever. He would, moreover, advise those unfortunate Whig Gentlemen who were about to look for the support of county constituencies in the interest of the present Government, not to go to the hustings with the weight of the malt tax round their necks, for they would not find that the arguments of the Chancellor would have much weight in that quarter. The agricultural constituencies would, on the contrary, feel that they had been treated with an entire want of due respect and consideration by the right hon. Gentleman, and would infer from his present speech that they had nothing whatever to expect from him but a determined opposition to their just claims. He had simply to say in conclusion that it was not his intention to offer the slightest opposition to the Budget, but would content himself with the expression of his regret that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, by the tone and tenor of his speech, had shown that he had not the slightest intention to concede any portion of the just claims of the agricultural and beer-consuming classes.

MR. SURTEES said, he had heard with considerable regret the statement made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it was not his intention to deal with the malt tax in the present Budget. The substance of what the right hon. Gentleman said on the subject was, "How can I, in justice to Scotland and Ireland, remove the malt tax, while I leave the spirit duties untouched?" But under that query two fallacies were, he thought, to be found; the first being that no relief from taxation ought to be given to one section of a highly composite community without providing some contemporaneous compensation to the others; the second, that the spirit duties as a method of taxation were analogous to the malt tax. Now, remission of taxation, he contended, must be partial as well as gradual; partial, because it would be almost impossible to apportion a surplus strictly among the various public burdens which affected specifically different sections of the population. No Chancellor of the Exchequer, as far as he knew, had ever attempted, out of a moderate surplus, to grant relief to all classes at once. All had, on the contrary, proceeded on the common-sense principle of relieving first one class and then another. It was, of course, a grand thing for a Finance Minister to find himself able to attack a burden the pressure of which was spread over an unusually large area. But the question "Whose turn has come?" was always the true one. Last year came the turn of the sugar duties; also the turn partially of the fire insurance duty; and as a matter of justice, not as a matter of favour, he thought it was now the turn of the malt tax. Still more extraordinary than the first was the second fallacy to which he alluded; nor did he believe that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had really imposed upon himself the belief that there was any true analogy between the spirit duties and the malt duty. The spirit duty was a tax upon the manufactured article—the malt tax was a tax upon the raw material. The true analogy was between beer and spirits—between a beer duty and the spirit duty. The fallacy was made more palpable if it were borne in mind that the raw material of beer and whisky was, or ought to be, the same. He said whisky, because brandy and rum were foreign products. Gin was, to a great extent, a luxury confined to England, and was additionally exceptional, because it was the greatest parent of vice and misery in the kingdom. It was the opium of England, as absinthe was of France. Well, the right hon. Gentleman in his Budget last year contemplated with satisfaction the gradual change of taste that was going forward from stronger and more ardent liquors to milder and more wholesome liquors; and, again, as if to show the essential difference between the case of beer and spirits, he said in the same speech, in regard to this particular article (spirits), it was the business of the Government to derive from it the largest amount of possible revenue, without the same regard which was paid in other cases to the encouragement of the manufacture or to augmented consumption. The right hon. Gentleman's argument, therefore, finally stood thus:—Because there was a manufactured article the consumption of which, "though an evil," was great among the Scotch and Irish, the burdens upon which were beneficial to State morality, therefore the remission of a troublesome tax upon a blameless article of English consumption must be postponed. According to this, the malt tax would never be removed until the moral taint attached to the consumption of spirits was done away. For even if the right hon. Gentleman had a surplus large enough to deal with both the spirit duties and the malt tax at once, he would still feel bound from motives of morality to retain the former, and from motives of impartiality to retain the latter.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he was puzzled to know why the Chancellor of the Exchequer had introduced into his speech the subjects of the rag duty and the condition of the paper trade, which he stated to be most flourishing. Now it was not more than a month ago, that a deputation of seventy Members of that House and eighty representatives of the paper trade waited on the First Minister to represent the condition in which the trade was, and to ask for a redress of injury—or, in fact, for justice. The truth was that the trade was suffering deeply from the unfortunate blunder made at the time of the negotiation between this country and France which eventuated in the French Treaty. On the occasion of the interview with the First Lord of the Treasury, a proposal was made on behalf of the trade, and if that proposal were adopted it would have the effect of releasing the trade from the consequences of a most deplorable blunder. It would not raise the price of the manufactured article to the consumer, or affect in the slightest degree the newspaper press of the country. On the contrary, he thought he might say that so far from raising the price of paper, it would, without imposing one shilling of taxation, have the effect of lowering the price. The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that a gentleman who had a large quantity of waste cotton on hand could not get more than 9s. or 10s. for what 25s. were formerly paid. The explanation of the fact was simple. At the time of the cotton famine the relative value of cotton waste to cotton rags was so enormous that the trade could not use it—they could scarcely get cotton-waste at all, and what they did get was of the worst possible quality; but it was now coming back to something like a normal price, and gradually re-entering into consumption. He thought he could prove that the blunder made by the Government had entailed on the trade most calamitous consequences. Within the last nine months, to his certain knowledge, no fewer than seven or eight important houses in the trade had been obliged to stop business. Under these circumstances, he hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would on the part of the Government adopt the proposition of the trade, which was ready to bind itself not to raise the price of paper for the next five years; and, indeed, no intention of that kind existed. Without entering into the comparison between whisky and malt, he expressed his regret, as an Irish Member, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not thought of the strong claims of the Irish distillers. [A laugh.] Some Gentlemen might laugh, but it was a fact that the trade was nearly crushed out of existence. The duty was too high, and a large amount of revenue might be obtained from a lower duty.

Mr. BASS said, he was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not in his place to hear the observations which had just been made in reference to the paper trade. As to the Budget, he (Mr. Bass) thought it would be satisfactory to a large proportion of the people; but, notwithstanding that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had secured the gratitude of all the old women in the country by reducing the tea duty, he must say that he regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had not paid any attention to the claims of the malt duty for consideration. He thought that the right hon. Gentleman had fallen into one or two errors upon the subject. He had said that the consumer would not get a farthing a pot reduction in the price of beer, unless the duty was reduced from 2s. 8½d to 1s. 2d.; but, in his calculation, he had left out of consideration the profit which the brewer expected to make upon the capital he advanced to pay the malt tax. The brewer paid 82s. or 84s. per quarter for his barley; but, in addition, he paid 22s. duty upon its conversion into malt; and his profit must be calculated upon the whole amount. He was persuaded that the additional competition in the trade by the reduction of the duty would tend to the benefit of the agricultural interest. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had attempted to alarm the Committee by stating that a reduction in the malt duties would cause a diminution in the receipts for the spirit duties. But he (Mr. Bass) was persuaded that such apprehensions were entirely groundless. In 1853 the consumption of malt in this country amounted to 36,000,000 bushels; in 1855, during the Russian war, those duties were largely increased, and the consumption of malt fell to 30,000,000 bushels; but in 1858, when the extra duties were removed, the lost ground was more than recovered, for the consumption of malt rose to 38,000,000 bushels. Now, with regard to the spirit duties, in 1853 duty was paid in England upon 10,350,000 gallons, and in 1855, in the middle of the Russian war, it was near about the same, being 10,384,000 gallons; but in 1858, when the duty upon malt was materially reduced, the duty was paid upon 10,448,000 gallons, being more than was paid in 1855, when the duty upon malt was so much higher. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had, he was happy to find, acknowledged the injustice he committed three years ago in favour of the farming interest by the imposition of the brewer's licence. He then took off the duty upon hops, and in order to recoup the revenue for the loss he imposed an additional duty upon brewers' licences. Now, anything more nearly approaching confiscation than that was never attempted by any Chancellor of the Exchequer. He was, therefore, glad to find that at last the right hon. Gentleman was sensible of the injustice he then inflicted on the brewing interest. The practical effect of the change had been that while in the last three years he had been compelled to pay 20,000 guineas for a licence to carry on his business, before he could tell whether he was manufacturing at a profit or a loss, so far from receiving any benefit in return from a reduction in the price of hops, he had to pay an additional price for his hops, because the growers of hops, having no longer any duty to pay, were not obliged to send their hops to market, but held them back in order to obtain better prices. He considered that a great grievance. The Committee had no doubt heard enough about the malt tax, but he could not refrain from saying that although he had never listened to a more ingenious speech than that made that night by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it would not convince him that the right hon. Gentleman had not made a great mistake with regard to the malt duties, and he felt quite convinced that the Government would be sure to hear of it when a general election took place. No outcry had been raised against the tea duty, but a strong desire had been expressed for a reduction of the malt tax. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had endeavoured to show that the malt tax was not out of proportion to the duties on other taxable articles; but if that were so, the dealers in malt had been for the last fifty years most unjustly treated, because in 1815 there was a much smaller duty paid on malt than now, and consequently since then they had been paying a much higher duty than they ought to have done. He was sorry the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not entertained the malt question in a more liberal spirit; and all he could say, as an individual trader was, that he should continue to enjoy the present profit upon the duty that remained, and the country would have to pay for it.

MR. R. LONG said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had spoken of the expediency of dealing impartially with different kinds of taxation; but the policy of the Government for some time had been to take off Customs duties, leaving the Excise duties in their full oppressiveness. In fact, the fiscal policy of the right hon. Gentleman was to favour the foreign trade at the cost of the home trade. He was in favour of a reduction of the malt tax with the view to its ultimate abolition. A more transparent sophistry it would be difficult to meet with than was embodied in the assertion that the abolition of the malt duty would give a death-blow to indirect taxation. If the duty on malt were abolished to-morrow there was nothing to prevent the right hon. Gentleman from requiring licences to be paid for as well on the consumption as on the sale of beer, both of which would be indirect taxes. Nobody need brew or sell beer unless he liked; but duty levied upon malt was in fact duty levied upon meat. And far from convincing those who felt with the agriculturists on this subject, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would doubtless find that his own words in 1853, when he told the farmers that the reason the repeal of the malt tax as a cause was so weak was because they had never taken the trouble to agitate, would be remembered and turned to account. There would soon be agitation enough on the subject, and in the next Parliament, doubtless, no one would be so earnest an advocate for the repeal of this tax as the right hon. Gentleman himself. The right hon. Gentleman would render good service to the country if, by consolidating the assessed taxes in any way, he could do away with the labour inflicted on certain classes in filling up the assessment papers, and also if he would turn his attention to the tax on farm leases, which stood unnecessarily high.

WRITS REGISTRATION (SCOTLAND)
BILL—[BILL 41].—[The Lord Advocate.]

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that in a former Session they had had a full discussion upon the subject to which it related, and there was a good deal of difference of opinion among Scotch Members in respect to it, and he therefore thought it due to them that he should explain the grounds upon which it was now introduced to the House. It was well known that in Scotland there had existed for two centuries or more—certainly as far back as 1617—a system of land registration not only as respects the conveyance of land, and the mortgage of land, but of all deeds affecting the transfer of land; in consequence of which all those who might be interested in such transfer had the means of ascertaining the burdens which might exist upon any particular land proposed to be transferred. No doubt so far as regarded certainty and security of title the system had been to a large extent a very complete system of registration; but it had this one great defect—namely, that the expenses attending it were very great; and the object of this Bill was to diminish those expenses, to put the system upon a more complete footing, and to put the means of ascertaining the particulars of registration into a more easy form. The system introduced in 1617 established two separate systems of registration—one, a general register to be kept at Edinburgh under the control of an officer termed the Lord Clerk Registrar; and the other a system of registration, not according to a county arrangement, but in certain specified districts, by means of which persons selling or burdening land might register the conveyance deeds, the deeds of incumbrance, or other particulars requiring registration. That general and particular registration was intended undoubtedly for the convenience of persons residing in remote districts of Scotland at the time when communication between different parts of Scotland were much more difficult than it was at the present time; and the result was obviously that when persons wished to purchase land or lend money on the security of landed estates, or when they wished to ascertain whether any burdens attached to any particular landed estate, they were obliged of necessity to search both in the General Registry at Edinburgh, and in the particular registry in the district in which the land was registered; and it not only obliged them to look into the registry of one county; a deed respecting the conveyance of land or the burdens upon it might be registered in another county than that in which the land was, and consequently a great deal of trouble was often given to the searcher. This state of things continued to exist, and at the present day there were nineteen particular registries in Scotland in different districts, and also the General Registry at Edinburgh. But there was another matter which in course of time came to be more important even than the expense of searching a double register. Of course, the accumulation of records of this nature necessarily went on from year to year, and at last the records became so great as to become almost unmanageable, so that in the beginning of this century they got into a condition in which it was exceedingly difficult for persons to prosecute their search. Though the deeds were registered in the particular registries in the districts, they were not actually kept there; but the Lord Clerk Registrar sent out from his head office in Edinburgh a book in which the matters required to be registered were

register kept that book until it was completed; and he then sent it for the purpose of preservation to Edinburgh; and in that way the whole of the records, whether registered in the particular or the General Registry, were kept in Edinburgh, and were there accessible for the purpose of searching. The accumulation of these records introduced a great difficulty. Under the original statute the keeper of the register was only bound to record the deeds and make a minute of them; he was not bound to index them. But in the commencement of the present century this state of things was found so inconvenient that very great efforts were made to supply the want of an index, and a gentleman who had charge of the registers, Mr. Thompson, did actually prepare an index of the various records up to 1845. But in order to accomplish the work, it was necessary to make an abridgment of deeds and records, giving the names of the particular buyers or sellers of the land, and the place to which the purchase or burden related, and from that abridgment a general index was made; but from the necessity of sending up the registers from the particular registries to Edinburgh only when the books were filled, those particular registers came up at intervals sometimes of a year, sometimes two, and sometimes of three years, so that it was impossible to make a general index of the records which at all corresponded in period of time with the contemporaneous registry of deeds itself. The object of this Bill was to do away with those difficulties, by concentrating the whole of the registries in Edinburgh, and thus to enable the officials to prepare not merely a record of the whole of the registers for the counties in Edinburgh—so that the whole records might be accessible at one time—but also so to arrange as to have the records under one uniform superintendence, and under one staff of officers, and to have them indexed contemporaneously with the registry itself; and, consequently, that the person searching with reference to the records of any one particular year, should be able to refer to the index of that year in one volume in order to obtain the information that he required. That was the general objects of this Bill. He proposed to abolish the particular registries in the districts altogether. And whereas at present the records were brought up to Edinburgh only at intervals he proposed that they be brought up regularly, provision being made for indexing those registries at the time. That this would be a great improvement for convenience of search nobody would deny. The saving of expense might be judged from the fact that the present local registries cost £12,000 a year, no part of which was for the benefit of the public, it was solely for the benefit of the keepers of the registers. On the other hand, the Registry Office in Edinburgh was not only a self-supporting institution, drawing nothing from the Government, its income being £9,500 a year, but there was actually a surplus of £5,000 a year, which found its way into the public Exchequer. The amount of business done in Edinburgh was represented by the registration of 5,700 deeds a year, while the number of deeds registered in the particular registries amounted only to 4,000 a year. It was not only clear, therefore, that the present surplus would be continued, but it would increase to a great extent. It might be said—and he admitted that there was some force in the observation—“You are taking away a most important office from the localities, and you are taking away the patronage which attaches to the office which has previously been dispensed in the localities.” He was not at all insensible to the importance or the weight of that consideration; but the public interest ought not to suffer from the continuance of the present system, because private interests might be involved. It would be said, in opposition to the Bill, that there was an advantage in having a registry in particular districts. He entirely denied that there was any advantage to any one from having the registries in particular districts, except to the keepers who benefited by the fees. He could quite understand that in former days, when it was necessary to travel to the towns where the registries were kept, it might have been important that people should have to travel only ten, twenty or thirty miles, instead of having to travel 100 or 150 miles to Edinburgh; but the whole state of affairs was changed. At the present day one-half at least of the deeds are sent by post, and, of course, it was as easy to send to Edinburgh from Aberdeen, as it was from Perth or Dundee, or any other part of Scotland, and, it was moreover, just as safe to send by post from one place as from another. Therefore, it was quite vain to say that the breaking up of the local registries will be inconvenient to persons whose titles were to be registered.

The Lord Advocate

They had been told, upon a former occasion, that the object of their Bill was to benefit professional men. He could not himself see how it would do so in any way whatever. It would not alter the employment of the conveyancer in any manner; it would have no effect in respect to the registration of the conveyance; but this it would do, it would make the operation of searching for the record cheaper. And it was certainly a singular fact, that although it is suggested that it would benefit the profession in Edinburgh, the discussion in which the Bill originated was first raised by the profession at Glasgow, and the fact that the advocates and writers to the Signet at Glasgow took up the question and agitated in favour of the removal of the registries to Edinburgh showed at least that they did not consider that the profession would be injured by it. The result was that the Lord Advocate of Lord Derby's Government did introduce a Bill precisely the same in its object as the present; but the tenure of his office, and the pressure of business, rendered it impossible to carry the Bill through. Since then, he (the Lord Advocate) had been pressed to take up the former Bill; but he thought it right not to proceed without a preliminary inquiry, and two Commissioners were appointed who fully investigated the matter, and upon their Report he had prepared the present Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(The Lord Advocate.)

MR. DUNLOP said, the House will perceive that there is a Bill in the paper standing in my name on the same subject. We differ only in the mode in which we seek to secure the same object—namely, a register and an index that will really facilitate persons who may use them. It certainly was not his (Mr. Dunlop's) fault that the learned Lord Advocate should meet with any opposition to his Bill. The House knew it was always the custom of the Scotch Members to treat business of this kind in such a manner as to avoid anything like the introduction of competing Bills. The learned Lord, however, did not think it right upon this occasion to summon the Scotch Members to give their opinion on the question, and when he called the attention of the Government to the fact, and suggested that both the Bills would be sent to a Committee so that their details might be examined and one measure agreed upon, his learned Friend entirely objected. In the present instance they were driven to embark in a contest on the relative merits of the two Bills. At the same time, he must again express his willingness that they should both be sent to a Select Committee. The learned Lord had stated that the foundation of his Bill was a resolution of the Glasgow meeting in 1856, and the Report of the two Commissioners. It was quite true that the resolution referred to recommended a change in voting the sending of the registers to Edinburgh; but, on reference to the petitions presented from Glasgow, his learned Friend would find that much the greater number of the petitioners were in favour of his (Mr. Dunlop's) Bill as against that of the Bill of his learned Friend. On the last occasion when this matter was discussed, it was said that the object of his (Mr. Dunlop's) proposal was to subserve the private interests of professional gentlemen in the various towns where the particular registers were kept. Now, he begged to say that he was as free from wishing to support private interests at the public expense as the learned Lord. In point of fact, he had introduced this Bill after the fullest consideration, because he thought it was for the interest of the general public. The Bill of the learned Lord himself proposed to give them the fullest compensation for any loss they might sustain while he relieved them from all labour and responsibility. Not only so, but he proposed actually to compensate gentlemen who, by their own admission, were not legally entitled to compensation, but were bound to submit to any change that might be carried out. The House might be assured he (Mr. Dunlop) would not ask them to pass any Bill unless he was thoroughly convinced that it was for the public advantage. The other basis on which the learned Lord said his Bill was introduced was the Report of the Commission. But he (Mr. Dunlop) would call the attention of this House to the object for which that inquiry was instituted. The Commissioners were directed to ascertain whether it would be desirable to concentrate the local registries in Edinburgh, but they were not directed to inquire into the state of the General Registry in that city. The evidence taken by the Commissioners was taken in accordance with these instructions; and therefore there was no evidence whatever as to the desirability of transferring all the registries to the General Registry in Edinburgh. The evidence, moreover, was stated to have been taken in a most cursory and insufficient manner; and as an instance of the haste with which the Report was drawn up, it was there stated that from 1856 to 1861 the registries were not entered up, or at least the indices were in arrear. Therefore, there was not the slightest foundation in the Report of the Commissioners whereon this measure could be based. Now, as to the Bills themselves. The Lord Advocate, in a former debate, described his (Mr. Dunlop's) as a Registrar Bill. The learned Gentleman is as little entitled to impute to me a Bill on behalf of registrars as he (Mr. Dunlop) was to impute to him a Bill in the interests of the Edinburgh officials and candidates. No doubt registrars had an interest, but not a pecuniary one, for the Lord Advocate's Bill gave them full compensation, and relieved them from work and responsibility for life. He (Mr. Dunlop) did not ask the House to pass his Bill unless he could show it was for the public interest. The onus of showing grounds for transferring whole district registers to Edinburgh after they have had an independent existence for 250 years, and dispensing with the services of all the present keepers, compensating them out of public funds, must lie on the Lord Advocate who proposes the change. In one thing he agreed with the Lord Advocate—when he proposes to get rid of one of the two registers. The bother, annoyance, and expense in our system had arisen from the General Registry. That being the chief evil, what was the remedy? What was wanted is a remedy co-extensive with the evil. Confessedly the weak point in the system is the necessity of double search produced by the existence of the General Register, creating great expense and difficulties by its scheme of merging together deeds from all parts of the kingdom, without order in the way of abridging, indexing, or searching. Now, both Bills concurred in this, that they abolished the General Register. The learned Lord kept it up in name, but in substance he admitted the unsoundness of its principles. The Lord Advocate so far went with him (Mr. Dunlop), and he said to-night that he will abolish the General Register; but he proposed that there should be a register for each county. That was exactly what he (Mr. Dunlop) wanted. But he proposed another change, which was to bring all these county registers to Edinburgh, and he (Mr. Dunlop) wanted to know what necessity there was to break up the meeting, as he wished to go off by the next train. At Ayr the same course was pursued. He thought that the Commissioners ought not only to have given us their Report, but the evidence on which it was founded. We are entitled to that evidence in order that we may judge how far their conclusions are correct, and he said that until we have the evidence we are not in a condition to state whether we can agree with the recommendations of the Report. They were now asked to remove the registries to Edinburgh on account of the great advantage of having all the registries in one place. If that was good for the counties it is good for the burghs. Having said that—so far as the counties are concerned—that was the proper principle to adopt, he might turn round and say, as to the burghs, it ought to be left to the burghs. It was of the greatest importance that the registry should be in the locality, and they proposed to continue a system that would be a double register. The advantage of the proposition of the hon. Member for Greenock was that he took in the whole country; he had one registry for the whole. It was said that there was a surplus of the fees. Then he (Mr. Craufurd) said it was a monstrous thing that for twenty years past the landed proprietors should have to pay not only for their deeds, but a surplus to the Exchequer. It was said that the work could be done much cheaper and better in Edinburgh than elsewhere. Now, here was the contested point. They had this fact, that in the counties which had local registers, the books were more closely made up than they were in the office at Edinburgh. Under these circumstances, how can they be expected to support the Bill which had been introduced to their notice by the Lord Advocate, particularly when they found that the work was not so well done in Edinburgh as in other places. On a review of the whole case, and in the belief that the system proposed by the hon. Member for Greenock was likely to be most conducive to the interests of the country, and the most likely to be economical, he should give his support to his Bill rather than to that of the Lord Advocate. Taking the difference between the two to be central and local, and objecting to the central, he begged to move, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON seconded the Amendment.

Mr. Craufurd

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Edward Craufurd.)

CAPTAIN CARNEGIE moved the adjournment of the debate.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he thought this was rather an early hour at which to propose an adjournment; but, at the same time, provided his hon. Friend would assist him in endeavouring to come to some arrangement with respect to the discussion, he would not object to the adjournment. The Bill could be put down as the First Order of the Day after the Motion for the Committee of Supply tomorrow.

CONSTABULARY FORCE (IRELAND) ACT AMENDMENT BILL—[Bill 122.]

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to alter the distribution of the Constabulary Force in Ireland, and to make better provision for the Police Force in the borough of Belfast, said, that Belfast was the only borough in Ireland in which there was a special Act regulating the organization of the police force. As far back as the year 1858, the noble Lord opposite (Lord Naas) then Secretary for Ireland, in consequence of riots which occurred in the previous year, brought in a Bill tending very much in the direction of the measure which he was now asking leave to introduce. The riots which occurred at Belfast last year, and which had led to the proposal of this Bill were, as the House well knew, of a most serious character. Not only were 146 persons arrested, but 316 were seriously injured and thirteen were killed; the pecuniary loss occasioned by the stoppage of mills and other causes amounted to £50,000; and in order to put an end to the strife it was necessary during the three worst days, August 15, 16, and 17, to introduce into the town, in addition to the local police, a constabulary force of 978 men, twelve officers and 252 cavalry, fifty-seven officers and 1,045 infantry, and three officers and thirty-six men of the artillery, with two guns. In fact, there was almost a small army quartered in the town. The concurrent testimony of all the witnesses who were examined by the Commissioners who inquired into those riots was that it was desirable to introduce changes into the police establishment of the borough; and he hoped by the passing of this measure to prevent the recurrence of such disturbances. The community of Belfast was, however, a very difficult one to deal with. It consisted of about 130,000 persons, two-thirds of whom were Protestants and the other third Roman Catholics, between whom feelings of strife and animosity had long existed. The police force at present in Belfast amounted to 181 persons. It was most unpopular, particularly among the Roman Catholic population of the town, of whom there were in it only five. The Commissioners, in their Report of 1857, especially referred to that circumstance, and showed that the existing state of things was most unsatisfactory. He would not, however, on that occasion, enter into the observations made by the Commissioners as to the inefficiency of the force, but would content himself with simply remarking that according to the testimony of more than a hundred witnesses it was absolutely necessary that some alteration in it should be made. What, under those circumstances, he proposed to do was to abolish the present force altogether, and to introduce the constabulary into Belfast upon the same footing as in Cork and other towns throughout Ireland. He proposed to give Belfast, free of all expense, 130 men, the charge for whom should be paid out of the Consolidated Fund. But in addition to that force there would be 320 men more, half the cost of whom would be paid out of the Consolidated Fund and half out of the local funds. There would thus be altogether a force of 350 men; besides which, it was proposed that there should be two stipendiary magistrates instead of one—one of those magistrates to be a Roman Catholic, and the other a Protestant. The saving to the borough which the Bill would effect would be very considerable. The cost of the present local force amounted to £7,481, and the saving on that amount would be no less than £1,391. With respect to night watching he might observe that the proposal was, that as in Dundalk the constabulary should take that duty upon themselves, and that the men so employed should be paid something like 6d. per head per night out of the borough funds. As to the superintendence of the new force he had simply to say that it was intended there should be two sub-inspectors entirely at the cost of the Government, and one superior officer, who would be a magistrate, but who would not usually act in that capacity, and whose salary would be £400 a year. Such were the main features of the Bill, which he hoped to be able to proceed with as speedily as possible, and which he hoped would be found of some service in preventing those disturbances which had occasioned so much pain to persons of all parties, and which he hoped would never again occur to mar the peace and prosperity of the inhabitants of one of the most flourishing towns in the kingdom.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, there was no objection to the principle of the Bill, though its details would require alteration. He could not, he might add, concur in the opinion that the present police force in Belfast was inefficient, taking its numbers into account. He feared that the saving to the town under the Bill would not be what the right hon. Baronet anticipated, and he doubted the expediency, when the desirability of getting rid of religious distinctions was so generally talked about, of laying down a rigid rule that there must be one Protestant and one Catholic stipendiary magistrate.

Bill to alter the distribution of the Constabulary Force in Ireland, and to make better provision for the Police Force in the Borough of Belfast, ordered to be brought in by Sir ROBERT PEEL and Sir GEORGE GREY.

COURTS OF JUSTICE BUILDING BILL.
(No. 23.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, In rising to move the second reading of this Bill I cannot help expressing my conviction that your Lordships have rarely been asked to give your assent to a measure of legal reform of greater importance. Nothing is more striking than the disregard which this country has so long manifested for the manner in which its Courts of Justice are constructed, and accommodation afforded for the proper administration of justice. If the character of the country were to be determined by the external appearance and condition of these Courts, undoubtedly the conclusion would be that there was very little regard and very little anxiety as to the mode in which justice was administered among us; for if the construction and locality of our Law Courts and Offices had been wantonly designed on purpose to impede and render difficult the administration of justice, it is impossible to imagine a state of things more calculated to promote that view. Undoubtedly, every kind of facility should be given for the administration of justice; but if you require the Judges, the practitioners of the law, the juries, and the parties resorting to Courts of Justice to come into places which are not one-tenth equal to their accommodation, and in which the atmosphere is so vitiated that the body becomes enfeebled, and the mind of necessity partakes of the enfeeblement, it is utterly impossible in that state of things that justice can be properly administered. You now require a number of Courts for the purposes of law, and a further number of Courts for equity. The Courts of Law are located in the immediate neighbourhood of Westminster Hall; but they consist of buildings wretchedly insufficient for the purpose. Whenever the Court of Queen's Bench requires to have a Judge sitting at Nisi Prius, there is no better accommodation than that which is afforded by a small and insignificant room, which is called the Bail Court, but which was very correctly described by a certain Member of the House of Commons, who unfortunately practises in that Court, as nothing better than "a dog-hole." The other Courts of Nisi Prius are equally inconvenient and equally difficult of access to suitors or practitioners. As to the Courts of Equity, those constructed for the puissans Vice Chancellors are places in which it is utterly impossible for either Judges or practitioners to remain for any considerable period of time without being affected by the impure atmosphere, and finding their ability to give full attention to the causes very greatly impaired. The other Courts, which are sometimes referred to as more wholesome than those I have mentioned, may be tolerably convenient as Courts, but they are utterly devoid of the requisite accommodation. The Lord Chancellor has only one room, which he is obliged to share with his three secretaries, and the other Courts are equally deficient in the proper accommodation. It is not, however, merely the material construction of these Courts that is so objectionable, it is their locality also which so much interferes with the requirements for the proper administration of justice. The Courts of Law are at Westminster; but the chambers of the Judges are in Serjeants' Inn, at the bottom of Chancery Lane; and it constantly happens that the Judge sits half the day in Court in Westminster Hall and is obliged to rise much earlier than would otherwise be necessary in order to go to chambers. In like manner, the offices of the Courts of Law are scattered about in different localities; and the same thing is true of the offices connected with the Courts of Equity—they are equally scattered and equally inconvenient of access; and altogether it is impossible that business can be conducted without great peril of breaking appointments and great danger of counsel not being present when they are wanted—involving also great loss of time and consequent increase of expense to the suitors. This subject is thoroughly well known, and I think there is not likely to be any difference of opinion among your Lordships on this point—it must be self evident to every one who has considered the subject, that if all the Courts of Justice could be brought together under one roof, if the necessary offices and chambers were provided for the Judges and the clerks, consultation rooms and libraries for barristers, and waiting rooms for witnesses and jurors, the administration of justice would be greatly benefited, great delay would be avoided, and great economy and convenience would be afforded to suitors and all other persons. The object of the Bill now before your Lordships is to accomplish that most desirable object—an object which, as is usual in this country, has been admitted to be desirable and right for a long period of time—extending, I believe, in this case, over forty years. The subject was first agitated, I think, in the year 1822, but nothing effectual has been proposed until now. For the greater portion of that interval the particular locality which this Bill points out has been fixed upon as the most convenient site for the proposed concentration. It is not, however, until now that any sincere and earnest effort has been made by the Legislature towards effecting this desirable improvement, and towards performing that which is one of its primary duties—namely, the erection of Courts of Justice corresponding to and commensurate with its dignity, and proper for the discharge of the duties of the Judges and the functions of those concerned in the administration of justice. The same reasons which lead the mind to the necessity of concentrating the Courts also point to the locality in which they should be concentrated. The site now proposed is not only in the centre of the metropolis, but constitutes what I may call the umbilicus of the legal locality. It extends over about 7½ acres, bounded on the East by Bell Yard, which runs parallel to Chancery Lane, on the North by Carey Street, on the West by Clement's Lane, and on the South by the Strand. The whole of this locality is covered with houses of the meanest and the most wretched description. The place, in short, seems as if it had been left on purpose to answer the use for which it is now proposed to be employed; and while you are converting the site to this great public purpose and are conferring this great public benefit you are incidentally rendering another benefit, not equal in amount, but still of great value, by weeding out of the centre of London a nest of fever and a receptacle of all sorts of abominations. This locality is one, above all others, which is most accessible to lawyers, with the least amount of interruption to their business, their offices being all connected with it, and therefore with the greatest amount of benefit to their clients in consequence of the saving of time and expense. All these things require hardly more than to be stated for the mind to see at once that which is the great end of the measure and the ground which justifies it—namely, the advantage in respect of the administration of justice. Now, having said thus much with regard to the locality and the concentration of the Courts, I will proceed to the provisions of the Bill. My Lords, this Bill, directed as it is to the attainment of a great public object, professes to accomplish that object without taking one shilling of the public money. The financial part of the measure requires some explanation, and I beg your Lordships' attention while I carry the House through some details, in order that you may be the better able to understand this portion of the scheme. The sources from which the money required for the acquisition of the land and the building of the Courts of Justice are intended to be derived are three. First of all, there is a sum of £200,000, which is to be advanced by the Government as the price of the buildings and ground, the site of the present Courts of Law, which the Government will have received and will have at their disposal when these Courts have been erected. Now, my Lords, I take it—and a very slight examination of the subject would bring any one of information to the same conclusion—that the property which the Government will receive in return for this £200,000 greatly exceeds that sum in point of value. First of all, the whole of the site to the West of Westminster Hall now occupied by the Courts of Justice will be entirely released and given up to the Government. I think it was in the year 1850 that the late Sir Charles Barry valued that piece of land, if it were sold for building purposes, at upwards of £86,000; and there are a large number of buildings in other places which are now used for purposes connected with the Courts of Justice which I have no doubt will become available for a sum of money considerably exceeding the rest of the £200,000. The next source of the money to be expended is afforded by the Suitors' Fund in the Court of Chancery; and here, my Lords, I must beg your Lordships' attention for a few moments to some details which are requisite to understand the nature of that fund, and the manner in which it admits of being appropriated to this purpose. Your Lordships are all aware that the Court of Chancery may be described not only as a Court of Justice, but in reality as a great bank, in which considerable sums belonging to the suitors are deposited. These sums are not required on many occasions to be invested and they therefore accumulate in the hands of the Accountant General until they arrive at a very considerable amount. My Lords, in ancient times, and as lately as the year 1725, these unemployed balances were permitted to be applied by the Masters to their own personal benefit. The same practice, your Lordships are aware, formerly existed in the case of the Paymaster of the Forces, who was allowed to retain large balances, and the profits of the office arose in a great measure from the interest derived from that money. But in the year 1725 it was found that some of the Masters in the Court of Chancery were defaulters with regard to this money, and shortly afterwards, for the purpose of reimbursing the moneys which had been improperly applied, provision was made by means of a tax which was laid upon all suitors in the Courts, including the suitors in the Common Law Courts. Subsequently, about the 20th year of George II., the propriety of making use of some of those balances occurred to the Legislature; and accordingly an Act of Parliament was passed by which the Accountant General, acting under the authority of the Lord Chancellor, was empowered to invest in the public funds such sums as were not required for the ordinary purposes of the Courts. These investments grew to a large amount, and from them a considerable income was derived. The Court of Chancery, therefore, did, with regard to the moneys it received from the suitors, precisely what an ordinary banker does with respect to the money of his customers. He receives the money of those customers, retains the amount which may be necessary for the purposes of the bank, and invests the difference, the profit resulting from that investment being the banker's property. In like manner, the income resulting from these Chancery investments has been dealt with by Parliament again and again as money which belonged to the public, and which the public had a right to employ in any manner it pleased, and to regard as standing in the same relation to itself as the profits of the banker stand to him. The profits, therefore, resulting from these investments have been applied under the authority of Parliament to a great variety of purposes. Sometimes parts have been applied to buildings belonging to the Court of Chancery, at other times in part payment of the salaries of officials, and at other times to other purposes connected with the law—

all these applications evincing this great principle—that Parliament regarded it as a public fund, to be devoted from time to time to such objects as might be deemed necessary for the public welfare. The funds representing the investment of the suitors' money from time to time amount now to a sum of £2,931,047. That is not the fund with which this Bill proposes to deal in any manner whatever—it belongs to the suitors whose money has produced this amount. But, my Lords, the profit, which I will denominate the banker's profit fund, has grown out of the dividends resulting from these investments, and belongs to no one but the State, at whose risk the investments have been made. If the stock produced by this money was not sufficient for the repayment of the suitors to the full amount, the State would be bound to make good the difference. Now, there is very little apprehension that the money which upon an average has been invested taking Consols at 87, will not be forthcoming when required. Unless there should be a general failure in the institutions of the country, it would be utterly impossible that there should be any deficiency in the amount of those investments. Now what I have called "the banker's profit fund"—that is to say the amount of stock which has resulted from the reinvestment of the dividends on the original investments—amounts to £1,291,629. That is the sum which I have described as public money, which has been repeatedly dealt with by the State as such, and belongs to no individual whatever. The object of the Bill is to take out of the fund £1,000,000 of stock, which at 90 will raise £900,000. The sum which it is desirable to raise is £1,500,000, and this is divisible into two parts. The first moiety of £750,000 is to be applied as purchase-money of the buildings and lands upon which the Courts of Justice and offices are proposed to be erected. There is every reason to believe that this estimate is beyond the amount that will be required. This particular site was valued originally in 1849 by Sir Charles Barry and a surveyor of great local information at £670,000. It was afterwards valued by another surveyor at £678,000; and finally, for the purposes of the Commission issued by my noble Friend below me, it was re-valued, and the Commissioners saw no reason to distrust the accuracy of the former valuations. The property was subsequently valued by Mr. Hunt, a surveyor employed by the Government, and also by Mr. Pen-nethorne, Architect of the Board of Works, and they put the extreme value at £700,000, so that in allowing £750,000 there is little reason to suppose that sum will be exceeded. There is a margin of £50,000; and if the management of this building is conducted with care and prudence, and if its construction should have the competent and fitting superintendence which it is the object of this Bill to secure, and which it is the desire of the Government it should receive, there is no reason to expect any great excess of expenditure above the estimate. That leaves £400,000 still to be raised, in order to make up the sum of £1,500,000, and this sum of £400,000 it is proposed to supply by a small tax on suitors in the Courts of Law, and on those who prove wills and take out letters of administration in the Probate Court. A very trifling sum of 1s. 6d. payable on every writ issued in an action, and of 2s. 6d. on every grant of probate or administration, will be quite sufficient to produce more than the sum of £16,000 a year. The sum of £400,000 will be advanced by the Government, charging the Courts of Justice  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, and then the sum of £16,000 a year having been raised for fifty years, the principal and interest of the capital sum will be redeemed. The amount of additional charge is so small that it will not be felt by the suitors of the Courts of Law, and, therefore, this great public work will not cost the public a shilling. It will be accomplished by the appropriation of money that it is perfectly right and just to take, and which in its appropriation will render the suitors a greater amount of advantage than they could obtain in any other way. I must trespass for a few moments on your Lordships' patience while I advert to the grounds on which my noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards) will probably rest his opposition to this measure. In 1834 a great change was made by an Act of Parliament in substituting fixed salaries for the fees that had been previously received by the officers of the Courts of Justice. All the fees were then directed to be carried to the Fee Fund, out of which the fixed salaries were paid. My noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards) brought in a very useful Act of Parliament in 1852, by which the whole of the income arising from the fund I have described, including the income from the sum of

£1,290,000, was to be carried to the account of the Suitors' Fee Fund, and to be from time to time applied under the direction of the Lord Chancellor in the reduction of the court fees. It is natural that my noble and learned Friend should continue to be attached to his own measure, and he has come to the conclusion that the best application of the sum of £1,291,629, or any part of it, would be in making a further reduction in the fees of court instead of applying it to the erection of the concentrated Courts of Law with all the necessary conveniences. But the fees of court payable by suitors form only an insignificant proportion—not more than 8 per cent—of the whole amount of costs—in a bill of costs, that is to say, of £100, the fees of court will amount to £8 only. If every portion of the income derived from the money now proposed to be taken were applied to the reduction of the fees of court it would not reduce them more than from 8 to 4 per cent; that is to say, out of every £100 paid by the suitor he would have to pay, as fees of court, £4 instead of £8. Now, in what way will the suitor get greater benefit by this Bill than by reducing the fees of court? Why, he will get it by expedition, by a diminution of delay, by the saving of time as well as by the economy of expenditure which will be the consequence of this concentration of the Courts of Law. The best witnesses on this point are the solicitors, and they state to a man that the benefit which the suitors will derive from this measure will be infinitely beyond that which they would derive from the diminution of court fees. On this point there is no conflict of testimony. My noble and learned Friend stands in a situation which does not dismay him, but he stands alone, for he can bring forward the testimony of no single witness to support his view. No man of weight in his profession would support my noble and learned Friend in the opinion to which he naturally clings, or assert that the benefit of reducing the court fees would be greater than that conferred by this measure. All this is manifested in a remarkable way not only by the testimony collected from other sources, but by the testimony obtained by the Commission issued by the late Government in 1852. A large number of solicitors of the greatest respectability and experience, and whose opinion is entitled to the greatest weight, were examined, and all concurred in thinking that this measure, if passed, will be a measure not for a single moment to be contrasted, in regard to the benefit of the suitor, with the benefits resulting from the reduction of the fees of court. The accomplishment of this object has been much facilitated by the device which has been hit upon of separating those portions of the fund that were regarded as applicable to the building of these courts from the portions charged with the payment of compensation. Some years ago compensations were granted in considerable numbers to officers of the Court of Chancery, on occasion of certain alterations made in that court, and were charged upon the income derived partly from the Suitors' Fund and partly from the Fee Fund. Out of the Fee Fund there has arisen another fund, consisting of the investment of the surplus, and now amounting to £201,208. The amount of existing compensations has been accurately ascertained, and we find that on the 1st of January of the present year these amounted to £49,369 per annum; and the experience of the last nine years shows that these compensations fall in at the rate of about £3,500 yearly. From calculations made by actuaries we find that the whole of these annuities might be redeemed or capitalized for the sum of £437,900. Your Lordships will remember that the residue of the bankers' profit fund, after deducting the £1,000,000, will amount to nearly £300,000; and, adding to this the £201,000, the surplus of the Fee Fund, a sum will be obtained which will be equal, and more than equal, to redeem the whole of these annuities. Whether, therefore, we buy Government annuities of equal amount, or whether the Government becomes its own insurer and takes its chance of the annuities running out, as it is expected they will do in eighteen years, the calculation is that the funds I have mentioned will leave a surplus of £150,000. If they are capitalized, then the surplus income that will be derived from the surplus funds that I have mentioned, after raising £433,000 will yield a clear income of between £4,000 and £5,000 a year. In every point of view, therefore, the financial scheme seems open to no possible objection—to no danger of miscarriage. There can be no purpose more akin to the origin of the fund itself, more just, or more germane to the character of the moneys that we purpose shall be thus allocated, than the raising of a large Temple or Palace of Justice

commensurate with the dignity of the country, in which conveniences shall exist conducing greatly to the useful administration of justice. And I cannot conceal from your Lordships, that I am sanguine enough to believe that in accomplishing this great object there will probably be another benefit, infinitely greater than any which I have stated. You are all aware that in this country, from an unfortunate circumstance connected with its early history, it became necessary to establish different legal institutions, in the shape of Courts of Equity, from those which previously existed; and hence it was that a large portion of national justice that ought to have fallen under the administration of the Courts of Law became separated, and relegated altogether to the jurisdiction of Equity. Unfortunately, therefore, you have this great anomaly, that many of the most important relations of life will not be recognized by Courts of Law. The ordinary relations of trustee and beneficiary, those subsisting between partners, and again between executors and legatees, are either ignored altogether by the Courts of Law, or else they provide no adequate remedy in cases where these several relations are involved. The result is that you have two great departments of justice, one proceeding on principles sometimes antagonistic to those of the other—one of them recognizing certain things as just and right of which the other knows, and for which it cares nothing. This is a great evil in the administration of justice, and it is very desirable that there should be a simple and uniform mode of procedure adopted by all the Courts. Unluckily this division has been to a great extent perpetuated by the manner in which the Courts of Equity have been separated in point of locality from the Courts of Law. But if they were brought together—if there were a free communication of ideas and opinions between the practitioners in one set of Courts and the practitioners in the other, and if the habits and modes of procedure of both were rendered familiar and matters of daily contemplation to the profession, this great division, which it has been the desire of modern legislation to break down, would soon disappear, and we should be enabled to say that our Courts of Justice recognized the same principles and the same method of procedure, and that the same questions would be treated in all the Courts with one uniform set of principles and maxims of justice. I expect, undoubtedly, that this will be the remote consequence of the measure that I desire now to propose. Its immediate consequences are those which I have endeavoured imperfectly to describe, but which are abundantly manifested by the eager desire of all persons interested in the administration of justice not to allow this Parliament to pass away without the accomplishment of this one public object. It has been opposed at various times; but I am glad to say that within the last few weeks that opposition has almost entirely disappeared; so much so that I am happy to state to your Lordships that even the Society of Lincoln's Inn, who were its great opponents, have joined in presenting a petition to the House of Commons, earnestly praying that the measure may pass; and I have reason to believe that this view will also be embodied in a petition to be presented to your Lordships. There are many other subjects connected with this matter that I should be glad to refer to had I any reason to believe that any serious opposition is intended to the Bill; but I do trust my hon. and learned Friends will join with all those whose names we have heard to-day in support of this measure; because I am convinced that of all the proposals I have seen since I have had the honour of belonging to the profession this undoubtedly is one of the most desirable, full of the greatest promise, calculated to effect the greatest amount of benefit, and with regard to which no sincere and true Reformer would, I think, desire to see his name recorded in opposition.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, he had taken former opportunities of stating that he had no objection whatever to the concentration of the Law Courts. Once the site was fixed upon, and the proper funds found for the accomplishment of the object, the proposal itself would receive no opposition at his hands. His noble and learned Friend, indeed, in his zeal for the measure, had, he thought, over-estimated some of the inconveniences and dangers connected with the existing system. Until he heard his noble and learned Friend enumerate them—the want of accommodation, the unwholesome atmosphere, and other inconveniences connected with our courts—he had but a very faint conception of the miseries among which so many years of his life had been passed. His noble and learned Friend had not attained the same age as himself, but yet he was not a bad specimen of how a man might face the terrible atmosphere in which, according to his own account, he had so long been doomed to live. His noble and learned Friend had also favoured them with a dissertation on a subject which he had not expected to find introduced on that occasion—the fusion, or as he (Lord St. Leonards) should call it, the confusion—of law and equity, and seemed to think that both departments of the law would soon be conducted on the same principles if the courts could only be brought to meet in the same locality. When, however, the Court of King's Bench and the Court of the Lord Chancellor occupied a position in Westminster Hall in the closest contiguity to one another, not the slightest advance was made towards the amalgamation of the two distinct legal systems which they administered, and no human being ever thought of such an amalgamation. He therefore believed that his noble and learned Friend must take a different course if he desired to bring about that object. Lord Campbell, when he held the Great Seal, he might add, had introduced a Bill to effect that object, but the Select Committee to which it was referred came to the unanimous decision that all the clauses relating to the fusion of law and equity should be struck out; while the Lord Chancellor, who presided over the deliberations of the Committee, had never attempted to disturb that decision, although he had announced it to be his intention to take the sense of the House with respect to it. But be that as it might, the fact was that the Bill under discussion would not result in the concentration of all the courts on one spot. The Central Criminal Court, the Bankruptcy Court, and the various Nisi Prius Courts would not, for instance, be included in the scheme. It was, indeed, proposed that it should embrace the Divorce and Lunacy Courts; but he very much doubted whether it would tend to the public advantage that the former court should be made more easy of access to the number of young men having very little to do, who were in the habit of lounging from one court to another. For his own part, he thought it would be productive of very great advantage if the cases which came before the Divorce Court could as far as possible be heard in private; while nothing, he thought, could be more painful than that the friends and relations of those unhappy persons whose cases came before the Lunacy Commissioners should be obliged to attend in a court situated in the midst of several others, and therefore more liable to be the centre of a large crowd. Such a tribunal ought, in his opinion, to be as quiet as it could be made, and ought to be excluded from such an atmosphere as that by which it would be surrounded if removed to the new site. It must, moreover, be borne in mind, in dealing with the question, that their Lordships' House would not be prepared to abandon its jurisdiction, that the Privy Council would not part with theirs, and that those great tribunals, therefore, would find no place in the proposed plan. The Charity Commissioners and the Inclosure Commissioners were still to be left in expensive residencies in St. James's Square, and the Land Transfer Court in Lincoln's Inn Fields. But the truth was that there was no intelligible plan whatsoever, and that being so, he for one was entirely opposed, at all events, to the removal of the Courts of Equity. He said nothing of the removal of the Courts of Law, except that he thought that the funds which it was proposed to take ought not to be appropriated to such a purpose. As regarded the Courts of Equity, they were six — namely, the Lord Chancellor's, the Lords Justices, the Master of the Rolls, the Court of the senior Vice Chancellor, and the two courts of the junior Vice Chancellors. Now having himself presided in one of them, he could bear testimony to the fact that it was well ventilated and convenient. The Master of the Rolls, he might add, had stated in his evidence that there was not the slightest objection to the court in which he sat, while it had the advantage of being close to the Record Office, over which he was trustee, and in the immediate vicinity of which it was desirable he should be located. The Rolls Court, nevertheless, it was proposed to remove, for no other reason that he could see than the love of change, advantage being taken of the fact that two of the Vice Chancellors' Courts were not all that could be desired in order to get up an agitation on the subject. Those courts, however, might very easily be improved, and they would have been before now—for the Society of Lincoln's Inn were prepared to remedy the deficiency—but for the scheme under discussion, which had been a long time in contemplation. But let him suppose the

Lord St. Leonards

Courts of Common Law only were concentrated on the proposed site, was it not evident that they would be in as close proximity to the Equity Courts as could be wished? It was only a few steps across from the present Equity Courts to the site of the Courts yet to be erected. He said, therefore, that it was not necessary to remove the Courts of Equity to the proposed site, and that they were to be taken there only as an excuse to enable the Government to help itself to the funds which belonged to the suitors, and which ought not to be touched for such a purpose. His noble and learned Friend had told their Lordships that the Carey Street site would embrace about seven acres and a half of ground; but he had not told them that there were now upon that space about 400 dwelling-houses, warehouses, and buildings; that the dwellinghouses were inhabited by more than 4,000 persons, and that of these upwards of 3,000 and some hundreds belonged to the labouring classes. He had, indeed, truly told them that many of the occupants of these houses were of filthy habits, and that fever was always to be found upon this spot. What, then, were they going to do? Where were they going to remove this misery? Whither where they going to carry the fever? Wherever they moved these people they would be moving fever patients. The question had been put in every possible form, and no man had been able to indicate a single locality in which they would be received. Would they remove them in a state of fever? They would never find them free from it, and what was to become of them? There had been no greater misfortune in this city than these displacements of vast masses of human beings, who were left to find a settlement for themselves. The consequence of such measures was that they were driven into districts already overburdened with population, and thus the evils of overcrowding became greater every day. Would there be less fever or more cleanly habits in the places to which the people who were to be displaced under this Bill would be driven than now existed among them? They could not sleep under the canopy of Heaven—they must have some dwellings—where were they to be found? There was no attempt made in this great Government measure to find a single habitation for any one person whom it would drive out of his house. Where was the care which the Government ought to take of the people whom it was about to disturb? Where was the regard to the health and happiness of the humble classes for whom so much sympathy was expressed? The Government were about, unnecessarily, to disturb the Courts in Lincoln's Inn, in order to clear a site which was covered by houses occupied by a population whom they were driving out of house and home, and who had no place to flee to. And they might avoid much of this mischief by leaving the Courts of Equity in Lincoln's Inn, where they had been for a century and a half, and which were well suited for the purposes to which they had been dedicated. Where was the money to come from? It was a wise thing to take care before you began to build a house that you had money to pay for it; but he could nowhere find any reliable evidence as to what would be the cost of this building. The evidence which had been given upon that subject was perfectly farcical. It was singular that the Government did not at first think it necessary to provide for accesses to this mass of congregated Courts. The words "including approaches" were added to the Bill in the House of Commons, and since then accesses had been talked about, but without describing what they were to be. What were the accesses which the Government intended to provide? Some years ago he was a Member of a Committee of the House of Commons which sat upon a Bill, the object of which was the concentration of the Courts in Lincoln's Inn Fields; and the late Sir Charles Barry, then Mr. Barry, admitted, in answer to questions which he put to him, that it would be necessary in order to provide approaches to open out the two Turnstiles and clear away Clare Market, and he could not deny that these openings might not cost a million of money, but, alarmed at the admission, he on the following day produced an elaborate plan, according to which the cost of these alterations was to be provided for by the erection of buildings upon the land which would not be required for the accesses. What was necessary to be done then would be necessary now. The two Turnstiles must be pulled down—Lincoln's Inn would object to any interference with one of them—Clare Market must be got rid of, and all these streets must be widened at the expense of the suitors in the Court of Chancery. Could anything be worse than the street which now ran from Covent Garden to Lincoln's Inn Fields? It was a dirty wretched lane, in which two carriages could not pass, and if these Courts were to be erected upon the site proposed it must be widened and improved. Not one tittle of evidence had been laid before the House to prove that any of the proposed plans could be carried out for the sum mentioned by his noble and learned Friend. He now came to the most important part of the question—namely, the right they had to take the Suitor's Fund, and to apply it to building Common Law as well as Equity Courts. On this point the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack had followed the example of the Commissioners, and had professed to regard the Fund as belonging to the public, and liable to be dealt with accordingly. If it were true that the Fund was public property, how was it that successive Governments had not helped themselves to the million sterling, which would often have been very acceptable? How was it that no Chancellor of the Exchequer had been tempted to seize upon it? The reason was that they had not dared to touch it—they had not dared to touch it because the foundation of this country's prosperity was its integrity and its honesty of purpose. If this measure were carried, they would break in upon the rights of property to a greater extent than had ever been attempted during the course of the last century, and they would find it a most unexampled and a most dangerous proceeding. If the argument of the noble and learned Lord were well founded, why should they not also seize upon the two millions in the hands of the Charity Commissioners? Why should not those two millions be taken and the interest upon them paid by the public? Why not seize the money, enter the transaction in a "Great Book," and leave the rightful owners to the mercy of future Governments? He regarded such transactions as putting an unholy hand upon the property of others, and as contrary to the constitution of the country, and setting an example akin to that of France in its most violent revolutionary periods. The recital of the Bill said the Fund was standing to an account for the benefit and the better security of the suitors in the Court of Chancery, and that it had been accumulated from the profits of investment at the risk of the Government. Well, a pickpocket certainly ran some risk in helping himself to other people's property, but it had never been suggested before that the risk he ran gave him the right of ownership in the property he stole. The noble and learned Lord had drawn an analogy between the case now under discussion and that of a banker and his customer. But no such analogy existed. The only customers were the suitors whose property was dealt with. If it suited a person's purpose to deposit money with a banker, the parties immediately stood in the relation of creditor and debtor—there was nothing of the nature of a trust in the transaction, and the banker took the money on the clear understanding that he was to use it for his own benefit. He would ask their Lordships also to observe how the present proposition infringed upon the general principles of equity. If a man placed money in the hands of a trustee without any authority to invest it, but the trustee did, notwithstanding, invest it—in the Three per Cents, for instance—he would be compelled to transfer the stock to the owner of the money, and also to pay the costs of suit. Such a trustee would not be entitled to any profit of such investment, whilst he would be liable for all loss. In like manner the Court of Chancery had no right to a single shilling of profit out of the funds now in question, which it held in trust for the benefit of the suitors. Nor, had the public any right to them, for every shilling belonged to the suitors in the Court of Chancery. It is said that no individual suitor has a right to any portion of the Fund; but the suitors, as a class, are entitled to it. He held in his hand a statement of all the Acts of Parliament relating to these Funds, and they all showed that every investment of these moneys had always been carried to the credit of an account for the ease, or the benefit, and security of the suitors in the Court of Chancery. He believed that if these funds were now taken possession of for other purposes the time would come when the precedent thus set would be lamented. By the Act of 1852 the Lord Chancellor was authorized from time to time to vary, reduce, and abolish any fees, and to substitute others in place of them; and the salaries of such of the Equity Judges as were payable by Act of Parliament out of the Suitors' Fund were charged on the Consolidated Fund, instead of being paid out of the money of the suitors. What could be more absurd than the course now proposed, when in 1852 the Suitors' Fund was relieved from a charge of £9,000 a year, to which it was actually liable, because it was said that a public liability should not be placed upon this fund, but ought to be entirely borne by the State. After that proceeding it was ridiculous for the Government now to treat the fund as a public fund and to help themselves to a million of pounds out of it. He disapproved altogether the proposal to take the Suitors' Fee Fund for building these Courts. The Bills before the House indirectly, but actually, repealed existing Acts of Parliament with regard to this Fund; and by law and by every consideration of equity and right the Fund stood pledged to the suitors for the reduction of the fees with which they were chargeable.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, this was a subject on which it was well known that his noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards) entertained a strong and, as he hoped the House would think, an extreme opinion. He would not attempt to offer any reply to the arguments of the noble and learned Lord, except in connection with another part of the subject, to which he wished for a few moments to direct attention. He thought that his noble and learned Friend had failed to draw a proper distinction between two wholly separate parts of the subject—between objections taken to the system under which this Fund had arisen, and objections to taking possession of the Fund now it existed and was at the disposal of Parliament. As to the question whether this Fund was or was not at the disposal of Parliament it was necessary to inquire how it had arisen—now it had arisen in this way. It had been the custom of the Court of Chancery for a century and a half to place before its suitors this option, "If you bring money into court, you may either order its investment by us, in which case you do so at the risk of your capital; or, if you decline that risk, you may leave the capital in our hands, and we will then pay no interest whatever, but will fund the capital on behalf of the Court." Under these circumstances, three separate funds arose, and it was unfortunate that the expression, "The Suitors' Fee Fund," had been technically applied to that very one of the three which in no respect belonged to suitors and never could belong to them. The Suitors' Fund properly so called included money which the suitors wished to have invested by the Court, and of which not only the capital but the interest belonged to the suitors. The second was money the investment of which they did not direct, and of which the capital belonged to the suitors, the interest being appropriated by the Court. Lastly, there was the accumulated interest which had arisen from this capital, and which the parties knew all along would be appropriated by the Court of Chancery or by Parliament. For 120 years the suitors had notice that what was called the Suitors' Fund would not be considered theirs at all except as a guarantee fund against any loss of their own capital; and for this a new Parliamentary guarantee was now proposed. His noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards) had not pretended to argue that the money of that Fund belonged to any individual suitor, but maintained that it was the property of the suitors as a class. But how could suitors in the Court of Chancery be defined as a class? Part of the money had been derived from Tom Jones in 1765, and the noble and learned Lord argued that it belonged to John Robinson in 1865. Why, that fund for 120 years had, by authority of Parliament, been applied to the payment of the officers of the Court of Chancery, to the building of courts, and was at that moment charged with some £12,000 a year for the administration of the estates of lunatics—a charge which undoubtedly ought to come out of the estates of the lunatics subject to the Lunacy Commission. In every sense, therefore, it was a fund disposable by Parliament. And now he came to the question whether that money ought ever to have been taken from the suitors under the system which had prevailed since the early part of the last century. Upon that subject he sympathized largely in the feeling which his noble and learned Friend had expressed that night, and also in a speech upon a former occasion. In 1861, under the Chancellorship of the late Lord Campbell, a Commission for the purpose of inquiring into that question was appointed; he (the Duke of Argyll) happened to be Chairman, and, with the exception of one Member, they came to the conclusion that it was not a just system towards the suitors that those who did not choose to invest their money should lose the whole of the interest upon it, and that the whole of that interest should be devoted to the purposes of the Court of Chancery. It was the opinion of the members of the Commission that the Court of Chancery ought not to pay its expenses out of fees which were levied on the suitors, and that if it was the object of Parliament that the Court of Chancery should support itself to a great extent by fees levied upon suitors, it should be done upon a system which should levy the tax equally and justly upon all the suitors coming into the court; but that was not done at present. A large portion of the funds of the Court of Chancery was brought into it by persons who had no beneficial interest whatever in the money. They got rid of their responsibility and were perfectly indifferent as to the accumulation of interest. Under those circumstances it constantly happened that rather than risk the investment of the capital, they left the money in the hands of the Court, and those to whom it belonged lost the whole of the interest during all the years the litigation might be carried on. He did not think that was just. It should be remembered that there were many suitors in the Court of Chancery who brought into it no money whatever. Therefore, so far as the expenses of the Court were paid out of the funds of those who brought money into it, they were defrayed by them alone. He thought that system unjust, and that the funds ought never to have been allowed to accumulate as they had done. He had no doubt whatever that now they belonged practically to no one individual nor to any body, but were at the disposal of the Parliament of the United Kingdom.

LORD CRANWORTH said, the question divided itself into two heads — first, whether the concentration of the Courts was desirable in itself; and secondly, whether the funds which it was proposed to devote to that object could justly be so applied. With regard to the expediency of concentrating the Courts, as an abstract proposition, no one could have any doubt upon the subject. To have the Courts, if not under one roof, at all events as easily accessible from one another as possible would be of great advantage. But having said so much he should be acting dishonestly if he were not to add that his noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor) had in his opinion greatly exaggerated the advantages which were likely to result from that concentration. His noble and learned Friend had talked of diminishing the expenses of litigation. But he (Lord Cranworth) did not think that any perceptible diminution of expense would follow the change. He ventured to predict that not one of their Lordships would live long enough to see a single 6s. 8d. reduced to 3s. 4d. in consequence of the concentration of the Law Courts. No doubt it would be convenient to practitioners, Judges, and witnesses attending the Courts to have them in one place and this was a very desirable object. It was commonly said that it would be convenient to suitors. He doubted that. A man was unfortunate who had one suit in his life, and, if that were so, suitors would not personally derive great advantage from the change. But the important part of the question was as to the funds. Upon that subject he entirely agreed with his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, and entirely differed from his noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards) who had just left the House. He went to the utmost possible length upon that point. The moment a litigant was by order of the Court compelled to pay his money into court he was compelled to do so by the State, by the authority of which the Court acted, and having so paid his money the State was bound to have the money forthcoming for him when he should require it. The State was banker; the Accountant General, the Court of Chancery, and all its functionaries were merely persons employed to manage the money. If, then, the State took the money upon its own responsibility it was entitled to take it for any particular purpose, and, as a large sum was wanted for Courts of Justice, it seemed a very good way of applying the money. But there was another portion of the scheme which he deeply deplored, and that was the tax upon affidavits and other law proceedings not in the Court of Chancery, but in the other Courts. His noble Friend the Duke of Argyll had taunted him with adhering to Bentham's policy. But he was free to acknowledge that he deeply regretted that the theory of that eminent man on the subject of Law Taxes should be thrown overboard. The first duty of the State was to provide machinery by which a man might be enabled to recover a right which was withheld from him; and the moment a tax was imposed upon him, before he could obtain his right, that was done by which Jeremy Bentham pointed out in a way that was unanswerable — the first principles on which Government was founded were violated.

If, as in some continental countries, they were to tax the losing party on the ground that he had withheld his rights from an innocent man, that might admit of more justification; but the tax which it was now proposed to impose extending as it did to litigants generally he deeply deplored. He approved the site chosen for the Courts, and could not think there was any danger of noise reaching those buildings from the public thoroughfares outside, when so large a space as 7½ acres was to be purchased under a Bill now in their Lordships' House.

LORD REDESDALE said, that one objection against the site was that it would certainly cost £750,000, and there was no probability that this would be the limit of the expense. Another objection he had to the scheme was that it could not be carried out without doing that which ought not to be done without absolute necessity. The residences of a great number of persons who were employed in the heart of the City, would be pulled down to form the site for those Courts, without provision being made for lodging those people elsewhere. It was clear that a very great expense must be incurred in making suitable approaches to the proposed Courts, and as to the buildings themselves their Lordships had no means of estimating the sum which they would cost. It appeared to him that there was no good reason for removing the Courts from Westminster, where they could be enlarged and made sufficiently convenient for every purpose. By means of the telegraph and of the underground railway along the northern embankment of the Thames, the communication from Lincoln's Inn and the Temple to Westminster would be so rapid that the argument founded on the fact of the new site being so close to the residences of the lawyers had not the force which the promoters of this scheme were disposed to claim for it. He was afraid that in an unguarded way Parliament was entering on a speculation which would turn out to be a much less satisfactory and a much more expensive one than was at present generally supposed.

GREENOCK RAILWAY BILL.

MOTION FOR RE-COMMITTAL.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE: If the House will favour me with its attention, I will briefly explain on what grounds I move that the Greenock Railway Bill be re-committed. This case is one of first impression, originating in the new practice under the recent Standing Orders of the House on the subject of Private Bills. It is one of some peculiarity. The House is aware that the new Standing Orders require the Referees on Private Bills to make a Report on certain points. One of these points is the sufficiency of the estimates for the works proposed. The Standing Order says that the Referees shall inquire into the engineering details, the sufficiency of the works for the proposed object, and the sufficiency of the estimates for executing the same. Now, the Referees considered these questions, and made a Report to the House, which, unfortunately, was couched in ambiguous terms, which neither found the estimates sufficient nor insufficient. The Report was in these terms—"The Referees consider that the promoters' estimate is vague and unsatisfactory." The House will observe that the finding was ambiguous, and capable of being regarded by the Committee, as either sufficient or as insufficient. After hearing counsel the Committee—which was presided over by the hon. and learned Member for Reading (Sir Francis Goldsmid)—found, in the following terms—

"That the Report of the Referees on Private Bills has been referred to the Committee, which Report is considered by the Committee as stating the opinion of the Referee that the estimate is not sufficient for the proposed undertaking; and in consequence of said Report the Committee did not proceed to consider the allegations in the preamble, and determined to report that the preamble is not proved to their satisfaction."

The parties, therefore, by this preliminary conclusion, were precluded from going into the merits of the Bill. The Bill was rejected and reported against, and unless it be re-committed it is gone. Now, the question for the House to consider is whether the finding of the Referees' Report was a finding that the estimate was insufficient; and I have some reason to believe—of course I have no right to quote the Referees—but I have some reason to believe that if the Committee had communicated with the Referees on this question, they would have been told that it was not intended to convey by that Report to the Committee that the estimate was insufficient; nor did they wish to preclude the Committee from investigating the merits of the case. This matter, therefore, is one on which we are fairly entitled to hear the opinion of the Referees in this House. As far as I understand it, this is more or less a miscarriage of justice, owing to the terms in which the opinion of the Referees was expressed, they not being in exact accordance with the language of the Standing Orders. I do not, therefore, understand why the Committee should have thought fit to prevent the farther progress of the Bill. The consequence is that the parties have not been heard. This, of course, is purely a technical question, and does not relate at all to the merits of the case. And as it is the first point that has arisen under the new state of things, I have thought it advisable to bring the matter under the notice of the House. It is simply a question whether this has been a miscarriage of justice in consequence of the Committee misunderstanding the intention of the Report of the Referees. I observe Gentlemen in the House distinguished Members of the Court of Referees, and, therefore, I hope they will take the opportunity thus afforded them of expressing their intention by this Report, and that the House will take care that through this unfortunate ambiguity injustice is not done to those who promoted this Bill. I now beg to move that the Bill be re-committed to the former Committee.

MR. DUNLOP: I beg to second the Motion made by my right hon. Friend. I sincerely hope that some means will be taken to enable the parties to be heard on the merits of this scheme. I should have thought that when a doubt was felt by the Committee as to the intention of the Referees, reference would have been made to them to know their meaning. I think it is a case in which they might and ought to have done that; and if there be any doubt still remaining, I trust the Referees will explain what their intention was.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Greenock Railway Bill be re-committed to the former Committee."—(Mr. Edward Pleydell Bouverie.)

MR. ADAIR: As I was one of the Referees who signed the Report, I will take the liberty of briefly explaining to the House the circumstances adverted to by the right hon. Member for Kilmar-nock (Mr. E. P. Bouverie). A practice has crept in among engineers of drawing up their estimates in a very loose, vague, and unsatisfactory manner; and since the establishment of the Court of Referees, it has been determined by us that we will have these estimates more clearly set out. When we came to examine the estimates, we heard a great deal of conflicting evidence on the subject, we were not satisfied that as much care—though as much as the previous practice of Parliament had required—had been exercised on this occasion, as we should in future insist upon; and, therefore, with that view, I and my Colleagues thought it necessary to introduce in the Report the words that the estimates were "vague and unsatisfactory." We should perhaps have said that the principle on which the estimates were framed was "vague and unsatisfactory," or some words to that effect. We were satisfied that though we should not have been justified in declaring that the estimates were "insufficient" for the works contemplated, yet the principle on which they were framed was "vague and unsatisfactory." We also thought it our duty to draw the attention of the Committee to the fact that in an estimate of £350,000, on the promoters' own showing there was only left a margin of £5,000. It was under these circumstances that we made the Report containing the expressions which have been read. We were satisfied that the estimate was sufficient, though the principles on which it had been framed were so "vague and unsatisfactory;" and we hoped this would be received as an intimation that greater accuracy ought to be shown, and would in future be required by the Referees.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE: I

wish to say a few words in corroboration of what as just been said by my hon. Colleague. Having shared with him in drawing up this Report, I concur with him in all he has said with regard to the circumstances under which it was drawn up. We considered whether we should not declare the estimate "insufficient," but we had some hesitation in doing that, although there were circumstances to which we thought it proper respectfully to draw the attention of the Committee, so that they might consider the whole question; but nothing was farther from our intention, in drawing up that Report, than that we should altogether debar or preclude the Committee from considering the Bill on its merits.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE: I have, I confess, been not a little surprised at the Motion which has been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmar-nock. I should certainly not have expected such a Motion to emanate from a Gentleman of so much experience as my right hon. Friend. The right hon. Gentleman says there is great ambiguity in the language used by the Referees. Now, I cannot think so. There appears to me nothing at all ambiguous in the phrase they have employed. The estimate is pronounced by the Referees "vague and unsatisfactory." The Chairman of the Committee, a Gentleman of great experience in such matters, tells us that on the ground of that Report they decided on throwing out the Bill. Are we thus to understand that whenever a Bill has been thrown out because the Referees have reported against it, that the wording of their Report is to be criticized, the merits of the Bill discussed in this House, and Motions made for re-committal? If you agree to such a Motion in this case, where are you to stop? All I can say is, if the terms "vague and unsatisfactory" are not sufficient to indicate that an estimate is insufficient, the terms ought certainly to be applied to the Referees' Report. I think the proposition which has been made by the right hon. Gentleman a most mischievous one, and I shall divide the House against it.

MR. ROEBUCK: I think what has just been stated by the hon. Member is hardly sufficient to induce the House to reject the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. E. P. Bouverie). The Referees state that the practice of the House had been such that when they came to consider it they thought it unsatisfactory, and ought to be changed. But the present estimate was framed according to the old usage. That is the first thing to be considered. Then, said the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Adair), "We wanted to draw the attention of the Committee to the manner in which the estimates had been framed." Therefore they used words not in accordance with the Standing Order, but in accordance with the fact. Well, what did the Committee do? They did not pay attention to that fact, but they seized on these words, and declared the estimate insufficient. Now that, we are told by two of the Referees, was not their notion. They merely wished to call attention to the matter in hand, saying that they considered that engineers should make their estimates in a more satisfactory manner. Shall we, then, be doing justice if we refuse to re-commit this Bill? I think not. In every new system these mistakes must occur every now and then. As things go on, the machinery will work more equably; but in the outset you must expect things of this kind. Let us, when the case is pointed out, put the matter to rights; and I say, after what we have heard from the Referees, we ought to re-commit this Bill, and let the Committee determine whether the estimates are or are not sufficient.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID: Having been Chairman of the Committee to which this Bill was referred, I wish to state, in very few words, what was the view we took of the Report of the Referees, and why I think, as the matter stood, we were perfectly right. I shall then, with the permission of the House, state what course I think ought now to be taken with regard to the Motion of my right hon. Friend. The question of the sufficiency or insufficiency of the estimates was referred to the Referees. It is admitted that if the estimates were found to be insufficient, the Committee ought not to proceed with the Bill. Well, the Report finds that the estimate is "vague and unsatisfactory." The first remark I make upon these terms is this—it cannot possibly be maintained that they are equivalent to saying that the estimate is sufficient. But we are told that the subsequent part of the Report makes it appear, nevertheless, that that was intended. So far as I understand the subsequent part of the Report, it has a contrary bearing. It is well known that in all works of this description unexpected expenses occur, and in order to the sufficiency of an estimate, it is necessary to allow a considerable sum for contingencies. But the Referees themselves point out the smallness of the sum. Only £5,000 on an estimate of £350,000 had been left for this purpose. It has been said by my right hon. Friend who made this Motion, and by my hon. Friend who seconded it, that the Committee ought to have communicated with the Referees, that they might have explained the language of their own Report. I think the Committee would have miscarried if they had made such a reference. The Committee thought the Referees had already expressed themselves in intelligible language; the Committee believed, and they acted on the belief, that the Referees meant by the language they had used that the estimates were "insufficient;" and I have not heard anything yet to induce me to think that the House ought to re-commit the Bill. But it is said the Referees only wished to guard against similar errors in future. I think if this Bill be re-committed, it will, in the strongest possible manner, encourage such errors. Such is the view which I myself take of this question. At the same time, if the House should think proper, after the explanation of the Referees, to re-commit the Bill, I am quite sure the Committee will be ready to proceed with the investigation on the merits.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: I consider this question entirely a matter of procedure. The promoters of a Bill are virtually on the defensive as regards the sufficiency of the estimate, unless a Bill is opposed on the ground of the insufficiency of the estimates. The opposition to this Bill proceeds only from a rival company; all the landowners on the line are in its favour, and the important town of Greenock, where it originates, also strongly support it. I think the House will not be inclined to draw the rule with extraordinary strictness for the sake of defeating such a Bill. The hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Adair) has stated that he did not think the Referees would have been justified in absolutely certifying the sufficiency of the estimates; but neither did they endorse the opinion of the opponents of the Bill by declaring them to be insufficient. I shall support the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. CLAY: I consider such miscarriages of justice exceedingly likely to arise in the working of new machinery; and the House can well afford not to be too strict opinion, whereas the real truth of the matter is, the Referees came to no decision on the question at all. The hon. and learned Member for Guildford (Mr. Bovill) has quoted the Standing Order; but if the House will refer to the wording of that Standing Order, they will find that the Referees are to decide whether the estimates are sufficient or insufficient. They have not done so in this case. All they say is, that the estimates are vague and unsatisfactory, which is a very different thing. I think the House ought to proceed in strict accordance with the letter of the Standing Order, and if they do that, there can be no difficulty in allowing this Bill to be re-committed.

MR. DODSON: I think it would be a very unfortunate custom if it should become the habit of the House lightly to re-commit Bills reported upon adversely by the Referees or rejected by Committees; but, at the same time, the House must be very careful that they do not in some exceptional cases do any act of injustice, which will fall somewhat hardly on the promoters of Private Bills. In this case I have no doubt the Referees reported accurately that the estimates were made out in a vague and unsatisfactory manner; but, at the same time, they certainly do not report that the estimates are insufficient. That Report from the Referees went before the Committee appointed to inquire into the merits of the Bill, and construing it in the strictest manner, the Committee threw out the Bill. We have now heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich, who was Chairman of the Referees, and who signed the Report on their behalf, that it was not the intention of the Referees to convey to the Committee an opinion that the estimates were insufficient. Under these circumstances, I think the House would do well to allow the Bill to be re-committed. The hon. and learned Member for Guildford (Mr. Bovill) asks how the Committee are to deal with the subject of the insufficiency of the estimates after it had already been dealt with by the Referees; and he has called our attention to Standing Order No. 91, arguing from that that the Committee have no further powers to inquire into the matter; but if the learned Member would look at the next Standing Order, No. 92, he would see that any Select Committee to which a Bill is referred, may, subject to the approval of the Chairman of Ways and Means, remit any question arising in this way back again to the Referrees. Under all circumstances, I think the proper course in this case will be to allow the Bill to be re-committed, there being a power given to the Committee to refer back to the Referees their Report on any subject on which they may require information.

MR. HENLEY: I wish that the hon. Member the Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Dodson) had addressed himself to answering the question which was asked by the hon. and learned Member for Guildford (Mr. Bovill), which really lies at the root of the matter. The Motion before the House is to re-commit this Bill in order that it shall be referred back to the Referees upon the question of estimates. Now, no one pretends to say that the Report of the Referees holds out the slightest impression that the estimates are sufficient. The language of the Report, equivocal as it may be, is clear upon that point. We come, then, to the question of the Standing Orders, and if this Bill is to go back to the Committee, what course are they to take?—because, as I understand the effect of the Standing Orders, it is not within the scope of the powers of the Committee to go into the question whether the estimates are sufficient. If that is really so, and they cannot go into the question of the sufficiency of the estimates, the whole subject must again come before us for our decision; and we should then have to declare, upon the vague statement of the Referees, whether the estimates are sufficient or not. The Chairman of Ways and Means says very properly that this is a special case; but I doubt whether we should not be laying down a worse precedent by sending this case back to the Committee, who would be unable by the Standing Orders to go into the question whether the estimates are sufficient or not, than by letting the Bill stand over for a year, and affording time for the estimates to be laid before us in a proper form. If the Motion goes to a division, I shall certainly vote against the proposition of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock.

MR. DODSON: I think that the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) could scarcely have heard what I said, or he would not have made the observations which he has addressed to the House. All I did was to point out that Standing Order No. 92 gives power to refer back to the Referees any question arising out of their Report upon which the Committee may entertain a doubt.

GLASGOW CITY, SUBURBAN AND HARBOUR RAILWAY BILL.

RE-COMMITTAL.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Glasgow City Suburban and Harbour Railway Bill be re-committed to the former Committee."—(Mr. Wyld.)

POOR LAW UNIONS—AUDITORS OF ACCOUNTS.—QUESTION.

MR. LIDDELL asked the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether it be the intention of the Poor Law Board to undertake for the future the appointment of all "Auditors of Accounts" to Poor Law Unions, such appointments having been hitherto supposed to rest in the hands of the Chairmen and Vice Chairmen of the respective Unions?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, in reply, that the Poor Law Board could not undertake the future appointment of Auditors, as they had no power to do so, the appointment being vested in the Chairman and Vice Chairman of the Board of Guardians. The Committee on Poor Relief had, however, recommended that in future the appointment should be vested in the central authority, and it would be for the House of Commons to decide whether that recommendation should be adopted whenever it was submitted to them. The Poor Law Board had no wish that the appointment should be vested in them. The Committee on Poor Relief also expressed a decided opinion that the number of audit districts should be reduced as vacancies occurred, and the vacant districts incorporated with others. The power to do this was already vested in the Poor Law Board under the 7 and 8 Vict. c. 101, and whenever vacancies occurred they were proceeding, as far as practicable, to carry their recommendation into effect, with the view of ultimately arranging that every district should be sufficiently extensive to occupy the whole time of each Auditor. This course did not deprive the Chairmen and Vice Chairmen in the districts which were annexed to others of their right to vote at subsequent elections.

ADJOURNED DEBATE ON THE CHURCH ESTABLISHMENT (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

MR. WALPOLE said, he would beg to ask the hon. Member for Swansea, Whether he proposes to proceed with the adjourned Debate on the Church Establishment (Ireland), which now stands as an Order of the Day for Tuesday next?

MR. DILLWYN: Sir, I find the Motion stands as an Order of the Day on Tuesday, and several other important Motions will come on before it. I cannot, therefore, expect to get on that day sufficient time for the discussion of a question of such importance. I therefore intend to propose the adjournment of the Order on Tuesday to some day when we can have sufficient time for its discussion. I hope to induce the Government to assist me.

UNION CHARGEABILITY BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. FERRAND said, he rose to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, To name the day on which he will proceed with the Union Chargeability Bill; and whether he will bring it on as the first Order of the Day, so as to allow a full discussion on the effect it will have in the manufacturing districts?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS: Sir, I cannot at this moment fix a day when the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman can be discussed. I am extremely anxious there should be no delay, and I hope next week to be able to fix a day.

MR. FERRAND: Will the right hon. Gentleman state that he will bring it on as the first Order of the Day?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS: I will bring it on as early as possible.

MR. HUNT: Can the right hon. Gentleman state when the Returns moved for by the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) will be on the table?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS: The Returns are very comprehensive, and some time must elapse before they can be printed.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.—QUESTION.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, What will be the order of business on Monday?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: First will come the Address which it is proposed to move in reference to the assassination of President Lincoln. After that I propose to proceed with the Bank Notes Issue Bill, which I have fixed for that day for some time. After that I believe my right hon. Friend (Mr. M. Gibson) will proceed with his Partnership Amendment Bill. On Thursday we propose to proceed with the Resolutions (connected with the Budget) which I laid on the table of the House last night.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

OUT-DOOR OFFICERS OF CUSTOMS.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. HENNESSY said, he rose for the purpose of moving that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the grievances referred to in the Petition of the Mayor, Merchants, Shipowners, and Commercial Traders of Liverpool with reference to the Out-door Officers of Customs. That petition was presented by his hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool (Mr. Horsfall) on the 20th of March, and it stated that much discontent and dissatisfaction prevailed among those officers, caused by inadequate salaries, a defective system of classification, and a probability almost amounting to certainty that those gentlemen would not be able to obtain that promotion which they reasonably expected when entering the public service. Petitions on the same subject had been presented from the Lord Mayor, Merchants, and Shipowners of London; the Lord Mayor and Merchants of Durham; the Lord Provost and Merchants of Edinburgh and Leith; and the Mayor, Merchants, and Shipowners of Hull. He intended to move, also, that these petitions be referred to the Committee. The complaint of the petitioners was that in the year 1860 the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer introduced certain changes, which had had the effect of increasing the weight of those officers' duties, and of diminishing their chance of promotion without increasing their pay. In his financial statement of the previous evening the right hon. Gentleman told the House that of the surplus of £4,000,000, about £752,000 had arisen from the augmentation of the Customs. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: No, the Excise.] The right hon. Gentleman was reported to have said the Customs. The change which had taken place had caused great discontent and dissatisfaction amongst 3,000 officers, whose intelligence and zeal were equal to that of any other class. There could be no doubt that the duties of the out-door officers had increased; for, in the fifth Report of the Commissioners of Customs it was stated—in reference to a state of things which had arisen after the changes made in 1860—that the duty of the officers became more arduous every year. So pressing were the demands for despatch, and so great the importance of delay, that the Commissioners had been obliged to sanction the loading of steamers in many instances during the whole night, and the discharge of import cargoes as long as daylight lasted; while the privilege of loading and discharging from six a.m. to six p.m., formerly confined to a comparatively small number of articles, had now, by the revision of the tariff, become all but universal. In another portion of their Report the Commissioners observed—

"From the experience of the past year we feel compelled to speak even more strongly than we did in our last Report in support of every measure calculated to alleviate the severity of a blow hitherto unparalleled in the history of this, or, we believe, of any other public department."

In their Report for the year before last the Commissioners remarked that the pressure on the whole out-door department had been exceedingly severe; and they observed that the cost of collecting the Customs had been gradually decreasing, notwithstanding the steadily advancing trade of the country. He held in his hand the statement of one of those Out-door Customs Officers in the port of London, from which he found that the class to which he belonged had a chance of rising by promotion to £130 a year, that it could not now rise beyond £90, and that there were other serious changes which had worked most detrimentally to their interests. The Minute of 1860 at once blighted the hopes of thousands of those officers. In the petition of the out-door officers of Hull to the Treasury he found it stated—"That the amalgamation changed all that was favourable in this state of things, by fixing the maximum at £65 and 1s. a day, instead of £76 and 1s. a day; by making £5 the uniform amount of promotion, instead of £10 and £5 alternately as before; by so enlarging the classes, especially those worse paid, as to make promotion a shadowy and doubtful thing; by reducing all actual salaries £6, though still received as personal allowance, so that when promotion does come it brings no relief, for £5 of the £6 personal allowance is applied in lieu thereof, and so no increase of income follows by lopping off unconditionally all remuneration for acting in a superior capacity, and by reducing all overtime pay to the uniform rate of 6d. per hour, although it was paid by the merchant, and never reluctantly in the out-door officer's case."

the revenue and the condition of the officers of this department to remain so marked as it was at present. The state of the out-door officers of the Customs remained nominally unchanged, but practically had very greatly deteriorated. These officers were men of character, and intrusted with large amounts of property; and they ought to be in a position, not of dissatisfaction, but of content, and be fairly paid for their labour. It ought not to be forgotten that the introduction of improvements and the rapid advance of economical science and business arrangement since the times when these men came into the service had greatly increased the work, while house rent, provisions, and all other necessities of life were much dearer; and that the rate of wages, compared with what it was ten years ago, was more than doubled. He thought a very fair case had been made out for inquiry.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the grievances referred to in the Petition of the Mayor, Merchants, Shipowners, and Commercial Traders of Liverpool, which was presented on the 20th day of March last, with reference to the Out-door Officers of Customs,"—(Mr. Hennessy),

—instead thereof.

MR. BAINES said, he had a petition intrusted to him, which he had been unable to present from merchants connected with the inland bonding port of Leeds, confirming the statements made in the petition referred to by the hon. Member for the King's County (Mr. Hennessy) and praying for inquiry into the salaries and for more liberal treatment of these officers. The petition stated most distinctly that their salaries were not adequate to the decent and comfortable maintenance of themselves and families; indeed, they were so small as to present grievous temptations to departure from honesty in the discharge of their duties. He supported the Motion.

MR. HENRY BERKELEY said, that speaking for the merchants of Bristol he considered these public officers a very hard-worked class. They were ill-paid, yet put in places of great trust, and were often, therefore, placed in circumstances of great temptation. A case had been made out fairly calling for the attention of the Government, and he thought if the Motion were pressed to a division the Government might be induced to give some pledge that the condition of this deserving body of men would be improved.

MR. CAVE said, that he had a petition from Shoreham, which he had been unable to present, in which it was stated that it was impossible merchants and traders could feel entire confidence that such responsible duties could be honestly discharged while great temptations were placed in the way of officers who were most inadequately remunerated for their services. They all knew that in other countries the dishonesty of Government employés was often traceable to the inadequacy of their pay; they imagined that at home that temptation was wanting, and that those employed by the Government were not obliged to plead the smallness of their salaries as an excuse for dereliction of their duties. The grievances alleged in this case, therefore, called for inquiry.

MR. CLAY said, that he had taken great interest in this question, and been in long and frequent communication with the Treasury in regard to it. He should be wanting in his duty if he did not give his testimony to the very minute, careful, and conscientious attention which had been given to the subject by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of the Treasury. So conscientious had been the inquiry by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he should advise a man who had a good case to take it to that right hon. Gentleman and if he had a bad one to take it to somebody else. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hennessy) had omitted in his speech to mention a great boon which had been given to this branch of the service—namely, that of throwing open the whole of the Treasury patronage of the higher grades to the Customs themselves. He, however, was free to admit that that boon had not reached the men who were most aggrieved by the amalgamation of 1860—namely, those who had reached, or nearly reached, the top of their classes, who found themselves subject to a new classification, and instead of their reasonable expectation of immediate promotion, found their prospects of it so far removed, as almost to destroy hope of attaining it. The reason of the boon he had mentioned being useless to these men was this—the practice of the Customs was to give promotion either by selection or by competitive examination. Selection practically meant favouritism; and the class of old officers who were most aggrieved would probably make themselves no favourites by dwelling upon their grievances. But whatever chance of promotion they might have by selection, they had still less by competition, a system which should only apply to entrance into the service. It was not to be expected that these old men—although thoroughly good officers, because they possessed experience, and therefore had those very qualities of which a preliminary examination was only the imperfect test—would be up to the mark in general education easily reached by young men fresh from the instructions of their preceptors. He had pressed on the Treasury that a part of the Customs patronage should be given to seniority, coupled with competence and good conduct, but that that system should merely continue until such time as the claims of the sufferers by the amalgamation had been satisfied. He certainly thought that the right hon. Gentleman had adopted his views on this question; but whether they were in accordance with the opinions of the Customs authorities he was not aware; they had, however, been in no way carried out. After looking carefully into the promotions which had been since made, he found that very few of them had been given to the officers who had most suffered by the amalgamation which had taken place. He believed if his suggestion had been adopted, they would not have heard of the Motion of his hon. Friend, and the agitation would have ceased—at any rate, for a considerable time. He added the last words because he believed the day must come when the Government would have to entertain the very much larger question of increasing the salaries of all their public servants in the lower grades. He should, perhaps, not be wrong in saying in all grades except the highest, the social station and influence of which might be considered as part of the remuneration for the service rendered. He would not say that this question of an increase of salary should not be entertained by the Government, but it was the duty of the guardians of the public purse to resist as long as it was just and fair to do so an augmentation so considerable of the fixed burdens of the country, of which however he had no fear, when the national wealth was increasing by at least one hundred millions annually. He should not, therefore, be surprised if the Government resisted the Motion of his hon. Friend. Those who like himself supported it should do so with their eyes open, and recollect that this was only the first step to a very much larger inquiry regarding other officers who might be shown to be no less sufferers, and required no less consideration than those whose claims were now brought before the House.

MR. HORSFALL said, he had been prevented from presenting a petition from Liverpool in favour of the Motion. He should deeply regret if Her Majesty's Government should resist the appointment of this Committee. He would not say that these officers were either underpaid or overpaid, but it was well known that there was a feeling of dissatisfaction among them, and if the appointment of this Committee would remove that feeling Her Majesty's Government would do well to appoint it. He regretted that his hon. Friend had not extended his Motion, because it was not in the out-door department alone in which dissatisfaction existed, but also to a great extent in the indoor department, and if a Committee were appointed to inquire into the one class, that inquiry should be followed by another into the other class.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it would not, at any rate, be the fault of his hon. Friend who had just sat down and the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Clay) if the House were not enabled to understand the real nature and effect of the Motion before them. In the case of public officers who were enabled to allege that in their reasonable expectations, grounded upon the rules of public service existing when they entered that service, they had been disappointed through the Acts of the Government there was, he admitted, a grievance, and it was a matter in which it was the duty of the Government to render an account of their proceedings to the House, and it would be perfectly within the rules of prudence to risk an inquiry by a Committee. That was a view of the question comparatively narrow, and it was upon this view that his hon. Friend, judging by his arguments, was about to support the Motion. On this part of the question he should say a word by-and-by. The Motion before the House was of importance, not because the representatives of several of the ports of the country had risen in their places to speak in favour of it, touching as it did directly and indirectly the especial interests of their constituencies, adverse to that of the country at large. [Mr. HENNESSY: No, no!] It was not because several Gentlemen representing that class of constituents had given their opinions in favour of this Motion that the hon. Member was entitled to say that he hoped Her Majesty's Government would not resist this Motion. He thanked his hon. Friend the Member for Hull for declaring the true effect of this Motion. It was not a question relating merely to a particular case of officers who thought they had been aggrieved by the change of 1860. The question at issue had been fairly and honestly disclosed and ingeniously exhibited to the public view by the hon. Member for Hull and by the hon. Member for Liverpool, and it was, whether that House, composed of representatives of the public, was prepared to hear one by one all classes of persons employed in the public service, who should come forward as general solicitors for an increase of pay and emoluments, and that at the very period when the multitude of competent candidates for admission was far beyond what could be employed in any department. He hoped it would not be thought that he was presuming to dictate to the House if he ventured to point out that to enter upon that course would be a proceeding full of danger. If there was a duty that belonged to the executive Government, it was that it should be held responsible for the regulation and the pay of the public servants; and he was convinced that the House of Commons would at all times be reluctant, as it ever had been, to take that particular duty out of the hands of the executive Government. He knew nothing that would tend so much to the disorganization of the public service, or anything which in its results would do more to lower the character of that great Assembly, than such a step. He ventured to say that the hon. Gentleman who made the Motion did not go to the root of the matter, but adopted the vague and general allegation of the petition which he read, and stated that the Treasury had simply dealt with certain minor grievances and had left the major ones alone; and the hon. Gentleman ingeniously illustrated that proposition by a reference to the topcoats. The major grievances were two—one of which was not at all comprehended by the hon. Gentleman, and the other he conveniently passed over, taking no notice of it whatever. The case was this. There were several minor concessions made by the Treasury Minute of 1864. It was perfectly true that though there had been a difference of opinion about it between the period of 1860 and 1864, the Commissioners of Customs reported that with regard to certain classes of officers they had suffered with respect to their chances of promotion. He admitted that that was a very fair subject for consideration, and he thought, with regard to the promotion of public servants, that where there was an absence of misconduct, and where there was no incompetency, the Government could not justly estimate the position of the public servants if they neglected their prospects of promotion. Consequently an injury to prospects of promotion was an injury to position, which might be fairly described as a grievance. The two principal grievances complained of were the existence of day pay, and the injury done to the prospects of promotion. With regard to the day pay, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hennessy) had been answered upon that point by the hon. Member for Hull. It was shown that the hon. Gentleman did not understand the significance of the arrangement which was made, and by which a fixed allowance had been given to this class of officers after the expiration of a limited time in lieu of the day pay they formerly enjoyed. With regard to the prospects of promotion, how did that matter stand? The Government had endeavoured to open to this class of officers generally, not only equal, but superior prospects of promotion to what they possessed prior to 1860. The out-door officers could now be promoted to the class of examining officers. As his hon. Friend was aware, this had made a great improvement in the position of those officers. He had not the least hesitation in saying that they had not limited themselves to meeting a grievance, but had endeavoured to put these officers in the best position they possibly could compatibly with the interests of the public service. Here he might remark that the hon. Gentleman had given expression to an opinion which as a general rule he was perfectly willing to endorse. The hon. Member stated that he was a great advocate for competitive examination, but that such examination ought to be limited to the first entrance into the public service. The opinion was one which he himself entertained, but he was bound to say there was a distinction between manual or mechanical labour, and intellectual labour, and it would not therefore be safe to put an out-door officer, whose duties were the Customs to the Excise, from the Excise to the Post Office; nor did he know in what manner its operation after its commencement could be stopped. He believed, if they gave encouragement to the principle, they would find themselves entangled in the re-consideration of the emoluments of all departments of the public service, whether civil, naval, or military. He was sure that no House of Commons—whether dying or just born—whether about to meet its constituents or fresh from meeting them—would entangle itself in a principle so false with consequences so mischievous. The cases deserving inquiry should be investigated in a fair and equitable spirit, but as the proposition of the hon. Member meant something much wider and of a different character, he hoped the House would reject it.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he wished to state that he also had been prevented by the forms of the House from presenting that evening a petition from the merchants and traders of Tralee in favour of the Motion.

MR. LYALL said, he wished to point out the great inequalities which existed in the remuneration of officers at the outports. At Whitehaven, where everything was getting very dear, the officers received lower remuneration than was granted in an adjoining town. Whether these had arisen from past arrangements or not, they ought not to be allowed to remain. It was impossible for merchants and ship-owners who came in contact with these officers not to sympathize with them. If the Government should not listen to their complaints it was the duty of Members to urge attention to them.

MR. GOSCHEN appealed to the hon. Member for the King's County whether he did not think that he had got from the Chancellor of the Exchequer all that he wanted. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had promised to look into the complaint, and to remedy any grievances which he might find to exist. It must be remembered that two things were involved—an increase of pay and compensation for loss of promotion. It would be hard if, by the non-success of this Motion as to increase of pay—with regard to which it would probably fail—that the officers of Customs should be deprived of compensation for loss of promotion. The right hon. Gentleman had admitted the grievance, and had promised to consider it. Under those circumstances, it would be the wiser course for the hon. Member for the King's County to withdraw the Motion, and to reserve to himself free action for the future in case he should think that the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not properly redeem his pledge.

MR. DUNLOP said, he had such confidence in the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he would have preferred that this Motion should not have been brought forward; but, it having been brought forward, he felt it due to an excellent class of men to express his concurrence in the statements that had been made of the hardships of their case. This was also the opinion of influential inhabitants at Greenock.

SPIRIT DUTIES IN IRELAND.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, he rose to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the operation of the augmented Spirit Duties in Ireland. He had said he had been a great admirer of the financial abilities of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would gladly assent to the appointment of this Committee, as it would enable him to give his reasons for pursuing an exactly contrary financial policy in Ireland to that which he had pursued in England. The whole merit of his policy in England had been to diminish and repeal every duty which in any way restricted the consumption of the people, which restrained production, or diminished employment. In Ireland he had adopted an exactly contrary policy. He had augmented a tax which had had the effect of restricting the consumption and enjoyment of the people, and thrown many people out of employment. Ample evidence to that effect had been elicited before the Committee on Irish Taxation. One witness stated that the consumption of spirits had declined from 8,000,000 gallons in 1852 to 5,000,000 gallons in 1862; another, that the number of distillers had declined from 75 to 19; another, that the increased tax on Irish spirit had acted prejudicially upon agriculture generally, that the farmer and the labourer alike had suffered. Colonel Knox Gore stated that the effect of the increased duty was to limit the extent of cultivation ; and the late Mr. Senior had declared that two-thirds of the Irish distilling trade had been ruined by recent legislation. The morals of the people had not improved, and illicit distillation had increased. And it should be borne in mind that all this took place at a time when Ireland was suffering from the effects of a series of bad harvests—a time when the circumstances of the country called for a reduction, not for an increase of taxation. Crowds of people were thrown out of employment, the labour market had been overcharged, and wages proportionately reduced. The right hon. Gentleman could not therefore be surprised that a bitter feeling was evolved by the increase of direct and indirect taxation in Ireland—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present ; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY.

EARL RUSSELL : My Lords I rise to ask your Lordships to address Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty that in any communications She may make to the Government of the United States expressing her abhorrence and regret at the great crime which has been committed in the murder of the President of that country, Her Majesty will at the same time express the sorrow and indignation felt by this House at that atrocious deed. In this case I am sure your Lordships will feel entire sympathy with Her Majesty, who has instructed me already to express to the Government of the United States the shock which She felt when the intelligence

reached this country, and her abhorrence of the deep and horrible crime which has been perpetrated, and her sympathy with the Government and people of the United States. Her Majesty has also been pleased to write a private letter to Mrs. Lincoln, expressive of sympathy with that lady in her great and sudden bereavement. I think that your Lordships will agree with me that in modern times there has hardly been a crime committed so abhorrent to the feelings of every civilized person as the one I am now referring to. Mr. Lincoln had been first elected President of that great and united Republic ; and after the secession of a part of the States, he was re-elected to the same high position by the large majority of the people remaining faithful to the Government of the United States. He was in the discharge of the duties of his office, having borne his faculties meekly, at the moment when an assassin attacked him at the theatre, whither he had gone to please the people of Washington. My Lords, there are circumstances connected with this crime which, I think, aggravate its atrocity. President Lincoln was a man who, though not conspicuous before his election, had since displayed a character of so much integrity, so much sincerity and straightforwardness, and at the same time of so much kindness, that if any one could have been able to alleviate the pain and animosities which prevailed during the period of civil war, I believe that President Lincoln was that person. It was remarked of President Lincoln that he always felt disinclined to adopt harsh measures ; and I am told that the commanders of his armies often complained that when they had passed a sentence which they thought no more than just the President was always disposed to temper its severity. Such a man this particular epoch required. The conduct of the armies of the United States was intrusted to other hands, and on the commanders fell the responsibility of leading the armies in the field to victory. They had been successful against those they had had to contend with ; and the moment had come when, undoubtedly, the responsibilities of President Lincoln were greatly increased by their success. But, though it was not for him to lead the armies, it would have been his to temper the pride of victory, to assuage the misfortunes of his adversaries, and especially to show, as he was well qualified to show, that high respect for that valour on the opposite side which has been so conspicuously displayed. It was to be hoped that by such qualities, when the conflict of arms was over, the task of conciliation might have been begun, and President Lincoln would have an authority which no one else could have had to temper that exasperation which always arises in the course of civil strife. Upon another question the United States and the Confederates who have lately been in arms will have a most difficult task to perform. I allude to the question of slavery, which some have always maintained to have been the cause of the civil war. At the beginning the House will remember that President Lincoln declared that he had no right by the Constitution to interfere with slavery. At a later period he made a communication to the Commander-in-Chief of the United States forces in which he proposed that in certain States the slaves should be entirely freed. But at a later period he proposed—what he was constitutionally qualified to propose—that there should be an alteration in the Constitution of the United States, by which compulsory labour should hereafter be forbidden. Many persons were eager for the immediate abolition of slavery. I remember that Lord Macaulay once declared that it would have been a great blessing if the penal laws against the Roman Catholics had been abolished from the time of Sir Robert Walpole, though Sir Robert Walpole would have been mad to propose a measure for that purpose. So it was with regard to President Lincoln. Whatever may be the horror of slavery, I believe he was perfectly justified in delaying the time when that great alteration of the United States law should take place. But, whatever we may think on these subjects, we must all deeply deplore that the death of President Lincoln has deprived the United States of a man, a leader on this subject, who by his temper was qualified to propose such a measure as might have made this great change acceptable to those before opposed to it, and might have preserved the peace of the great Republic of America while undergoing that entire new organization which would be necessary under such circumstances. My Lords, I think we must all feel both sympathy with the United States in this great affliction, and also a hope that he who now, according to the American Constitution, succeeds to the power of the late President, may be able both on the one subject and on the other—both in respect to mercy and leniency towards the conquered, and also with regard to the measures to be adopted for the new organization which the abolition of slavery will render requisite—we must all hope that the new President may succeed in overcoming all difficulties, and in restoring the Republic to its pristine tranquillity. I had some time ago, at the commencement of this contest, occasion to say that I did not believe that the great Republic of America would perish in this war, and the noble Lord at the head of the Government had lately occasion to disclaim on the part of the Government of this country any feeling of envy at the greatness and prosperity of the United States. The course which Her Majesty's Government have had to pursue during this civil war has been one of great anxiety. Difficulties have occurred to us, and difficulties have also occurred to the Government of the United States, in maintaining the peaceful relations between the two countries; but those difficulties have always been treated with temper and moderation both on this side and the other side of the Atlantic. I trust that that temper and moderation may continue; and I can assure this House that, as we have always been guided by the wish that the American Government and the American people should settle for themselves the conflict of arms without any interference of ours, so likewise during the attempt that will now be made to restore peace and tranquillity to America, we shall equally refrain from any kind of interference or intervention, though we trust that the efforts to be made for that purpose will be successful, and that the great Republic of America will always flourish and enjoy the freedom it has hitherto enjoyed. I have nothing, of course, to say with regard to the successor of Mr. Lincoln. Time must show how far he is able to conduct the difficult matters which will come under his consideration with the requisite wisdom. All I can say is that, in the presence of the great crime which has just been committed, and of the great calamity which has fallen on the American nation, the Crown, the Parliament, and the people of this country do feel the deepest sympathy for the Government and people of the United States; for, owing to the nature of the relations between the two nations, the misfortunes of the United States affect us more than the misfortunes of any other country on the face of the globe. The noble Earl concluded by moving—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty to convey to Her Majesty the expression of the deep Sorrow and Indignation with which this House has learned the Assassination of The President of the United States of America, and to pray Her Majesty that in communicating Her own Sentiments on this deplorable Event to the Government of the United States, Her Majesty will also be graciously pleased to express on the part of this House their Abhorrence of the Crime and their sympathy with the Government and People of the United States."—(The Earl Russell.)

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, when, upon the last occasion of our meeting, the noble Earl opposite announced his intention of bringing forward the Motion he has now submitted to the House, I ventured to express my hope that the Government had well considered the form of the Motion they were going to make, so that there might be nothing in the form which would in the slightest degree interfere with the unanimity with which it was desirable the House should accept it. I confess, my Lords, it would have been more satisfactory to me if the noble Earl had entered somewhat upon the consideration of the question, and had informed your Lordships upon what grounds he proposed so unusual a course—though arising, I admit, out of unusual, if not unprecedented, circumstances—as that of addressing the Crown, and praying Her Majesty to convey to a foreign Government the sentiments of Parliament with regard to the event which has taken place. For myself, I confess that I am rather of the opinion that the more convenient and—I will not say the more usual but—the more regular course would have been to have simply to move a Resolution of this, in conjunction with the other House of Parliament, expressing those feelings which it is proposed by the Motion to place in the form of an Address to the Crown. But I am so extremely desirous that there should not appear to be the slightest difference of opinion at this moment that I cannot hesitate to give my assent to the form of Motion proposed by the Government, whatever doubt I may entertain that the form is the most convenient which might have been adopted. In joining in this Address—that is to say, in expressing our sorrow and indignation at the atrocious crime by which the United States have been deprived of their Chief Magistrate—your Lordships will only follow, though the event has been known so short a time, the universal feeling of sympathy which has been expressed from one end of this kingdom to the other. And if there be in the United States any persons who, misled by our having abstained from expressing any opinion as to the conflict now going on, or even from expressing the opinion we may have formed upon the merits of the two great contending parties—if there be any persons who believe that there is a generally unfriendly feeling in this country towards the citizens of the United States, I think they could hardly have had a more complete refutation of that opinion, conveyed in what I hope will be the unanimous declaration of Parliament, following the declarations which Her Majesty has been pleased to make both publicly and privately to the American Minister as well as to the widow of President Lincoln, and, again, following the voluntary and spontaneous expression of opinion which has already proceeded from almost all the great towns and communities of this country. Whatever other misfortunes may have attended this atrocious crime, I hope that, at least, one good effect may have resulted from it—namely, that the manner in which the news has been received in this country will satisfy the people of the United States that Her Majesty's subjects, one and all, deeply condemn the crime which has been committed, and deeply sympathize with the people of the United States in their feelings of horror at the assassination of their Chief Magistrate. My Lords, for the crime itself there is no palliation whatever to be offered. There may be differences of opinion as to the merits of the two parties who are contending, the one for empire and the other for independence, in the United States—I follow the words of the noble Earl opposite—but there is, there can be, no difference of opinion upon this point—that the holiest and the purest of all causes is desecrated and disgraced when an attempt is made to promote it by measures so infamous as this. If it were possible to believe that the Confederate authorities encouraged, sympathized with, or even did not express their abhorrence of this crime, I should say they had committed that which was worse than a crime—a gross blunder; because, in the face of the civilized world, a cause which required or submitted to be promoted by the crime of assassination, would alienate all sympathy and kindly feeling on the part of those who might otherwise be well disposed towards it. But I am perfectly satisfied—I am as well satisfied as I can be of anything—that this detestable act of assassination is so entirely alien to the whole spirit in which the South have conducted this war, is so alien to the courageous, manly, and at the same time forbearing course which they have adopted in the struggle for everything that is dear to them—that I am convinced that, apart from the error of judgment which would be involved in sanctioning such a crime, they cannot have been guilty of so great a blunder, and cannot fail to express for it their detestation and to feel at the same time that no step could have been taken which could have inflicted so great an injury on their own cause. I will not venture to follow the noble Earl even into the slight discussion which he has originated with regard to the internal politics of the United States. I will not discuss the difficulty which at the present moment is felt in the United States—the difficulty caused by slavery. I will not express any opinion as to the question whether the late defeats, serious as they are, and apparently fatal to the cause of the South, have produced, or are likely to lead to, an early termination of the war. In whatever way the war may be terminated, it must be the desire of every friend of humanity that it should be terminated soon and without further and unnecessary effusion of blood. But I join entirely with the noble Earl not only in lamenting the loss of a man, who certainly had conducted the affairs of a great nation, under circumstances of great difficulty, with singular moderation and prudence, and who, I believe, was bent upon trying to the utmost a system as conciliatory as was consistent with the prosecution of the war in which the country was engaged; but also, I agree that the death of such a man, in such a manner, and at such a time, is a subject not only for deep regret and for abhorrence of the crime by which he was deprived of life, but that it is also a serious misfortune in the present condition of affairs, for the State over which he exercised authority and for the prospects of an amicable settlement. I can only hope that, notwithstanding some ominous expressions which have already fallen from him, the successor who has so unexpectedly been elevated to the high position filled by Mr. Lincoln may be disposed and enabled to follow the wise and conciliatory course which, I believe, in the prospect of success, Mr. Lincoln had decided upon adopting. I am not insensible to the danger that public exasperation arising out of this act may force upon the Government a less conciliatory and more violent course than that which Mr. Lincoln seemed to have marked out for himself; but I am satisfied that the adoption of such a course can only further protract the horrors of this civil war, adding to the other motives of the South the most powerful of all motives, the motive of despair—leading the South to fight out this question to the bitter end—so that while the one side is exasperated into desire to exterminate its opponents, they, in their despair, will be ready to submit to extermination rather than accept the unreasonable terms of the North. Thus in the act itself—in the fact that the President of so great a country being so suddenly deprived of life, and in the circumstances under which this crime has been committed, and in the fatal influences which it may exercise upon the returning prospects of peace in the United States—upon all these grounds, I say, we must find the deepest cause for lamenting the occurrence which has taken place; and I am quite sure that, independently of all political motives, but not saying that political motives do not enter into our views, I am expressing the universal feeling of this House and of the country when I say that we view with horror, with detestation, and with indignation the atrocious crime by which the President of the United States has been deprived of life.

VISCOUNT STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE: My Lords, in consideration of my residence in the United States of America, at a somewhat distant period it is true, but, nevertheless, in the character of a British Representative, I hope I may be allowed to offer a few words in addition to those which have been so ably and justly expressed on both sides of the House. I cannot pretend to make any addition of real importance to what has been said already with so much effect, and it is therefore only for the gratification of a private feeling and for the discharge, as it were, of a personal debt that I venture to claim your Lordships' indulgence for a very few moments. The crime of assassination is so utterly revolting to the hearts and feelings of Englishmen that we cannot wonder at the cry of horror and indignation with which the death of President Lincoln has been received in this country throughout the breadth and length of the land. The circumstances under which that atrocious crime was perpetrated could not but heighten the abhorrence with which the act itself is to be viewed. Whether we look to the private affliction caused by its commission, or to the public consequences which may flow from the catastroupe, our compassion on the one side, and our anxiety on the other, is naturally roused to the highest degree. It is not in my province to pronounce any kind of judgment on the qualities, the conduct, or the intentions of the late President of the United States. It would be unkind and unworthy not to give him credit for the best claims on our esteem and regret. But when I figure to myself the Chief Magistrate, the temporary Sovereign of a great nation, struck down by a sudden and dastardly blow in the presence of his astounded family, in the first moments of relaxation from the toils and severe anxieties of a great civil contest, and in the midst of those who gave him their admiring acclamations, every thought is lost in one overpowering sentiment of horror and disgust. At the time of my personal acquaintance with America the relations between the different portions of the Union were such as to promise a long series of peaceful and prosperous years. The dreadful rupture which took place on the election of the late lamented President could hardly have been foreseen at that early period by the most sagacious and far-sighted politician. This country, as we all know, was seized with unfeigned astonishment and deep concern at the unexpected event; and I must do Her Majesty's Government the justice to say that during the whole course of the war the balance of a strict neutrality has been maintained with the most evenhanded and resolute sense of duty. I am slow to believe that the people of the United States entertain towards this country the sentiments of mistrust and animosity which have been sometimes attributed to them. Of this I feel sure, that no such hostile sentiments are entertained by the people of this country towards them; and, were it otherwise, I am persuaded that while on this side every unpleasant feeling unaffectedly merges in sympathy for the late bereavement at Washington, so, on the other, the expression of that sympathy, pure and deep as it is, cannot fail to obliterate any impressions unfavourable to us which may have arisen in any portion of the American population. The expression of our sympathy is not confined to numerous associations in every part of the country. It now assumes the more solemn character of a Parliamentary condolence, confirmed by the unanimous consent of both Houses and crowned by the gracious participation of a Sovereign whose sad acquaintance with sorrow is the strongest pledge of her sincerity. It is not for me to hazard any conjecture as to the cause of that atrocious crime which we all concur in lamenting, or the quarter whence it proceeded. But it is next to impossible that the gallant and highminded leaders of the one conflicting party could have descended so low as to support their impetuous cause by an assassination as base as it is execrable, and equally hard to conceive that those of the triumphant Union should entertain a suspicion at once so improbable and so unlike the magnanimity they are called upon to display. It is rather to be hoped and expected that the terrible calamity, which has occurred with such awful suddenness, will sober the agitated passions on both sides, and render acceptable to all the expressions of sympathy about to be transmitted from this country to our kindred beyond the Atlantic.

QUALIFICATION FOR OFFICES

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

Petitions of Committee of Deputies of Protestant Dissenters &c of London and Neighbourhood; of Committee of Congregational Union of England and Wales; of Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland—in favour of the Bill, presented.

LORD HOUGHTON, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that in taking the liberty of moving the second reading of a measure which had been several times under their Lordships' notice, he could assure them that he did so with the fullest confidence that the Bill was an important one, and with a certain degree of hope that their Lordships would pass it. He should be always unwilling to trouble their Lordships by introducing a measure in which he did not feel sincerely interested, or one which it was certain their Lordships would reject—he was far from desirous at any time to lead a forlorn hope in that House, or to bring before their Lordships any measure in regard to which he had reason to believe that they entertained any distinct and decided difference of opinion with the other House of Parliament. But although this Bill on several previous occasions had been before their Lordships, it was a measure of such simple justice and common sense that he thought the time must come when it would force itself upon their Lordships' approval. It was the object of the Bill to abolish a certain declaration which was adopted in the place of the former oaths when the Test and Corporation Acts were repealed in 1828. It was very intelligible that when those Acts were repealed a desire should be expressed for the substitution of some declaration on the part of those who then became eligible to certain offices of a determination not to injure or weaken the Protestant Church by law established, and that this declaration should be assented to by those who, although they had separated from the Church, had yet no wish to injure that great Establishment; but he thought their Lordships would, upon consideration, be of opinion that the retention of this declaration was nothing less than a continuation of the same spirit which was condemned by the abolition of the Test and Corporation Acts. It was natural that such a declaration should recognize that theory of the absolute co-ordination of Church and State which had so long held possession of the minds of Englishmen, and by which no one except a member of the Established Church was held worthy of holding any office under the Crown. That prejudice survived the scaffold of Strafford and of Laud; it was protested against at the Revolution of 1688; and it still found an occasional echo in the toast of "Church and King." The declaration now sought to be abolished was placed in the hands of all persons holding municipal office or offices under the Crown. It was a declaration which some of their Lordships, many of whom had held high office under the Crown, must have taken; but it was notorious that many of their Lordships who had thus held office, and very many persons throughout the country, had not made, and never were required to make, this declaration. The difficulty was got rid of by the Indemnity Bill, passed at the end of every Session, by which persons who had failed to take the declaration were relieved from all the pains and penalties which they had thereby incurred. The system, although 100 years old could not he thought claim any merit for its antiquity; and it was a bungling piece of legislation such as did not exist with regard to any other institution of the country. He now asked their Lordships to abolish this declaration, because it was of no use; because it did not carry out a single object which their Lordships desired, and because it was of no benefit whatever to the Church of England. It required that persons should declare that they would not in any degree injure the Church of England as established by law. That was nothing else than requiring these persons to declare that they would not break the law of their country. It was presented equally to Churchmen and to Dissenters. To Churchmen it meant nothing. Of Dissenters there was a large body who had no wish to injure an institution so intimately connected with the history of the country; and if this declaration was presented to them, what could it be but an insult and an irritant? Other Dissenters there were who thought the Church of England was not advantageous to the country, and who would gladly see its legal and regular abolition. To such persons what did the declaration mean? It could not make them feel more friendly towards the Church, nor could it add anything to the protection which the Church enjoyed by law. He remembered hearing a Dissenter to whom the declaration was presented say, "No, I have no love for the Church. But I see no objection to this document, for it only obliges me not to ride down a parson or strike down a Bishop; I will therefore sign it, though I think it is an insult." Their Lordships might, perhaps, object to read the Bill a second time because it came from a source which they disliked; but surely it was inconsistent with that spirit of independence which was the very genius of that House to refuse a reasonable request because they disapproved of those by whom it was preferred. Surely it mattered nothing to their Lordships from whom the Bill came provided their Lordships thought it politic and just. There was very little difference between the present Bill, he might add, and those which had on former occasions been under their Lordships' consideration, except so far as it was affected by the circumstance that it had been subjected to the ordeal of a Select Committee, and that its provisions might therefore be looked upon as having been duly weighed. He saw before him a noble and learned Lord (Lord Chelmsford) who had frequently opposed the change which it was intended by the Bill to introduce, inasmuch as he regarded the declaration in question as constituting a record of the predominance of the Church of England. But what, he should like to know, was the meaning of that argument? The Church of England, as regarded its property, was secured by precisely the same laws as secured the property of the smallest Dissenting chapel. And as to moral predominance, of course that could have no existence in the mind of any person who was a Dissenter. The fact was that the real source of the predominance of the Church lay not in such a declaration, but in the circumstance that she was day by day doing more to conciliate the mass of Dissenters and becoming more deeply rooted in the affections of the people. Finding its endowments utterly inadequate to keep pace with the wants of the population, it had called for the voluntary donations of her members, and it had become the largest voluntary body in the country. On account of the scarcity of clergy, it had been found necessary to admit into holy orders persons who were not so highly educated as used to be the case, and this again had tended to assimilate the Church to dissent in a degree that had never before been known. Their Lordships were now approaching a general election. It would be very difficult to find subjects for discussion at the hustings. All questions regarding freedom of food had been settled, and as to freedom of drink, at least as regarded the malt tax, the position of parties was reversed. Although there remained no questions of any great importance, it was essential to the political well-being of the country that on an appeal to the people the issues taken should be clearly and definitely taken. He would, therefore, ask noble Lords opposite whether they were prepared to go to the hustings with such a miserable link of the old chain of ecclesiastical tyranny hanging round their necks as that with which he now invited them to dispense. He hoped not, and that they would adopt a prudent as well as just course by allowing the Bill to be read a second time.

—(Lord Houghton.)*

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I hope the noble Lord who has moved the second reading of this Bill will not look upon it on the one hand as a mark of disrespect to him, or upon the other hand as a proof that his arguments are invincible, that none of your Lordships have shown a disposition to take part in the discussion. As, however, your Lordships will not, I believe, be found on the present occasion prepared to reverse the decision at which you have upon several previous occasions arrived, I think it will be hardly necessary, before proceeding to a division, to give many reasons why we should not accede to the Motion of the noble Lord. The noble Lord approached the subject as if it had all the charms of novelty, and with a zest which must have been refreshing to those among your Lordships who are somewhat older Members of the House than himself. When he asks whether the maintenance of the declaration which it is proposed to abolish is essential to the protection of the Church of England—or rather of the Establishment—I, for one, candidly admit that to my mind it is not, for that purpose, worth the paper it is written on. Why, therefore, am I opposed to a measure which is introduced for the purpose of doing away with the declaration? I wish the noble Lord to consider under what circumstances, and under whose auspices, this declaration was first introduced. It was introduced at the repeal of the Test and Corporations Act—that great measure of civil and religious liberty, the mention of which is so familiar in the mouth of the noble Lord opposite the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and who considers himself, if not the father, at least the godfather of that measure. The noble Lord takes an especial pride in that measure, as having set the Crown on the civil and religious liberties of this country, as far as the Protestant Dissenters are concerned. I am old enough to recollect the passing of that Bill, to which I also gave my concurrence, though being somewhat junior to the noble Earl, I had not so prominent a position in the party to which we both belonged as he had. But I recollect that the noble Earl, then Lord John Russell, expressed his strong conviction of the importance of passing that measure, and also his conviction, after the most deliberate consideration, that the declaration which it was proposed to introduce was one which no conscientious Dissenter could possibly have the slightest objection to take. He added that he should have considered it inexcusable—or words to that effect—if, upon any such objection, he had attempted to stand in the way of the measure. And Sir Robert Peel, who introduced and carried the Bill, insisted that it would have been impossible to accomplish this object had not that declaration been inserted for the purpose of satisfying the scruples of conscientious Churchmen. The noble Lord says, "You get rid of the declaration every year by the Act of Indemnity;" but he thinks the yearly Act of Indemnity a very clumsy mode of getting out of the difficulty. Well, if these cases are all covered by the Act of Indemnity, there is no practical grievance of which he can complain; and if they are not all covered—and it is plain that all cannot be, because there are some offices with regard to which the declaration is required to be taken before entering upon their duties—there is a definite declaration on the part of the Legislature and the Parliament of the country that the Church of England is a national Church, and is not to be placed on exactly the same footing and level as all the various other sects which divide the people of this country. The noble Lord has reminded us that we are approaching a general election; and forgetting, I suppose, the audience which he was addressing, asked how we should like to go to the hustings, having rejected this measure? My answer is, that we are not going to the hustings, and that, fortunately, we are independent of that popularis aura of which he is so fond. I venture to believe that the question of whether this Qualification for Offices Abolition Bill passes or not, will not make a difference of twenty votes in favour of or against any single candidate in any constituency of the United Kingdom. But it is, I think, important to remember—and the noble Lord himself will do well to bear it in mind—that, at the approaching election, a very serious question will be raised—namely, how far it is the intention of future Parliaments to maintain the position and status of the Established Church? For I believe there are those who, by the advocacy of a measure like this, are eager to gain credit with the opponents of that Church, and to take advantage of the event of a general election, of which the noble Lord kindly reminds us, for the purpose of acquiring among their future constituents a certain amount of popularity by saying, "See how ardently and eagerly we supported and pressed forward a Bill which is the first step towards the accomplishment of that end" for which the enemies of the Church are striving. The noble Lord has stated that, in his opinion, the Dissenters are daily becoming more reconciled and more friendly to the Church. I heartily wish that such may be the case; and I fully believe that a very large majority of the respectable Dissenters of this country not only feel no objection to take this declaration, although believing it in their consciences to be unnecessary as far as they are concerned, but would be extremely sorry to see the Establishment brought down from the position which it occupies and from the pre-eminence secured to it by law and still more by the affections of the people. On the other hand, I cannot conceal from myself that there is, if not a numerous, a very busy and energetic body ardently desirous of pulling down the Church piecemeal, and every step which the Legislature adopts in the direction to which their wishes point is hailed as a victory. So far from conciliating them for the future, it only makes them eager for further advances. Every instalment granted will be regarded as extorted by force, not yielded from a wish to conciliate, and it will only be made the stepping-stone to further demands. Not, therefore, because I see in the declaration itself any protection to the Established Church, but because a very significant blow would be struck at the Church by the withdrawal of the authoritative declaration on the part of the Legislature contained in this document as to the pre-eminence of the Church, I take the course—and I believe your Lordships will take the course—on the present occasion which has been taken for several Sessions past. I confess I was surprised at hearing the noble Lord say that he was not disposed to bring before your Lordships' House any measure which he thought opposed itself to the fixed opinions or objections of your Lordships. If there be any indication of fixed opinions or objections it might certainly be found in the fact that for five successive Sessions this identical measure has been rejected in this House by considerable majorities. He says it is a matter of grave importance if on any question the two Houses are hopelessly at variance. Well, I cannot see that the variance on this subject, prominent as it has been for several Sessions, appears to have interfered with the friendly relations between the two Houses. It is one of those measures that the House of Commons habitually passes from sheer indifference or weariness, and which the House of Lords would be very glad to see disposed of likewise from sheer weariness; and I do not see that any material inconvenience arises from their mutual difference of action. But if the noble Lord is so anxious that there should be a cordial agreement on every subject between the House of Lords and the House of Commons, would it not be wise to wait and see what the next House of Commons will do upon this subject? He has reminded us himself of the general election, and if the country should return a House of Commons very friendly to the Church, very adverse to those desiring to overthrow it, and therefore very desirous for the retention of this declaration—in that case, if you now pass this Bill, you will be putting yourselves in opposition to, and not in conformity with, the feeling of the House of Commons. In the very last year of a Parliament which has already sat for more than the usual time, I think it would be a matter of extreme imprudence on slight grounds for your Lordships to act upon an opinion, no doubt conscientiously entertained by the present House of Commons, but which may be in direct opposition to the opinion of their successors. My main reason, however, for opposing the Bill is shortly that, although the declaration in itself may be valueless for the protection of the Church, its abolition by the Legislature will be the strongest hint to the Dissenters that they may expect encouragement—which I hope they will never find in your Lordships' House—for making further aggressions on the integrity of the Established Church. I will, in conclusion, move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Six Months.")

LORD EBURY said, the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) seemed to regard the Bill as part of a great scheme of aggression upon the Established Church, although he declared in the same breath that the declaration he was so anxious to retain was not worth the paper it was written on.

THE EARL OF DERBY: Not worth the paper on which it is written for the sake of protecting the Establishment.

LORD EBURY would adopt the correction willingly, though he thought it made little difference in the meaning. As regarded the Test and Corporation Act, the noble Earl had designated the noble Earl (Earl Russell) as the godfather of that Bill; but, in point of fact, he was the person by whom it had been introduced, and therefore he was not only entitled to the credit of being considered its godfather, but to the credit of the absolute paternity of the Bill. He himself was also in the House of Commons at the time, and what occurred was that the Bill having been introduced by Lord John Russell, and the House having declared in its favour by a considerable majority, Sir Robert Peel, always a keen judge of the feeling of Parliament, took the Bill out of the hands of the noble Earl. [Earl Russell here communicated with the noble Lord—who proceeded.] He found that this was not so, and that Earl Russell was entitled to the credit of having carried the measure through. It was rather hard upon his noble Friend and himself—at that time Members of a small minority, and obliged to dress their dishes as best they could so as to make them acceptable to the majority of the House—that any observations with regard to the declaration in question should now be quoted against his noble Friend. And although in some cases Dissenters might not object to the declaration, they had a right, if they thought proper, to regard it as a remnant of the old days of persecution. The noble Earl opposite had said very truly that their Lordships were not going to the hustings. He was sorry they were not, for obviously those who were obliged to present themselves to their constituents were better representatives of the feeling of the country; and the Bill would certainly be passed, because the branch of the Legislature that was elective always passed it. He should be ashamed if the Church to which he belonged rested her claims and privileges on such miserable remnants of protection as the declaration which the Bill sought to remove. He should be ashamed of belonging to that Church if she had no higher title to the position which she occupied; and, on the other hand, he considered the Church bound to show the greatest possible generosity towards the Non-Conformist body of this country.

On Question, That ("now") stand Part of the Motion? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 49; Not-Contents 72: Majority 23:—Resolved in the Negative; and Bill to be read 2<sup>d</sup> on ("this Day Six Months.")

THE NATIONAL GALLERY—MR. FRITH'S
"DERBY DAY."—QUESTION.

MR. GREGORY said, he would beg to ask the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Thomas Baring), as Trustee to the National Gallery, Whether a Picture belonging to the Nation has been sent to Australia, whether the person who sent that Picture had a right to do so; and, if not, what steps the Trustees of the National Gallery are about to take?

MR. THOMAS BARING, in reply, said, his hon. Friend had no doubt seen in The Times newspaper an explanation of this matter by Mr. Gambart. With regard to the Trustees of the National Gallery the simple fact was, Mr. Jacob Bell, who died in 1859, very generously bequeathed certain pictures to the nation, and among them was the "Derby Day" painted by the celebrated artist, Mr. Frith. Before his death, Mr. Bell made an arrangement with Mr. Gambart by which this picture should remain in his possession for a certain term of years for the purpose of exhibition and engraving. At the end of that term in June, 1864, the Trustees of the National Gallery wrote to the executors of the late Mr. Bell, asking them why the picture was not delivered, and the reply was, that Mr. Gambart had said that he had a right to the picture for another year for exhibition, and he had sent it to Australia, but had promised it should return in August. It was very clear that the Trustees of the National Gallery could have no control over the picture until it was delivered to them by the executors, who were the only people with whom the Trustees could communicate. About six weeks ago the whole circumstances of the case were sent to the Treasury and submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown to ascertain what proceedings, if any, should be adopted.

QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether further Papers respecting proceedings in China will be laid upon the table of the House; whether the Consul at Amoy has reported his visit to the Taeping Chief at Chang-chow, and with what results; and whether information has reached the Foreign Office of the reported revolt of the Imperialist Troops in the cities of Hang-chow and Chang-chow, with the rumoured connivance of Tsing-kwo-fan, the anti-foreign Minister of State?

MR. LAYARD replied, that there were no papers of sufficient importance to lay on the table. They were aware of the intention of the Consul at Amoy to visit the Taeping Chief, but his Report on the subject had not yet been received. No information had reached the Foreign Office respecting the reported revolt of the Imperial Troops in the cities referred to by the hon. and gallant Member.

NEWINGTON GREEN AND HORNSEY ROAD.—QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the state of the road lying between Newington Green and Hornsey, and whether he is aware that the duty of keeping in repair this road is a disputed point between the parishes of Hornsey and Islington?

MR. THOMAS BARING, in reply, said, it was quite true representations had been made as to the state of this road, and the dangers arising to the public from its bad state of repair, and the police had as far as possible diverted the traffic by another way in order to prevent accidents. The repair of the road was a very small matter, costing about £40 per annum, and it was to be hoped that the two parishes concerned would come to some arrangement between themselves to repair the road, and thereby remedy the inconvenience to the public, without the necessity of resorting to legal proceedings.

INDIA—THE SIXTY-FOURTH FOOT.

QUESTION.

GENERAL BUCKLEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Why the detachment of the 64th Foot, consisting of five or six officers and 200 men (who, being part of the Lucknow Garrison, were shut up in the Alum Bagh from October to November, 1857, when they were relieved by Sir Colin Campbell), have been deprived of the second donation batta, which has been received by the rest of the regiment who were in Lucknow? This detachment has received the year's pay, and the second donation batta was first allowed, but has since been refused.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, in reply, that the service performed by the different portions of the regiment were of a totally different character. One part was shut up in the garrison of Lucknow, and exposed to all the hardships, risks, and dangers which were well known by all, whereas the other detachment to which his hon. and gallant Friend referred was never in Lucknow at all, but in the Alum Bagh, some distance off, and was not exposed to the same hardships. The second donation batta was first allowed under a misapprehension, believing that the detachment had been in the garrison of Lucknow, whereas they had no communication with it, except by spies and deserters, and they were not cut off from communication with the rest of the army, their rear being open to Cawnpore. They were never exposed to serious hardships or privations. The Government of India had expressed a strong opinion upon the subject, and they were not only the judges on the spot of the services rendered, but also the parties by whom the allowance was given.

THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT—TEA.

QUESTION.

MR. J. B. SMITH said, in reference to the reduction of the Duty on Tea, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will allow a drawback; and whether, if not, he will extend the time when the reduction will come into operation?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, with regard to the first question asked by my hon. Friend, whether a drawback will be allowed upon stocks of tea which would have, by some process quite unknown to our usages, to be ascertained as being in the possession of every retail grocer throughout the country, I may say that to allow such a drawback would be entirely foreign to the usage and the practice of Parliament, and I very much doubt, if such drawback were allowed, whether it would be possible for us to proceed with the reduction of the Income Tax by 2*d*. Under these circumstances, I hope that the subject will not be renewed. The time for the reduction of the Tea Duty will be decided according to the pleasure of the House. I propose on Thursday evening next to proceed with a Resolution upon this subject, and supposing it receives the consent of the Committee, the usual course is to report the Resolution to the House on the following evening, and for the reduction of the duty to come into operation the day after. It is, of course, in the power of the House to fix the time when the reduction should come into operation, or to interpose any time they may think proper between the sitting of the Committee, and the reporting the Resolution to the House. My hon. Friend asks me if we will agree to insert in the Resolution some clause providing that the reduction of the duty should come into operation at some distant period. I am sorry to answer my hon. Friend in the negative. If we did, I believe the effect would not be to remedy the inconvenience which I grant may in some instances be felt from the alteration of Customs like this—an inconvenience, too, which I should really be very glad to remedy if I could—but to cause a general paralysis of the trade and revenue in connection with tea. The buyer and the householder would postpone their purchases, the trade would be paralyzed, and the object desired by these gentlemen would not be attained. We, therefore, intend to adhere to the usual course, and to propose that the reduction of the duty shall take immediate effect. I wish now to remedy an omission of which I was guilty the other evening when making my financial statement. That omission related to the Bill for the renewal of the Income Tax, and I should have mentioned that in the discussion on the subject last year my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard) pointed out a great defect in the working of what is known as the 133rd, or the Average Clause. By that clause, as it now stands, it may be possible for parties who have made any exceptional gain in any one particular year to exempt those exceptional gains from taxation. We shall propose a clause for curing this anomaly, and for bringing in those gains for the purpose of assessment.

MR. J. B. SMITH said, he wished to know, whether, on a previous occasion, when the duty on tea was reduced, the time had not been extended until July?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I believe that I may confidently answer the question in the negative.

ASSASSINATION OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

ADDRESS MOVED.

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, I very much regret the unavoidable absence of my noble Friend at the head of the Government, in whose name the notice was given of the Motion which it now devolves upon me to ask the House to agree to. I feel, however, that it is comparatively unimportant by whom the Motion is proposed, because I am confident that the Address to the Crown which I am about to ask the House to agree to is one which will meet with the cordial and unanimous assent of the House. When the news a few days ago of the assassination of the President of the United States, and of the attempted assassination—for I hope we may now confidently expect that it will not have been a successful attempt—of Mr. Seward reached this country, the first impression in the mind of every one was that the intelligence could not be true. It was hoped by every one that persons could not be found capable of committing so atrocious a crime. But when the truth was forced upon us, when we could no longer entertain any doubt as to the correctness of the intelligence, the feeling which succeeded was one of universal sorrow, horror, and indignation. It was felt as if some great calamity had befallen ourselves. In the Civil War, the existence and the long continuance of which we have so sincerely deplored, it is well known that the Government of this country, acting, as I believe, in accordance with the almost unanimous feeling of this country, has maintained a strict and impartial neutrality. But it is notorious, and it could not in a great country like this be otherwise, that different opinions have been entertained by different persons with regard to the question at issue between the Northern and Southern States of America. I believe that the sympathies of the majority of the people of this country have been with the North. [Cries of "No, no!" and "Hear, hear!"] I am desirous, on this occasion, of avoiding everything which may excite any difference of opinion. I may say, therefore, that in this free country different opinions have been entertained, and different sympathies felt, and that the freest expression has been given, as it is right should be the case, to those differences of opinion. I am sure I shall raise no controversy when I say that, in the presence of that great crime which has sent a thrill of horror through every one who heard of it, all difference of opinion, all conflicting sympathies for the moment, entirely vanish. I am anxious to say at once, and I desire to proclaim that belief with the strongest confidence, that this atrocious crime is regarded by every man of influence, position, and public estimation in the Southern States with the same degree of horror which it has excited in every other part of the world. We may, therefore—and this is all I wish to say upon this subject—whatever our opinions, and whatever our sympathies, cordially unite in expressing our abhorrence of the crime, as well as in tendering our sympathy to the nation now mourning the loss of its chosen and trusted chief, struck to the ground by the hand of an assassin, and that, too, at the most critical period of its history. Sir, while lamenting that war, and the loss of life inevitably occasioned by it, it is impossible, whatever our opinions or our sympathies, to withhold our admiration from the many gallant deeds performed, and acts of heroism displayed, by both parties in the contest; and it is a matter for painful reflection, that the page of history, recording such gallant achievements, and such heroic deeds, by men who have freely shed their blood on the battle-field in the cause which each considered right, should also be stained with the record of a crime such as we are now deploring. A new era appeared to be dawning, and the time had come when there was reason to hope that the war would speedily be brought to a close. Victory had crowned the efforts of the statesmen and the armies of the Federals, and most of us—all I hope—had turned with a feeling of relief and some hope for the future from the nar-

ative of sanguinary conflicts to that correspondence which had recently passed between the Generals commanding the hostile armies, the character of which was equally honourable to each of those distinguished men, and all eyes were turned to Mr. Lincoln, with the hope and expectation—and I have reason to believe that that expectation would not have been disappointed—that in the hour of victory and in the use of victory he would have shown a wise forbearance, a generous consideration, which would have added tenfold lustre to the fame and reputation which he had acquired by his firmness of purpose and persevering steadfastness throughout the varying fortunes of this war. Unhappily the foul deed which has taken place has deprived Mr. Lincoln of the opportunity of thus adding to his well-earned fame and reputation; but we may hope, indeed we may expect, that the good sense and right feeling of those upon whom will devolve the arduous and difficult duties of the administration of affairs in this conjuncture, and their respect and veneration, the wishes and the memory of him whom they are mourning, will lead them to act in the same spirit and to follow the same counsels by which we have good reason to believe the conduct of Mr. Lincoln would have been guided, had he survived to complete the work in which he was engaged. Sir, I believe I am only expressing the general opinion when I say that nothing could give greater satisfaction to this country than that by means of generous forbearance, and of wise conciliation, the Union of the North and South should be again accomplished; especially if it can be accomplished by common consent, freed from what has heretofore constituted the weakness of that Union—the curse and disgrace of slavery. I wish it were possible for us to convey to the people of the United States an adequate idea of the depth and universality of the feeling which this sad event has occasioned in this country. From the highest to the lowest there has been but one feeling entertained. Her Majesty's Minister at Washington will, in obedience to the Queen's command, convey to the Government of the United States the expression of the feelings of Her Majesty and of her Government upon this deplorable event; and Her Majesty, with that tender consideration which she has always evinced for sorrow and suffering in others, of whatever rank, has, with her own hand, written a letter to Mrs. Lincoln, conveying the heartfelt sympathy of a widow to a widow under the terrible calamity with which she has been so suddenly overwhelmed. From every part of this country, from every class, but one voice has been heard, one of abhorrence of the crime, and of sympathy for and interest in the country which has this great loss to mourn. The British residents in the United States, as of course was to be expected, lost not an hour in expressing their sympathy with the Government of the United States, and the people of our North American colonies are vying with each other in the expression of the same sentiments. And it is not only among men of the same race who are connected with the people of the United States by origin, language and blood, that these feelings prevail, but I believe that every country in Europe is giving expression to the same sentiments and sending the same message of sympathy to the Government of the United States. I am sure, therefore, that I am not wrong in anticipating that this House will, in the name of the people of England, of Scotland, and of Ireland, be anxious to record their expression of this sentiment, and a desire to have it conveyed to the Government of the United States. Of this I am confident, that this House could never more fully and more adequately represent the feelings of the whole of the inhabitants of the United Kingdom than by agreeing to the Address which it is now my duty to move, expressing to Her Majesty our sorrow and indignation at the assassination of the President of the United States, and praying Her Majesty that, in communicating her own sentiments to the Government of that country upon this deplorable event, she will express at the same time, on the part of this House, their abhorrence of the crime, and their sympathy with the Government and the people of the United States in the deep affliction in which they are involved.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, there are rare instances when the sympathy of a nation approaches those tenderer feelings that, generally speaking, are supposed to be peculiar to the individual, and to form the happy privilege of private life; and this is one.

Under all circumstances we should have bewailed the catastrophe at Washington; under all circumstances we should have shuddered at the means by which it was accomplished. But in the character of the victim, and even in the accessories of his last moments, there is something so homely and so innocent that it takes as it were the subject out of all the pomp of history and the ceremonial of diplomacy; it touches the heart of nations, and appeals to the domestic sentiment of mankind.

Sir, whatever the various and varying opinions in this House and the country generally on the policy of the late President of the United States, on this, I think, all must agree, that in one of the severest trials which ever tested the moral qualities of man, he fulfilled his duty with simplicity and strength. Nor is it possible for the people of England, at such a moment, to forget that he sprang from the same fatherland, and spoke the same mother tongue.

When such crimes are perpetrated the public mind is apt to fall into gloom and perplexity; for it is ignorant alike of the causes and the consequences of such deeds. But it is one of our duties to re-assure the country under unreasoning panic or despondency. Assassination has never changed the history of the world. I will not refer to the remote past, although an accident has made the most memorable example of antiquity, at this moment fresh in the mind and memory of all present. But even the costly sacrifice of a Cæsar did not propitiate the inexorable destiny of his country. If we look to modern times, to times at least with the feelings of which we are familiar, and the people of which were animated and influenced by the same interests as ourselves, the violent deaths of two heroic men, Henry IV. of France, and the Prince of Orange, are conspicuous illustrations of this truth.

In expressing our unaffected and profound sympathy with the citizens of the United States at the untimely end of their elected Chief, let us not, therefore, sanction any feeling of depression, but rather let us express a fervent hope that from out the awful trials of the last four years, of which not the least is this violent demise, the various populations of North America may issue elevated and chastened; rich in that accumulated wisdom, and strong in that disciplined energy which a young nation can only acquire in a protracted and perilous struggle. Then they will be enabled not merely to renew their career of power and prosperity, but they will renew it to contribute to the general happiness of mankind. It is with these feelings, Sir, that I now second the Address to the Crown.

Resolved, Nemine Contradicente,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to convey to Her Majesty the expression of the deep sorrow and indignation with which this House has learned the Assassination of the President of the United States of America; and to pray Her Majesty that, in communicating Her own sentiments on this deplorable event to the Government of the United States, Her Majesty will also be graciously pleased to express on the part of Her faithful Commons their abhorrence of the crime, and their sympathy with the Government and People of the United States.

To be presented by Privy Councillors.

BANK NOTES ISSUE (re-committed) BILL.
[BILL 75.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, as some modifications have been made in this Bill, perhaps it will be as well that I should describe how it stands at present. The starting point, I think, in any discussion of this character, must be the Act of 1844, previous to which we were in a chaos of unsound principles and dangerous practice. That Act, however, laid down a complete system for the regulation of the issue of paper money. The principles on which it proceeded were four—first, that the paper money of the country should proceed from one single source; secondly, that the issue of that paper money is the prerogative of the Crown, consequently, that the profit attaching to it should form a legitimate portion of the public revenue. In the third place, that it is the duty of the State to see that the paper money was so secured to the noteholder that it might be accepted in the manner in which paper money is intended to circulate without doubt or question, and with perfect security against loss on the part of those who might so accept it. The fourth condition of the issue of paper money is that which is most clearly expressed in the Act itself—that an absolute and rigid limit should be placed upon the issue of that paper money except so far as it is adequately secured by being represented by a corresponding amount of bullion. Of these four objects the last is absolutely and finally secured by the Act of 1844. The object of this measure is distinct. We desire to place Parliament, so far as the issue from a single source is concerned, in such a position that it will be able, after the expiration of a moderate time, to deal with these questions freely and without prejudice. We do not ask Parliament to announce the adoption of any principle, or to add anything in that respect to what was done by the Act of 1844. With regard to the other two questions contemplated by the Act of 1844, as attendant upon the normal system of issue—namely, that the issue of bank note paper should be productive of revenue, and that the payment of the notes should be secured to the holder, our view is somewhat different. Under the present system of issue it has been found that the machinery provided by the Act of 1844 for the purpose of absorbing private issues has to a great degree failed. If the process of absorption were to go on at the same rate only at which it has proceeded for the last twenty-one years, some centuries must elapse before it is completed. It is not desirable obviously to postpone the object of the Act for so long a period, and as regards the productiveness of the issues to the revenue it is plain that under the law as it at present stands that principle is rather acknowledged than carried into effect. The amount paid by the issuers of private bank notes was an acknowledgment, perhaps, of the principle, but it was an acknowledgment within limits so narrow, amounting between the payment for composition and the payment for licences to less than one-half per cent, that it should be regarded as but a very partial application of the principle. It is provided by the Act of 1844 that, as private issues are absorbed after the payment of a regulated compensation, which was supposed would only endure for a limited number of years, the whole profits of these issues should pass to the State; but the proportion of issues that have lapsed has been so moderate that very limited effect has been given to that principle. We propose by the present Bill that for a term of years, which will be fixed, as far as regards the banks which may conform to this Bill, a payment of £1 per cent shall be substituted for the present payment of 7s. per cent, together with a certain moderate annual charge for licences on the issue of notes not very easy to calculate. Larger profits might have been asked for, but the main object of the Bill is not so much to open an additional source of revenue during the term of years specified as to fix a point at which Parliament should be at liberty to deal with all the points which appertain to the soundness and security of the system of the issuing of bank notes. I have, therefore, no scruple in asking for a reduction of the percentage which we at first required. There is another point in regard to which it is still more important that Parliament should adopt a measure which would place it in a position to act freely in these matters, and that is the question of the security of the noteholder. There is no occasion to speak either of the high character borne by the private issuers in general or the prudence of their transactions ordinarily, but at the same time painful instances which occur from time to time remind us of our duty to contemplate a system of complete security of bank issue. One instance in particular of recent date, and which it is not necessary to name, has tended to bring the subject home to the public mind. The object of this Bill is not so much to obtain immediately any great end as to lay the foundation experimentally of a system under which, so far as regards the issues of the banks which may accept the provisions of the Bill, it shall be brought easily and by a quiet process of voluntary operation within the power of Parliament to deal satisfactorily with the important subject of private issues. I may be asked, what is to be the position of the banks which will come under the Bill, and what is to be the position of those which will not come under the Bill? With regard to those banks which come under the Bill, it would be impossible to give them any rights beyond those which will be conferred upon them provisionally, and which will determine with this Bill. Anything beyond that belongs to the great and important subject of the regulation of the principle of issue; and my desire is satisfied, provided we shall secure for Parliament, as I think we shall secure for it by this Bill, a free, unbiassed, and untrammelled consideration of that subject at some time—a time which will come some years hence. When that time arrives we shall have before us the principle on which our great bank statutes are framed. If we are not satisfied with them, it will be in our power to go upon another system; but if, as I believe will turn out to be the case, those statutes are vindicated by experience, it will be our duty to extend them and give them a further operation. I think we may readily see that this Bill will place these banks under no disadvantage as regards the other banks. If, when the operation of this Bill shall have come to a termination, it be the pleasure of Parliament to establish a single issue, as far as the privilege of these banks is concerned; that privilege ceases, and Parliament will be perfectly free to deal without embarrassment with the whole question. In respect to the other banks, Parliament will have to deal as it thinks fit, and I do not think that those privileged banks will be dealt less favourably with than the others. But so far as regards those banks which do not conform, considerable anxiety has been felt by members of the banking body, and I have endeavoured on the part of Her Majesty's Government to meet it by a proviso, which I propose to insert in the 6th clause. I do not conceive that by this Bill we shall establish any new right of the State as against those banks which think fit to conform, and on the other hand we shall not establish any new rights of those banks as against the State. The relations between them and the State are regulated by the Act of 1844, and by that Act they will continue to be regulated. I am led to believe that a very considerable number of the issuing banks will avail themselves of the privilege of this Bill; but whether they do or do not, is not the question. Those which do not will continue in their present position, but without the privilege. We know what that is. The Act of 1844 did not secure them the privilege and issue for any definite term, except it was for a term which long ago expired. At any time Parliament thinks fit it is free to legislate with respect to all the private banks of issue. Free to legislate it will still continue; bound to legislate it will not be. With regard to the two conditions of issue—first, the question of profit to the State, and next the security to the noteholder—in neither does the Bill at once attain its object. The payment to the State is smaller than what the Bank of England pays, and smaller still than that which it has offered to pay. Then, as to security to the note-holder, I think that the obvious and natural operation of the Bill will be that, under the power of transfer in it, the weaker banks will sell the privilege which they possess, and stronger banks will buy it; therefore the position of the noteholder will be improved, even during the term of the Bill. But I do not say that on either points—especially that of security to the noteholder—the Bill establishes a final system. I do not think it would have been possible in any Session since I have held office—certainly not in the present Session—to carry by a summary Act of Legislation the establishment at once of a compulsory and final system; and that being so, I am glad to aim at doing that which other financiers have been content to do before—namely, by the voluntary action of the parties, and by the adoption of intermediate and provisional measures, to lay the ground for coming nearer to the objects which all legislation on the currency ought to have in view. I think that by this Bill we do not give any shock to private rights or private interests, nor any shock to private feelings or private wishes. As regards the Bill in its original form, it is true that apprehensions which I thought needless were entertained. With regard to the present Bill, a document had been drawn up by a Committee representing the views entertained by a meeting of the whole issuing body of the country—by the joint-stock issuers and those who may more properly be called private issuers. In this document, which bears date the 31st of April, and is signed by Mr. Rodwell as hon. Secretary, the Committee state that, acting under the authority given them by a public meeting on the 19th of April, they unanimously approved the proposed Amendments and alterations in the Bill, and withdrew their opposition to it as altered and amended in accordance with the notices which I have placed on the table. Under these circumstances I hope there will be a general disposition on the part of the House to accept and adopt this Bill as one which removes many existing evils, and which, with regard to the re-construction or final determination of our system of issue in this country, opens and prepares the way, and clears the ground, for a final settlement of the question. It must not be forgotten that the prime object of the Bill is the removal of the limitations placed on the private business of the banks—not on the business of issue but on that of banking. The framers of the Act of 1844, which was wisely and prudently constructed for its objects, finding in existence privileges which they were not willing to recognize as a permanent right, but which they did not think it fitting peremptorily to terminate, left those privileges to the holders, under certain penalties which did not apply to issuing only, but to their trade as bankers. They were not to be permitted to have more than a certain number of partners; they were not to be allowed to do that which in the progress of monetary transactions has become a matter of great importance—namely, to transact their own business in London, even though it might appear to them that they could do so better than others could do it for them. This Bill, then, is a measure tending to that freedom of trade which we all agree in thinking desirable; and with respect to issue it is a preparatory and partial measure, doing good as far as it goes, and opening the ground for doing more good hereafter. I hope the House will accept it as modified; and with these prefatory remarks, I move that you, Sir, do leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

MR. AYRTON said, that when this subject was first brought under the notice of the House by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it appeared to him that some further information from the right hon. Gentleman was desirable, and he put a notice on the paper with the object of eliciting that information. He had listened attentively to the right hon. Gentleman on the present occasion; but he could not say that he was satisfied with the explanation which he had given the House with reference to the Bill, or to the Act of 1844 which was at the root of the matter. If the right hon. Gentleman's explanation of that Act were strictly accurate there might be sufficient apology for this Bill; but if the explanation were incomplete a great deal of the foundation of this measure must fall to the ground. Previously to the Act of 1844 private bankers possessed the right of issuing their own notes without limit, except in that part of the kingdom purposely reserved to the Bank of England. The Parliament of that day, not wishing to deprive them suddenly of a right which had grown up during a long course of years, entered into a contract with them by which they were to enjoy their monopoly for a further period of twelve years, on the distinct understanding that such extension was to be regarded as an ample compensation for the rights of which they were then to be deprived. This contract was the whole scope and object of the Act of 1844, so far as he understood it. The provision in that Act declaring that all compensations by the Bank of England to private bankers should terminate at the expiration of the twelve years clearly showed that the extension of the private

bankers' monopoly was limited to that period, and that the exclusive right of issue during that period was to be the measure of their compensation. If that were the right construction of the Act, at the end of the twelve years the bankers, who had enjoyed this extraordinary and exclusive privilege during that period, had no claim upon the House in respect of the abolition of their rights. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer said it was the intention of the Legislature, in passing that Act, that at the end of the twelve years there should be but one exclusive source of issue, and he rather suggested that such exclusive source was to be the Bank of England. There was no foundation for such a surmise in the Act itself; then whence did the right hon. Gentleman derive his information relative to the intention of Parliament on the subject? For his own part, the inference he drew from the Act was that Parliament never intended that the Bank of England should be the sole source of issue. But, in any case, what was the position of the private bankers when the period assigned had elapsed? Why, the public were involved in the complexities of the Russian war, and in the face of those difficulties it was not found convenient to deal with the matter, which was accordingly allowed to stand over from year to year, and thus the bankers had enjoyed ten years of grace after the expiration of the extension granted. Was it possible, under such circumstances, to say that they had any claim whatever to the monopoly of the issue of bank notes? That was the question for the House to determine, and, unfortunately, that was the one point to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not alluded. What possible right had the private bankers to ask the House to grant them the exclusive right of issuing paper money in this country for fifteen years longer? The Chancellor of the Exchequer was bound to show that they were about to confer some extraordinary benefit upon the country, in return for the extension of the monopoly asked; but it rather appeared from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman that the benefit would be on the other side, and that the public were to be sacrificed for the good of the bankers. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was, however, entitled to ask any person objecting to his scheme what other proposition was to be brought forward in its place. There were two methods which might be adopted. In the first place, it might be said that the right of issuing paper money was common to all persons in the realm, and that one man had as good a right to issue it as another; that it was not an affair of the nation, and connected with the current coin of the realm, but a species of credit which every man had a right to enjoy, consistent with the liberty accorded to the subjects of the State. If they could devise a scheme in which any number of select and favoured people should issue bank notes, they could devise a scheme under which all persons could issue them. A scheme founded upon that assumption was, doubtless, open to very serious objections, still regulations might be adopted which would meet them in a large measure, and would afford sufficient security to the public against a false and fraudulent issue of paper money. In this era of free trade Parliament had no right to adopt this entirely new system of legislation, and to sell such a monopoly to a certain number of persons. If they adopted the measure as it stood, they would be reverting to the times when it was the fashion to legislate in favour of particular classes—a fashion which led to the adoption of the system of protection. This was not a question between Government and the bankers, but between the public, on the one hand, and the claimants of this exclusive privilege on the other. Then what claim had the bankers upon the public? They had not been stricken down as a large proportion of our population had been—the unfortunate victims of free trade—they were not in dire want, for they were the richest among the community; in fact, on no ground whatever could they ask Parliament to continue this unparalleled monopoly. The second view which might be taken of the subject was that no private banks should issue paper money. That view might be a very reasonable one, for it might be policy for the State to issue exclusively paper money as well as coin. That was a principle which it might be very easy to defend, and which might be carried out in all its integrity. But the Bill before the House adopted neither of these principles. Instead of carrying out the policy of Sir Robert Peel it postponed that policy for fifteen years longer. The payment at present made by the bankers was in the nature of a stamp duty on bills of exchange, whereas that now proposed was a consideration for an exclusive monopoly. They now proposed to grant to these private bankers the right of issue for a term, for which they were to pay a rent of £1 per cent. This was a most objectionable proceeding. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated that if this Bill were passed no injustice would be done to those banks which did not come under its operation. But the practical effect of this Bill would be to suspend all legislation on the subject of banking and the issue of paper for the period of fifteen years. The present Session, the last of this Parliament, was peculiarly inopportune for the consideration of a question affecting so favourably a class of the community who were most influential at a general election. It was, therefore, extremely desirable that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should postpone this matter, and bring forward next year a comprehensive measure more worthy of his antecedents. He had heard with great regret the apologetic speech made by the right hon. Gentleman for these chartered monopolists. He had evidently found how difficult it was to conciliate monopolists having once fallen into their hands. He first of all told the House he should get a percentage of £2 5s. per annum for the privilege he had to dispose of under this Bill; then it fell to £1 5s.; and it was now down to £1. Such was the state of the auction in which he was exposing the public interests. It was, indeed, most lamentable. Far better withdraw the commodity altogether and wait for a better opportunity. Regarding the Bill with unqualified regret and with great disapprobation, he moved that its consideration be adjourned for one month.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day month, resolve itself into the said Committee," — (Mr. Ayrton,) — instead thereof.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, that he objected to the mode adopted of selling at that time of day privileges to any class of persons whatsoever. He believed that every one admitted that the Act of 1844 was a very wise measure, but they still might question some of the reasons on which that measure was supported. The Bill before them had two objects in view.

One of them was to remove the restriction limiting private issuers to the number of six partners. That limitation was a part of the old monopoly of the Bank of England—long since abandoned by them—and was of no use to the public or to bankers themselves. Nothing was more desirable than that restriction should be removed. Another object of the Bill was not to limit country issues, but to extend them by allowing country issuers to become bankers in London, which they could not be at present. The right hon. Gentleman wished to remove that which he called an anomaly in the interest of free trade, and told the country issuers that if they paid 25s. and a commuted sum of £1 per cent he would give them the privilege of being bankers in London. But the right hon. Gentleman did not propose, as in the Act of 1844, that security should be given to the public for such issues. If they were to legislate at all for the country issuer, they ought to take a larger view of the question than had been taken by the right hon. Gentleman, and give increased security to the public while they extended the business of the bankers.

MR. CAVE said, he would not oppose the Bill at this stage, but he should like to say a few words, because, in fact, the principle of the Bill had never been discussed. On the second reading the House immediately rushed into a debate on the Act of 1844, from which, when once begun, it was always hopeless to recall it. Now, he thought this Bill required grave consideration, and that a more ample discussion of its provisions was necessary than was possible after going into Committee. He did not object to banks of issue having offices in London; that was a question between themselves and their agents, and not one of public policy. He was glad the Chancellor of the Exchequer had determined at length to maintain the sixty-five mile limit with regard to issues. His first proposal would have given these banks an unfair advantage over those which had not the same privilege, and, independently of profit, would have enabled them to advertise themselves, as it were, by means of their issues. If, according to Sir Robert Peel's statement, the withdrawal of private circulation within that limit would not have been felt in 1844 in consequence of the general use of Bank of England notes, still less would it be felt now, and surely we should legislate according to the requirements of the country, and not on the principle of making money by the sale of privileges, which would really be privilegium in the bad sense condemned by writers on old Roman law. Whatever might be the intention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Bill, even as amended, was a grave interference with the Act of 1844. The late Sir Robert Peel, the author of that Act, was one of those statesmen "who still rule our spirits from their urns," and it was almost treason to doubt many of his doctrines; but he never succeeded in convincing the country of the policy of the Act of 1844. Indeed, it was one of those questions, like matters of faith, on which it was easier to silence an opponent than to convince them. And on this particular point of paper issues there had always been a party which considered that bank notes should be left to the ordinary laws of supply and demand; that you should indeed insist upon the convertibility of the note, but exact no security, except, perhaps, in case of the Bank of England note, which was the sole legal tender. But the Chancellor was supposed to agree with the principles of Sir Robert Peel's Act, and to consider that the holder of a country bank note was not always sufficiently protected. He took, however, a very different course. Sir Robert Peel was anxious to get rid of the private issues, but he was opposed to violent change, and wished them to die a natural death. Hence he prohibited transfer of right to issue, and forbade any change in the constitution of the partnership, but though he specially stated he could not guarantee the continuance of the right, he fixed no limit. He proceeded rather by temptation to surrender the right; by insuring division and preventing combination, and by other disabilities which made the right burdensome. Certainly the effect was not so speedy as he had anticipated from various causes. Still the circulation, which was eight millions, was now reduced practically to six, and the midland counties had nearly abandoned the use of country paper. The Chancellor, with the same end in view, took an entirely opposite method. He seemed to think that division was strength, he therefore gave existing banks the power of concentrating, and fixed a time for their circulation coming to a sudden and violent end. Now, the first effect of this would be an increase in the issue of private bank paper, and in this way. Banks of issue were at present obliged to allow a considerable margin to avoid the penalty for over issue, so that while the authorized issue was seven and a half millions, the actual issue was under six; but if this right were concentrated in a few large banks, the necessary margin would be much diminished. Again, the private issues would be introduced into new places, and when people had become familiarized with them, they would be suddenly stopped, which was calculated to create the maximum of inconvenience. This was supposing the right would really terminate in fifteen years; but, long as this lease was—though shorter than the original proposal—how could they be sure of its termination? The right hon. Gentleman had on a former occasion given them his idea of the flexibility of Parliamentary compacts, and this might be changed one way or the other in a similar manner. There were minor details in the Bill which seemed objectionable. If the object was to throw open the traffic in issues, why not admit those banks which had not now the right to a participation? He thought the scheduled banks had reason to complain, as they had been induced to surrender a right which they might have parted with under this measure on far more advantageous terms. He had ventured, when the Chancellor made his preliminary statement, to question the propriety of making the right to issue an asset in the case of bankruptcy, and the reply of the right hon. Gentleman, that it was in the nature of a lease, had not convinced him; for, though a lease might, no doubt, be transferred, and was therefore a quasi-property, still, on certain contingencies, it became absolutely void and valueless. He was glad the Chancellor had now adopted the same opinion. The changes announced by the right hon. Gentleman were decided improvements, but he thought others were necessary. Several amendments were on the notice paper, and he earnestly hoped the Bill would not be adopted without the greatest caution and such other modifications as might be necessary to prevent the mischief which, in its present state, he feared it might occasion.

MR. NEATE said, on reference to the Act of 1844, he could not find any authority to support what had been stated by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton), that the private banks had a right to continue their issues under that Act. The object of the Act was to extinguish altogether the circulation of the private banks so far as it could be done consistently with right. The Parliament maintained its right to stop the issue, but not without compensation. The limit of the Act of 1844, as regarded the Bank of England, was ten years, but he did not say that that limit attached also to the rights of private issue. The private banks would go on from year to year till Parliament should choose to stop them, and Parliament would not stop them without taking their claims into consideration. The hope was that this circulation would gradually die out, and in order to increase that prospect the rights of transfer were denied, and no provision was made for the continuance of the right in the case of a certain number of partners being admitted. He could not say that the private bankers were in any worse position now than shortly after the passing of the Bank Act. If immediately after the passing of that Act, Parliament had exercised its extreme authority, great injustice would have been done to the private issuer.

MR. BLACK said, this was so vital a question to the interests of this country that the House would not be doing justice to it by dealing with it in any partial or special way. There were a great many different opinions upon the system proposed by the Bill. All such matters ought to be submitted to the consideration of a body composed of the most experienced merchants and of those best acquainted with political economy and who understood most thoroughly the system of banking. Before any plan was adopted the Bill should be remitted to a Committee to consider what ought to be done. The main object of the Bill was very proper. It was intended, as he understood, to give facilities to those who dealt in money, and to merchants who were bankers, and who were at present restricted from having places of business in London. He could not see why bankers in the country should be prevented from having places of business in London, or what objection could be urged against adding to the number of partners those who were, perhaps, better qualified to manage the business than others, and thereby give greater security to the public. The object of the Bill, therefore, was good so far as it went in this respect, and ought to be supported by the House. There was another object of the Bill, that the whole of the paper issues should be confined to the Bank of England, or to some national bank. That was obviously the tendency of the Bill. It was dangerous to make any alteration in a matter of such vital importance without first making every inquiry into the circumstances of the case, and he thought the question ought to be thoroughly examined into by a Committee who were qualified to look into the matter. He denied that banks ought to be intrusted with freedom in paper issue as there was freedom in other departments of business, because while the latter was an affair of trade, the former would in reality be nothing more or less than coining money.

MR. HEYGATE said, he was of opinion that, while this measure had conciliated a few, it had excited opposition in many different quarters for many different reasons. The settlement which had already been come to by the House of Commons, by the Act of 1844, ought not to have been departed from unless that departure were called for by strong reasons of public necessity, and he would submit that in the present case the reasons adduced in support of a change were not sufficiently strong. A few applications from banks complaining of the restrictions under which they laboured might possibly have been made to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but one or two applications were not sufficient to warrant their dealing with a subject so large and comprehensive in its character. In his own locality he might venture to say that the present measure had been received by all the country bankers with whom he had communicated with the most unmitigated feeling of distrust and dislike. They were perfectly satisfied with the Act of 1844.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, he could not see that the Act of 1844 was carried out or furthered in any way by the present measure. It would, on the contrary, rather retard the object which the Act sought to accomplish. There could be no doubt that by the spirit of that Act, Parliament was considered at liberty to deal with the question in 1855. A Bill was then introduced to render that Act permanent, subject only to a notice for its discontinuance. As the Chancellor of the Exchequer had explained, the intention of Sir Robert Peel and of the Act of 1844 was that there should be one issue within a limited time. He contemplated the final extinction of country issues, and that there should be one issue, but whether of a national bank or of other banks in England was a question to be considered by the Government of the day. But there was to be one bank based on the great principle of undeniable security, which had never been obtained up to that time. The principle, however, had never been carried out, because Sir Robert Peel had found the country bankers' interest in the House too strong for him, and he was unable to carry out what was a sound principle; therefore he carried out a part of it, holding out a hope that at the end of ten years the thing would finally end. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had shown that this was a slow process, but that was no reason why they should depart from a beneficial principle. He objected to giving another lease of fifteen years to country issues. He should like to see them put an end to. But if that was the desire, he hoped the present Bill would not be passed. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer were in office fifteen years hence he should be content to leave the matter in his hands; but that might not be. Let disabilities be removed, but he hoped the House would not perpetuate for fifteen years what appeared to be a most vicious principle. He should have no fear to let matters go on as they were; but if there was to be legislation at all, it ought to be to carry out the principles of the Act of 1844, which were to limit issues, to give security for the note, and to have one bank of issue only.

COLONEL EDWARDS said, that country bankers looked upon this measure as an act of confiscation—as much an act of confiscation as it would be to take a man's rents from him. They generally disapproved of it, regarding it as uncalled for as a piece of legislation that would unnecessarily disturb the existing order of things, and do more harm than good. If the hon. Member (Mr. Ayrton) persisted in his Amendment he would go into the lobby with him. He protested against this sort of Government interference when it was not required. Until he came into the House that night he never heard that the country bankers generally assented to this Bill. He did not believe that they did assent to it. This he knew, that the principal bankers in his constituency—many of them—declared that they did not approve of the Bill, and wished him to give it all the opposition in his power. The bankers of Hull and York, from whom he had had many communications on the subject, also disapproved of the measure.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he was sure the hon. Member for Peterborough would acquit him of any unfriendly feeling towards the Act of 1844. He fully admitted all the advantages which that Act had conferred upon the country, and if he thought the Bill proposed by his right hon. Friend would in any way tend to impair the usefulness of the Act of 1844 he would be the last to support it. It was true that Sir Robert Peel in 1844 did contemplate the extinguishment of the country issues, but at that time it was more easy to propose than to carry out such a plan, and he was therefore compelled to proceed more guardedly by gradually undermining rather than by putting a sudden end to them. The Act of 1844 attained a great good, but not the whole of the good contemplated by Sir Robert Peel. The measure which Sir Robert Peel then passed was intended to encourage country banks to enter into compositions with the Bank of England, whereby the notes of the latter establishment should be substituted for their own issues, his object being undoubtedly to have but one national issue. What he did was to prevent the great mischief that might arise from the country banks improperly increasing their issues. There was no doubt that Sir Robert Peel contemplated a revision of the Bank charter at the end of ten years. The state of affairs which was brought about by the Act of 1844 was an unlimited continuance of the country issues to the amount then in circulation until Parliament came down with a new Act. This step had not yet been taken. Now, the question arose upon application being made to his right hon. Friend for some facilities to bankers beyond the sixty-five miles circuit. His right hon. Friend proposed to give these banking facilities, but also proposed that, in consideration of these banking facilities being given, the right to issue notes should absolutely cease at a given time. At present the country banks had an unlimited lease of issuing notes, unless Parliament should interfere, but under this Bill they would only have a limited lease, and the right of issue would absolutely cease unless Parliament should interpose to prevent the termination of the lease at the expiration of a period of fifteen years. He thought that in this respect the Bill would be a great step towards carrying out the principles of the Act of 1844, and therefore he could not hesitate to give it his utmost support.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he desired to make an observation with regard, not to the principle of the measure, but as to the position in which they stood in reference to it. The question was not as to the course they should take with respect to the provision of the Bill which gave the lease, but whether they should go into Committee on it at all. He put it to the hon. Member for Peterborough—admitting for the sake of argument all that he had stated—whether it was desirable to allow matters to go on exactly in their present condition by refusing to go into Committee. The whole argument against proceeding with the Bill resolved itself into this, that country bankers were bankers of issue, and should continue to hold that position; but as they were bankers of issue he contended that it was important on behalf of the public to obtain all possible security for the validity of their issues. Was it not desirable, seeing that there was no immediate prospect of dealing with these banks this or next year, to put them on the best and most secure footing possible, instead of allowing them to die out to the mischief of the public? By going into Committee, an opportunity would be afforded of discussing the provision, of which notice had been given by the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Alderman Salomons). A provision ought to be introduced, obliging these banks of issue to give security for a whole or a part of their authorized issue, and if this were done, a great step in advance would be gained in securing the validity of the country issue. He hoped the House would go into Committee upon the Bill.

MR. HUBBARD said, that the security of the public in the limitation of a paper issue, and in the application of the profits which might accrue, were conditions which could not be too largely insisted on. He agreed with his right hon. Friend who introduced the Bill as to the House being perfectly free to deal with that subject. But, that being so, where was the necessity of entering now into a sort of compromise which tied up the hands of the House for fifteen years to come? This was not a general measure affecting the issues of all banks, but was a mere Permissive Bill to meet the convenience of one particular bank; but his right hon. Friend offered the same convenience to other banks which might follow in its train. In his own opinion, very few banks indeed would follow in the train of that one particular bank. He therefore deprecated the proposed legislation. The right hon. Member for Stamford wished to go into Committee in order to consider the Amendment suggested by the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Alderman Salomons); but if a certain compact had been entered into by the Chancellor of the Exchequer with all the important issuing banks, it was clearly not in his power to re-adjust the terms he had made, and to go into Committee to rectify the Bill would be a delusion. If the Government interfered in that matter and gave any further sanction to the business of private issue, its first duty was not to share the profit, but to protect the public. He was in favour of the public having a sure and available medium of currency, and of security being given for a certain portion of the issue. Seeing that that was the last year of the Parliament, and that they would not be able now to deal satisfactorily with the question, they could not do better than postpone the whole matter.

MR. GOSCHEN said, the country bankers had opposed that measure very strongly, because they saw in it the thin end of the wedge; but he supported it himself because he admitted that it was the thin end of the wedge. It was desirable gradually to get rid of the private issues; and as a friend of the Act of 1844 he supported the Bill, because the result would be that it would put an end to private issues altogether. When the period of twenty-five years appeared in the Bill, he felt a strong objection to it, and he had put an Amendment on the paper for substituting ten years. He now supported the measure because it placed a limit—although, he was sorry to say, rather a distant one—to private issues. The most valuable parts of the measure were the provision fixing a term when the country issues should cease, and the tax of £1, which involved an important principle, as showing that the State claimed the right to deal with the currency.

MR. AYRTON said, he would withdraw his Amendment, and leave the House, if it chose, to divide on the main Question.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 4, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Power of Banks of Issue to obtain Exemption.)

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMANS moved the omission of certain words of the clause, which repealed in respect of banks of issue, undertaking to pay the percentage on its issue, the provisions which restrict the number of partners to six, and prohibit them from having a house of business or issuing their notes within sixty-five miles of London. He said that it was for the public interest that banks of issue should be strengthened by an increase of partners, and that we ought rather to offer them every facility for doing so than to make it onerous on them by making the addition a subject of charge. The hon. Member proposed to omit the words imposing the condition.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the proposal of the Government was to remove certain banking disabilities on condition of the issuers placing themselves in a position more conformable to the Act of 1844. The proposal of the hon. Member would tend to remove this hold upon the banks.

Clause 8 (Issue of Banks accepting Conditions of Act to continue till 1st January 1875.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved to leave out down to "longer," and insert—

"If, on or after the 1st day of January, 1879, notice shall be given by the Commissioners of the Treasury, by publication in the London Gazette, to all the banks issuing notes in respect of which such percentage as aforesaid is payable, requiring the termination of such issues, then, unless Parliament shall otherwise determine, the said issues shall cease on the 1st day of January, 1880, or at the expiration of one year, from the said notice, as the case may be."

The effect of the Amendment was to accomplish what the executive Government and the gentlemen connected with banks equally thought convenient—namely, that a distinct notice should be given to enable them to make preparations for the change. As to the policy of the Act there could be no mistake. It turned altogether on the fixing of a particular term when Parliament shall think that the Executive ought to be invested with full power to direct that the issues in question should cease. He had not a doubt that the notice would be given in the spirit of the Act, and by this clause parties would have the opportunity of calling the attention of Parliament to the question. He did not anticipate that any discussion would take place on the Amendment, fixing as it did the precise time beyond which no right could survive.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, he agreed with the clause as first proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but altogether disagreed with the Amendment. He had intended to move in the Committee that a term of ten years should be substituted for the term of fifteen, as proposed in the clause as it now stood; but, as it appeared to him, the whole principle advocated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was given up by the Amendment. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that he meant that the bank issues should cease at a certain time by Act of Parliament; but, by the wording of this clause, it was merely that the country banks should not issue after that time without further notice—so that any Chancellor of the Exchequer who might take another view of the matter might, if he liked, postpone altogether the issue of the notice. He (Mr. Hankey) wanted the Act passed in such a form as to make the country issues class entirely independent of the will of any future Minister.

MR. HEYGATE said, he understood that the opposition of the country bankers had been withdrawn on this condition.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, that after all, the Act would only operate in the case of those banks which voluntarily adopted it, and who might or not be called upon by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in fifteen years' time, to execute the bond they now undertook. He contended that, so far from being a great commercial measure, it would be found that, from its optional character, they had after all their labour done nothing at all. He believed it would only be accepted by one or two banks, and considered the Bill one very unworthy of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. BRISCOE said, that he should support the Bill as it had been modified by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; had it remained in its original shape he should have opposed it.

MR. HUBBARD said, one great argument for the Bill as it originally stood was, that private issues would terminate at a given date; but as the clause was now proposed to be amended it would only enable the Treasury to terminate those issues or not, as they should think fit.

MR. AYRTON said, that he thought that the first offer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was the best for the public, because it was some satisfaction to see that in 1875 those banks which came under the Bill would cease to have any rights at all. The substitute was that in 1880, instead of being extinguished, they were to receive a notice from the Treasury to that effect. The result would be that if a strong Government, which could carry everything, happened to be in office, and an enterprising Chancellor of the Exchequer who held sound opinions upon this question, this notice would probably be given; but not otherwise.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that there was a great deal of difference between issuing a notice from Downing Street and bringing a proposition before the House and having to contend with a variety of suggestions and Amendments. It was not intended to refer the policy of this Bill for reconsideration by any future Chancellor of the Exchequer. The one great object of the Bill, for which many sacrifices were made, was that as to those issues which came within the scope of the Act Parliament should at a certain period have absolute power, and there was no way of giving to Parliament this absolute power except by providing for an absolute determination of the right of issue. He undertook nothing with regard to the view which Parliament might take at the period indicated. The question upon what principles the policy of issue should thereafter be conducted would depend upon the judgment of the Parliament of the day, who would no doubt pay greater attention to the great and wise Act of 1844 than to any words of his, and would avail themselves of all the experience which would by that time have accumulated. As to the notice from the Executive, this would be a purely Ministerial act, and one which, whether the Government of the day were strong or weak, they need not hesitate to perform. Upon this question he had found it impossible to bring in a large and comprehensive measure. He had framed one satisfactory to himself, but in the face of the opposition by which it was sure to be met it was hopeless to propose such a measure, and so when he found he could not do all he wanted he tried to do part. He saw no mischief in providing for the notice; and as the bankers seemed to attach great value to such a warning he had acceded to their views.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, that the optional power could be done away with by leaving the word "if" out at the commencement of the words proposed to be added.

MR. GOSCHEN said, it would be better still to leave out the words "if, on and after," and then the sentence would begin by definitely stating that the notice should be given by the Lords of the Treasury.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, it would be an improvement to leave out the four words, "if, on and after," as suggested.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER proposed that the Amendment which he had moved to the clause should read thus —

"On or before the 1st day of January, 1879, notice shall be given by the Commissioners of the Treasury, by publication in the London Gazette, to all the banks issuing notes, in respect of which such percentage as aforesaid is payable, requiring the termination of such issues, and then, unless Parliament shall otherwise determine, the said issue shall cease on the 1st day of January, 1880."

MR. THOMSON HANKEY withdrew his Amendment.

Then the Amendment of the Chancellor of the Exchequer agreed to.

MR. SALT said, that if, under this Bill, a right now possessed by the banks was absolutely to cease at the end of a given number of years, the measure was one of great importance, and the clause was deserving of great consideration.

MR. HUBBARD said, he wished to ask what was to be the position of the banks which did not comply with the provisions of the Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was rather surprised at this question. Before the House went into Committee, with all the variations of language which the powers at his command enabled him to employ, he had gone into this same question, and had at length checked himself from the fear that the House would experience a species of nausea in being obliged to listen to so much on the subject. The banks referred to by his hon. Friend would incur no loss and obtain no benefit under the Bill. Under the Act of 1844 they occupied a certain position, and in that position they would remain.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, that the Bill would not leave those banks precisely as they now stood. The banks would be divided into two classes—namely, conforming and nonconforming banks; and the question was what effect would this clause have upon the nonconforming banks? If the measure was a good and a proper one, it would, of course, be desirable, in the interests of the public that as many banks as possible should accept its terms. But the managers of provincial banks would naturally argue that it would be better to forego the advantages offered rather than absolutely to resign their right of issue at the expiration of the fifteen years' term fixed by the Act. He thought that, under the circumstances, it would be better to place both classes of banks on the same footing at the expiration of the term.

MR. CARDWELL said, to adopt such a suggestion would be to throw away the principal object of the Act, which was to advance another step in the direction taken by the Act of 1844.

Clauses 9 to 18, inclusive, agreed to.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, that he wished to draw attention to the fact that of late one large bank had been compelled to close its doors, and that the public had been glad to accept 10s. or 12s. in the pound upon its notes which were in circulation at the time of its stoppage. In his opinion banks ought to give some security for the payment of their notes. He understood from an hon. Member of that House, who was a director of a very large bank—the National Provincial Bank of England—with an ample capital, that the managers of that establishment would have no objection whatever to give security for its notes; and he thought most of the substantial banks would be equally able and willing to give the security the clause he proposed pointed out. It was certainly a great anomaly that while the Act of 1844 compelled the Bank of England to give security for its issue, the public should have been left at the mercy of the private banks. He begged to move the adoption of the following new clause:—

(Deposit of Government Securities by Banks of Issue.)

“Provided always that, previous to any Bank of Issue having a house of business or establishment as bankers in London, or at any place not exceeding sixty-five miles from London, such Bank shall deposit with the Commissioners of the National Debt an amount of Exchequer Bills or other Government Securities equal to its maximum authorized issue, to be retained by the said Commissioners so long as such Bank shall continue a Bank of Issue, with a house of business or establishment in London, or within sixty-five miles thereof.”

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the argument of his hon. Friend might have been understood to apply to a different clause from that which he had moved. His hon. Friend said, there was a great amount of unsecured issues of bank notes, and it might be supposed that he was going to move a clause to put an end to that state of things, and to require all private and joint-stock banks of issue to give security for their notes. The House had passed a clause through Committee by which certain of the banks of issue would place themselves in a position much more favourable to the public than banks of issue in general, and his hon. Friend wanted to draw a fundamental distinction between these banks to the disadvantage of the conforming, and the advantage of the non-conforming, banks. He would rather say, on the other hand, that it was the notes of the non-conforming banks that ought to give security, and not the others. The hon. Member was free to hold that at any moment Parliament would be justified in imposing the duty of giving security upon all private issuers whatever. But he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) protested against imposing the duty exclusively on the conforming banks. If there were any necessity for giving security for notes, that necessity was strong or weak, as the banks were weak or strong. Where the bank was weak there was the more need of security; where it was strong there was the less need of security. Did his hon. Friend think that the weak bank, to which reference had been made, would have been a conforming bank? If there were any banks now in existence with a rotten circulation, they would remain untouched by the clause, but if there were banks strong, flourishing, extending their business, having the confidence of the public, solid and solvent, these banks would conform to the Bill and become banks of issue. He protested against drawing the distinction proposed by the clause. It was both unfair and inconvenient. His strong objection, however, to the clause was that this question of security was essentially one which, if it were dealt with at all, ought to be dealt with by direct legislation. The right of Parliament to require banks of issue to find security was one deeply rooted in the nature of note issue, and it was the duty of Parliament to provide for the soundness of the issue. By the Bill now before the House, the Government did something, although not everything, with regard to conforming banks. Upon the general question of legislation he would not on the present occasion give an opinion, except to say, that it was within the right and competency of Parliament to take security. But his hon. Friend's clause would require a great deal of subsidiary legislation to carry it out, and of a kind not belonging to the measure before the House. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) was not seeking by this Bill to prejudice the question of security by banks of private issue, but his hon. Friend, on the contrary, was, by his clause, going far to prejudice the question. It would be most unwise to deal with this important question of security at the present moment. His hon. Friend required that the notes of the banks in question should be secured by Exchequer Bills or other Government securities. He, on the other hand, was by no means certain that it was either necessary or equitable to limit the banks that might be required to give security to Government securities. There might be securities quite as good—mortgages, for example, which might be bad securities for the bank itself to take, but which might be as perfectly good as the securities contemplated by his hon. Friend. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) was not sure that the security for the notes of issuing banks might not be provided by very different means—by constituting, for example, their notes as a first lien on their assets. That, however, was a matter of great delicacy and importance, and before legislating upon it, it would require more consideration than had been given to it. He believed there were many topics that should be taken into view before they proceeded to deal fully with this important question; but he did not intend to treat it lightly, or show disrespect to his hon. Friend's authority. If it were the opinion of Parliament that banks issuing notes should give security, that would be of great advantage to the public. He would almost venture to say that his hon. Friend himself must see that to attempt to close the consideration of the subject by this clause would not be sound or good policy.

MR. HEYGATE said, he thought the distinction drawn by the right hon. Gentleman between strong banks and weak ones was likely to be misunderstood. If only two or three banks conformed to the proposal, the condition of the non-conforming banks would remain unimpaired; but if the right hon. Gentleman were enabled to split up the banks and to induce one-half to conform, the others standing alone would find their position materially disturbed. The hon. Member for London (Mr. Goschen) was correct in the view which he took when he regarded the Bill as the thin end of the wedge. That hon. Member was a determined opponent of country issue, and was therefore consistent in wishing the passing of the measure.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, what he intended to convey was that the banks, generally speaking, were strong; but in the case of issuers they could never be certain that there might not be one or two weak ones. And these would possibly be found among the non-conforming ones.

In reply to Mr. GOSCHEN,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he understood this contract with the banks to refer altogether to matters apart from the security for issues. It appeared to him that the obligation of the note issuer to give an adequate security for issue was of a general nature, and could not be possibly affected by a Bill of this kind unless specifically expressed. The liberty of Parliament to deal with the security of issue would remain totally unimpaired.

MR. HUBBARD said, he believed that the measure would never come into operation save with regard to two or three banks, and wished it had never been brought forward.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, he thought there could be no impropriety in dealing with the issuing banks, to whom under the terms of the Bill a privilege for fifteen years was given.

MR. NEATE said, he should require legal authority higher than that of the right hon. Gentleman for the assertion that rights of issue already enjoyed by banks under Parliamentary authority could be affected or withdrawn without compensation being given for the loss ensuing from the alteration.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, that seeing how well Gentlemen with University educations had argued against his proposal, he felt more sensible than ever of the great disadvantage which he suffered in not having had one himself. He still adhered to the opinions which he had expressed, but in deference to the feeling of the House would withdraw his Amendment.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there was a limited portion of the country banks who were in the habit, not of compounding for their issues, but of paying stamp duties on their notes. Those persons would be under a certain disadvantage if at any time they should wish to compound for the rest of their notes. He had, therefore, prepared a clause which gave power to the Treasury to make those banks such compensation as might be fair on their stamped notes yet in circulation.

Clause A (Compensation to Banks issuing Notes on Stamped Paper.)

"16. When any Bank which issues its Notes on Stamped Paper becomes a privileged Bank, and proves to the satisfaction of the Commissioners of the Treasury that it has paid a greater amount of Duty in respect to its Stamped Notes in Circulation than it would have paid if it had compounded for the Duty on such Notes, the Commissioners of the Treasury may make such allowance to the said Banks as they under the circumstances think just."

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Thursday, and to be printed. [Bill 123.]

PARTNERSHIP AMENDMENT BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. MILNER GIBSON, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, it would be in the recollection of the House that, in the course of the proceedings of the present Parliament, his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Scholefield) had introduced a measure for the purpose of amending the law of partnership. The object of that measure was to enable a person or persons carrying on business with unlimited liability to enter into partnership with others who should be liable only for a specific amount, those others being designated "limited partners." The measure contained various rules and restrictions which rendered it necessary that the Bill should have a great number of clauses, and it proposed to effect a very considerable change in the law of partnership. It was referred to a Select Committee, of which he himself was a Member;

but, upon its being afterwards proceeded with in Committee of the Whole House, his hon. Friend found the difficulties in his way so hard to be surmounted—difficulties which usually beset the path of private Members in dealing with such subjects—that he abandoned the measure, an understanding having been come to between himself and the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the question should receive the serious consideration of the Government. Under those circumstances the Government had deemed it to be their duty to take the matter in hand, and it had occurred to them that the benefits to be derived from such a measure as that of his hon. Friend might be secured by another mode of proceeding of a simpler character, and one which would be attended by less alteration in the rules and principles of the law of partnership. The Bill which he was about to submit to the House had for its object so to relax the rule of law which laid down that a participation in profits constituted a partnership, as to enable a person to lend a firm carrying on trade a sum of money, on the condition that the remuneration for the use of that money should be in the form of a portion of the profits, instead of a fixed rate of interest. Under its provisions a person lending money on such a contract would stand in the relation of a creditor to the trader, and would not be constituted a partner simply because he received for his loan a share of the profits by way of remuneration for the use of his money. That was the proposal embodied in the first and principal clause. The second clause would enable persons to pay their servants as a reward for their labour, instead of a fixed salary, a portion of the profits of the business in which they happened to be engaged; while the third clause would entitle the widow or child of a deceased partner in any commercial house to receive a portion of the profits by way of annuity without thereby being constituted a partner. These were the three proposals which he had to make, but it was provided that the different parties whom he had mentioned—the lender of the money, the person who received a share of the profits as a reward for his labour, and the annuitant, although they should stand in the relation of creditors to the trader with whom they had had transactions, yet they should be "postponed creditors," and should not be entitled, in case of bankruptcy, to recover what was due to them until all the other creditors of the firm had been paid. He had adopted in this Bill pretty nearly the words which were suggested some years ago by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns). A Bill was at that time before the House to accomplish the object which he now had in view. It was a very cumbrous Bill, containing a great many regulations and restrictions, and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Belfast gave notice of his intention to move the omission of all the clauses and the substitution of those which were, with the exception of a few words, the same as those of this Bill. Two of those clauses were to this effect—

"1. The advance of capital or money to be used in any trade or undertaking upon a contract with the person carrying on such a trade or undertaking that the person making such advance shall be remunerated solely by a share of the profits of the undertaking shall not of itself constitute the person making such advance a partner in the trade or undertaking, or render him responsible as such.

"2. A contract for the remuneration of the servant or agent of any person engaged in any trade or undertaking by a share of the profits of such trade or undertaking shall not of itself render such servant or agent responsible as a partner thereof."

The clause which was contained in the Bill now before the House with reference to the widows and children of deceased partners was an addition. He mentioned these facts to show the origin of the simple form of enactment which he had adopted, and to obtain from it the benefit of the authority of the hon. and learned Member for Belfast. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) introduced his comprehensive measure for authorizing limited liability to joint-stock companies, he at the same time brought in a Bill similar to that now before the House, and also adopted the form of words which had been suggested by the hon. and learned Gentleman. There were some words in the first clause which he should be prepared to omit from this Bill—namely, "or bear a share of the loss." He was informed by his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General that those words were not necessary to the attainment of the object which he had in view, and therefore he should be willing to leave them out. It must be remembered that at the time that limited liability was given to joint-stock companies it was admitted that private traders carrying on business with unlimited liability could not be left under any restrictions which could properly be removed. It was recognized that these great mercantile associations, which were to have the benefit of limited liability, would come into competition with private firms and individual traders carrying on business with unlimited liability, and it therefore seemed reasonable that all the restrictions which could safely be removed from the operations of this latter class of traders should be got rid of. It was at the time contended that they ought to be allowed to raise capital in the best way that they could, and upon such terms on which lenders were willing to advance it. The argument that the repeal of the usury laws had enabled lenders to advance money to traders at any rate of interest they could obtain was not a sufficient answer to that appeal, because it was clear that a trader would rarely engage to pay a high fixed rate of interest, whether he made any profit or not, if he did he would not be acting as a prudent tradesman or taking a course which was likely to conduce to his commercial welfare. Now that great joint-stock associations had obtained, not as a matter of privilege, but as a matter of right, power to carry on business with limited liability, private partnerships had a right to claim some greater facility for raising money than a mere repeal of the usury laws, which, though right in principle, and productive of much benefit, was not of itself sufficient. What he proposed was simply this—that a lender should be allowed, without becoming liable as a partner, to advance money to a partnership carrying on business with unlimited liability, at a fluctuating rate of interest; in fact, receiving a portion of the profits in lieu of interest; and he could not see any difference in point of principle between an agreement of that sort and an agreement to receive a high rate of interest. It would be better for the creditors and it seemed in itself more reasonable that if a lender wished to assist a trading firm he should stipulate to be paid a portion of the profits, so that he should receive no interest when no profits were made, and a high rate of interest when large profits were earned. That seemed to him to be a fair and reasonable bargain, and he did not see why the law should deter persons from entering into such arrangements by making them liable to the debts of the firm to their last shilling; while if they advanced money at usurious rates—20 or 25 per cent—it allowed them, in case of bankruptcy, to rank with the rest of the creditors, and perhaps sweep away a large portion of the assets. That did not seem to him to be a reasonable state of things, and therefore he proposed that a mere lender upon the terms which he had described should not by that act alone be constituted a partner. Let the House observe that he was not in any way interfering with the general laws of partnership. If a man lending money to a firm was with his own knowledge put forward to the world as a partner; if he allowed his name to be used as a means of obtaining credit; if he was, in fact, the person who was trusted, then, although he was only a lender, he must be responsible for the debts that were contracted. But if he was a mere lender, if he was not known to the creditor when credit was given to the firm, he did not see upon what principle of justice he could be called upon, should the firm to which he had advanced money fail, to pay all the debts even to his last shilling. He believed that it was doubted by competent authorities whether the law laid down in the case of "Waugh v. Carver," which established that participation in profits constituted a man a partner, was not erroneous. He had a high authority to cite in support of his assertion. When Mr. Baron Bramwell, then Mr. Bramwell, was examined before the Mercantile Laws Commission he said that he should have thought that nothing could have been conceived more contrary to law than the rule which was laid down in that case, but that it had been so long received as law that it could not be changed without legislation. What he was now proposing was, therefore, according to this high authority, not to change the principle of our law, but rather to restore the law to what in his opinion it ought to have been held to be. It appeared to him that permitting persons to advance money upon condition of receiving a share of the profits, without thereby becoming liable to all the debts of the concern, might be of great utility in enabling assistance to be given to clever, prudent, and industrious men who had all the qualities necessary for the advantageous and safe administration of capital, but had not the capital itself. Now, he thought that it was good policy—it certainly was the policy which lay at the root of recent legislation with reference to limited liability—as far as you could with safety to the public to facilitate the bringing of capital into conjunction with talent, prudence, and industry, thus enabling men who possessed those qualities legitimately and properly to acquire wealth and raise themselves in the social scale. He therefore thought that on moral grounds, and as a matter of public policy, the proposed change should be made. With regard to the second clause, he thought it a very reasonable thing that an employer should as a reward for labour pay a portion of profits either in addition to or in lieu of wages. He was told by those learned in the law that an employer might pay a servant a sum calculated in proportion to profits as a reward for his labour; but for his part he could not see the distinction between a percentage on profits and a portion of profits. What public policy could there be in preserving such a distinction? It appeared to be a sort of trap. Men really acting from the best motives in giving their servants an interest in their business, and paying them in the most legitimate manner, felt uneasy under the present state of the law, and therefore he was of opinion it would be good policy to get rid of this distinction. Mr. Anderson had stated before the Mercantile Law Commission that a mercantile house sending out a traveller might agree to give him a certain salary and £10 for every £100 of profits made by the firm; that was no partnership; but to agree to give him one-tenth of the profits, which would be the same amount, would constitute the traveller a partner. That state of the law should not continue. On grounds of general policy it was very desirable to remove all doubts in this matter, and enable employers and employed, if they thought proper, to make such contracts without any fear under the law of partnership. Too sharp a line was drawn between employers and employed. Strikes and turnouts frequently arose from an exaggerated view of the profits of capital; and the more the system proposed was acted upon, giving the labourer in reward for his labour a portion of the profits, the more likely would correct views on this subject prevail, and the less likely would strikes and turnouts become. He therefore thought the measure now proposed was politic, and might be productive of in this way some advantage to the country. So, again, with regard to paying a portion of profits by way of annuity to the widow or child of a deceased partner. The Attorney General would tell him that even a fluctuating annuity would not necessarily entail liability. But if it were dependent on profits, probably the widow or child would thereby be constituted a partner; but, whether that was established law or not, this Bill would put an end to all doubt, and enable this most reasonable thing to be done, that the widow or child of a deceased partner in a mercantile house might receive a portion of the profits by way of annuity without any question arising as to whether the widow or child were constituted a partner. In the case of "Waugh v. Carver" Chief Justice Eyre said—

"This case has been extremely well argued, and the discussion of it has enabled me to make up my mind, and removed the only difficulty I felt, which was whether, by construing this to be a partnership, we should not determine that if there was an annuity granted out of a banking-house to the widow, for instance, of a deceased partner, it would make her liable to the debts of the house, and involve her in a bankruptcy; but I think this case will not lead to that consequence."—[2 H. Bl. 235.]

"Provided the annuity be not dependent on the profits of the business."

This Bill would put an end to all that doubt. It had been stated that there was a great difference between a fluctuating and a fixed rate of interest, and it might be very well to deter men from contracting for the one and allow them freely to adopt the other. It could be shown, however, that the necessity of traders in trouble having recourse to the advance of money upon high fixed interest had more than anything else been disadvantageous to regular creditors, and generally, as he was informed, these advances, which might be made under the usury laws, were, in fact, too often the precursors of bankruptcy. He had a letter from a solicitor in extensive practice in connection with bankruptcy, who said—

"I know many cases in which persons have lent traders large sums of money at exorbitant rates of interest, and when bankruptcy or insolvency has followed, as usually happens in these cases, the lender has proved the whole amount of the debt and interest against the debtor's estate in competition with bona fide trade creditors; but I know of no case in which money has been lent so colourably, so as to insure the lender a share of the profits, without incurring the consequences of partnership. In fact, where money is lent at high rates the lender takes good care to steer clear of any suggestion or suspicion of participation of profits, lest the debtor should turn round in any subsequent stage, disclose the secret arrangement, deprive the lender of his claim to rateable payment with the other creditors, and render him liable to pay the debts of the secret partnership."

That was from Mr. Lawrence, of Old Jewry Chambers. How much better it would be if the loan in these cases had been made under the provisions of this Bill—namely, upon profits with postponement until all the bona fide creditors were paid? He had another letter from an eminent Liverpool house. The writer said—

"I cannot remember how many cases I have met with in which the parties have wished that a capitalist should advance capital into a business, and receive a share of profits, without incurring the liability of a partner; but men in business are now so familiar with the actual state of the law on the subject that the number of times which an attorney has been consulted upon such a subject will form no sure criterion of the number of times that the difficulty has been felt, as in most cases the parties themselves would know that what they sought to do was impracticable. The course which in my experience has been taken to get rid of the legal difficulty in those cases in which the transaction has not been abandoned altogether has varied according to the circumstances. I have known the difficulty disposed of in the following different ways:—By an ordinary partnership, with stringent restrictions on the working partner for the protection of the moneyed partner; by the formation of a small joint-stock company, with limited liability; and by a loan, at a high fixed rate of interest, secured according to the circumstances of the case. I have also met with cases in which the agreement has been entered into, and the secret partner has sought to protect himself by a refined distinction, recognized by some of the cases, between taking a share in the profits, which would make him liable as a partner, and taking a sum of money in proportion to the profits (whatever that may mean), which has been held not to constitute a partner."

He thought it was much better to provide a straight and proper mode of entering into these contracts rather than drive people to this indirect and circuitous mode of proceeding. This measure had been frequently approved in one form or another by Parliament. The right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) succeeded in getting the House to read his Bill two or three times, and it failed only because there was some amendment introduced in Committee which he thought would be so injurious to the measure that it was not worth while to proceed with it. Though he was sorry to find the Bill now before the House was threatened with opposition at the second reading, he hoped the House would now do what had been so frequently done before—namely, to affirm the principle that a man may lend money and receive remuneration by a fluctuating instead of a fixed rate of interest without incurring unlimited liabilities. If the House was not satisfied with the other provisions of the Bill, it would be quite competent for the Committee to make Amendments. He did not profess to have that knowledge of the law which would entitle him to say that the Bill drawn at the Board of Trade was perfect in all its parts, and he should be most happy to take the advice of those who by their experience were competent to judge of the practical working of the measure. What he asked the House to do was to agree to a sound and salutary principle. He knew that hon. Gentlemen might raise objections to the Bill and say that a person might lend his money to a trading firm, that he might receive profits when profits were made, but when days of adversity came he would take good care to get out of the concern and defeat the object the Bill had in view. It was easy, however, to meet this objection, and it only referred to matter of detail. It was easy to provide for such dangers by merely putting in words to the effect that money so advanced, if withdrawn within a certain period before the bankruptcy, should be paid back; or that the money advanced should be for a fixed period. He believed, however, the present law of Bankruptcy provided a remedy for that case. He confidently placed the Bill in the hands of the House, and begged leave to move that it be now read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Milner Gibson.)

MR. JOHN PEELE said, before moving the Amendment of which he had given notice, he wished to explain his objections to the Bill. In the first place, he could not assent to the declaration in the preamble, "that it was expedient to alter the law relating to partnership." He believed there was no part of the world in which such great facilities existed for the transaction of commercial affairs as in England, where capital found its way so readily into channels of enterprise, and where credit was so extended, and at the same time founded upon such great security. The present law of partnership was one of the main props upon which our present healthy credit system had been erected, and he could not find out that there was any important portion of the commercial community who desired an alteration in that law at present. He had taken great pains to ascertain the opinions of men engaged in commerce — bankers, merchants, and manufacturers, and he found among all those whose judgment was entitled to respect the greatest apprehension of the consequences that would ensue from the adoption of the principle of limited liability in private partnerships without most ample publicity. He also believed that the present moment was particularly inopportune for any speculative alterations in our Commercial Code. It would be better to leave well alone at present. He wished to make a few observations with regard to the first clause of the Bill, which, in fact, embodied its principle. If the House were to adopt that clause, the remainder of the Bill must pass as a matter of course. There was a good deal of ambiguity as to the wording of the clause, and "lender" was made use of instead of the old word "partner." So far as he could understand the clause its object was to enable two persons to associate themselves for the purpose of carrying on a trade or calling under a contract by which one should provide the capital and the other contribute his skill and knowledge with his personal attendance to the furtherance of the common object. That each should participate in the profits or losses, and while the working partner should be subject to all the responsibilities of a partner, as under the present law, the person who furnished the capital should have no further risk than the loss of the capital which he originally put into the concern. There was no provision for any publication or registration of the partnership, so that as far as the public were concerned the contract might be a perfect secret. This would be productive of very evil consequences, and a probable result would be that cases of this kind would occur:—A scientific person, or a man of mechanical skill, would invent some improvement in the manufacture of a commodity, but not having sufficient capital to carry out his plans he would invite the co-operation of a man of capital, and make a contract with him that money should be provided sufficient to carry on the business for a term of years. During that period supposing the business to be eminently successful, the capitalist would be never named, but the business carried on in the name of the inventor, the ostensible sole proprietor. Being so successful, every one would be anxious to give him credit and supply him with the articles which he required. His credit increased, at the end of the term of the contract the monied partner would withdraw his capital and retire. The working partner, very naturally seeing that he could get any amount of credit, would think he could get on without capital, and continue the business as before. The credit would have been given in the belief that the working partner was in the possession of all the accumulated profits obtained during his successful operations. A slackness might occur in the demand for the article which he manufactured, and he would go on for a while with the hope that trade would revive, and avail himself to the utmost extent of the credit which people were willing to give him. Trade not mending work would be stopped, he would be obliged to call creditors together, tell them he was unable to meet his engagements, and the creditors would then find for the first time that, instead of gaining largely from year to year, he had had all this time a vampire on his back in the shape of a monied partner who, after sucking his life blood, left him a mere skeleton. This was one of the results which was likely not unfrequently to happen under the operation of such a Bill as that before the House. It was most probable that the Bill would also have the effect of leading to ruinous speculation and over-trading. It was obviously the interest of the monied partner in any concern at present to exercise continual supervision over those who had not the same capital as himself, and to exercise a salutary control over those who might be more energetic and speculative than prudent, and the result was that in very few instances firms of that kind came into difficulty. If this Bill passed the interest of the capitalist would be exactly the reverse—namely, trading to the utmost extent, and encouraging the working partner not only to avail himself of the capital he had advanced, but to stretch his credit to the utmost, and that for the sake of making the annual profits as large as possible. It was quite probable that during a few years of prosperity the capitalist might take out five or six times as much as he had advanced, and if bankruptcy came his loss would be small, while many of the creditors would be involved in a common ruin. This, he believed would be a certain result of the

Mr. John Peel

Bill. It would, in addition, open the door widely to deliberate fraud. He would be sorry to give instances which he might readily adduce, lest if the Bill passed they might be adopted as suggestions. In times of panic, which we must expect occasionally, he was afraid that the distrust which prevailed on those occasions would be greatly increased by the suspicion that every man would entertain of his neighbour, that he might have some unseen partner taking the profits unknown to the public out of the concern. He thought he had said enough to show that this Bill was pregnant with mischief and danger, and he should not be doing his duty if he did not do all in his power to oppose it. He therefore begged leave to move that it be read that day six months.

MR. J. A. TURNER, in seconding the Amendment, said, he wished to explain that he had no objection whatever to the principle of limited liability. He believed that under that system many extensive businesses, both in banking and mercantile operations, had been carried on, which would never have been contemplated under another system. He thought that great advantages had been derived from the establishment of limited liability in joint-stock companies, but the confidence of the public had been given to those companies mainly by reason of the system of registration and publicity of accounts which were required of them. But under this Bill nothing of the kind was provided for, and the public would be perfectly ignorant as to the position of any concern which might have a sleeping partner, or rather a sleeping lender of money. He would have at all times—without the creditors being at all aware of the fact—the opportunity of taking from the profits of the concern with which he was connected a large proportion of the profits for which no doubt he would bargain when he was lending his money—a proportion which would not only represent the capital he had advanced, but ultimately the whole of the capital itself. In the course of a few years, if the concern should fail, the creditors would find that they had been left in the lurch, and that the capital had to a very great extent been withdrawn by the lender who had, in reality, been an exhausting creditor. He, therefore, disapproved of the Bill. The Manchester Chamber of Commerce had intrusted him with a petition against the Bill unless the principles of registration and publicity were provided for in the clauses.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. John Peel.)

Mr. SCHOLEFIELD said, it had been his duty to introduce in two Sessions of Parliament a Bill founded on the same principle, and he thanked the right hon. Gentleman for having introduced a Bill which he (Mr. Scholefield) thought would be so efficient and simple as the one now before the House, and which he believed was a better Bill than his own. The present Parliament had on several occasions affirmed the principle of this Bill, and therefore he had been in hopes that the hon. Member for Tamworth (Mr. J. Peel) would not have felt it his duty to have moved the Amendment which he had done. All the objections which had been offered to the Bill were objections not so much to the principle of the Bill as to its details, and he thought, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman would have done well to have allowed the Bill to go to a Committee. The hon. Member for Manchester was anxious that there should be publicity in regard to the names of those who lent their money on the ground that they shared in the profits, but he (Mr. Scholefield) wanted to know why a man who lent his money on the ground that he should share in the profits of a concern should have his name registered any more than a man who lent his money out at 5, 6, or 7 per cent. If a man lent money on condition of his receiving a return from the profits, he would not be paid in case of the insolvency of the man to whom he had lent that money until the demands of the other creditors had been satisfied; whereas, if the money were lent at a fixed rate of interest, the world knew nothing of the transaction, and the man who lent the money would share with the other creditors in the estate, and would in many cases receive the largest amount. The law as it stood at present did not depend upon the deliberate decision of the Legislature at all. It was not governed by statutes, but by the decision of one particular Judge, and the correctness of that decision had been questioned by many of the first lawyers in the kingdom. He believed that this measure would effect a great improvement in the law, and he therefore hoped that the House would proceed with the second reading.

Mr. MOOR said, it was clear that the second clause of the Bill did not govern the case of the servants or the widows and the children. As it was at present drawn he believed it would be a dead letter. He did not think it likely that any person who risked money to a trader in difficulties, with a right of receiving a rate of interest for the profits, would do so if he were bound by the penalty contained in the second clause, and in the present state of the law a man advancing money under these circumstances would exact 20, 30, and even 50 or 60 per cent, while cases constantly arising in our Law Courts proved that this was actually the case. Such a person would be entitled to receive, to the detriment of the trade creditors, 50 or 60 per cent. In such a case was it likely that a man would lend his money upon the fair chance of receiving a rate of interest out of the profits of the trade when he knew that if the trader failed he would have no chance of receiving a sixpence? He did not object to the principle of the Bill, and in much that had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman as to the benefits that had flowed from limited liability he quite concurred; but he would suggest that a proviso should be attached to the first clause to the effect that every contract for a loan of money to a trader, upon a certain rate of interest out of the profits of trade, should be registered. In the absence of such a proviso they would be opening the door to a large amount of fraud. It had been stated that registration would be useless, because the person who lent the money would not be known, but he only desired that the fact should be registered.

Mr. CAVE said, it appeared to him that the opponents of the Bill based their objections to it on the ground of the uncertainty of the commercial transactions that would be effected under it. But if that uncertainty were great under the principle of limited liability, what, he asked, was it now under that of unlimited liability? He reminded the House of the vast number of failures they had had recently, and of the unlimited confidence reposed in many of those firms up to the very moment of their failure. When they remembered the failures of banks such as Hammersley's, Paul, Strahan, and Co.'s, and a still more recent instance, there could be no doubt that under no system that could be adopted could the public be more misled. With such facts before them, surely this proposed addition to the law of limited liability need not frighten them much. He was a Member of the Select Committee on the Bill of the hon. Member for Birmingham. After considerable labour that Committee left the Bill more complicated than they found it. He thought the present a more simple Bill, and, as confessed by the hon. Member for Birmingham himself, a better Bill than his own—and for this reason, that it did not deal with the law of partnership, but simply allowed a man to lend his money at a fluctuating rate of interest according to profit. What charm was there in a fixed rate of interest? During the existence of the Usury Laws there might be some reason for such a thing, but it had now disappeared. Surely an exorbitant fixed rate was far more oppressive than a varying rate. It would be small consolation to the creditors of a bankrupt's estate to find that the bankruptcy was owing to a fixed rate of 80 per cent for a portion of borrowed capital, as in a case before the court the other day, it was proved that a bankrupt had paid £130 upon a loan of £22 10s., the whole of which was nevertheless still due. The public would not be deceived by this change in the law, they gave no credit to the lender, they trusted A and B, partners, on account of their reputed means, and they derived additional security from the borrowed capital of C, which was under this Bill postponed, to all other claims. Those who insisted upon publicity and registration would defeat the object of the Bill, and would expose the public to a danger of thinking they had a better security. If there were publication of lenders the public would associate the credit of the lender with that of the trader, and thus would be liable to be deceived. He agreed with the hon. Member for Brighton in thinking that the Bill would not be acted upon in a great many instances, but at the same time it would not be altogether a dead letter, as many respectable persons would be very glad to assist a rising trader or clever inventor with a certain amount of money when they ran no risk of losing their whole capital. The only objection, perhaps, that could be raised to the second clause was that what it proposed was already the law; but, as some doubt existed as to this, it was only fair to make the Act declaratory in that respect. Payment of workmen by a share in profits, was becoming more and more the practice, and among other recommendations was this, that it was a remedy for the unfortunate strikes of which they had lately heard so much. He had some doubts as to the third clause, whether it would be for the advantage of widows and orphans to be paid according to profits, and thought that it would be better to leave out that clause in Committee. On the whole, he heartily supported the principle of the Bill.

MR. BAXTER said, that the arguments of the hon. Member for Tamworth were the same which had been urged against extending the principle of limited liability to joint-stock companies. The questions of registration and publicity were questions for consideration in Committee, and did not affect the principle of the Bill. He could not agree with the hon. Member (Mr. Moor) who had said that the Bill would be a dead letter. On the contrary, he thought it would be extensively acted upon, and would be productive of the greatest advantages to the commercial community. A great change had taken place in public opinion as to the principle of limited liability, and now in the north, the whole mercantile community were in favour of it. He was prepared to give the Bill his cordial support.

MR. HUBBARD said, he ventured to surmise, notwithstanding the opinions which had been expressed by the right hon. Gentleman and others to the contrary, that the object of the Bill was to alter the law of partnership in a most material point, in a point which had been hitherto accepted as constituting the true test of partnership. The whole of the law on that point would be impaired by the Bill as it now stood. The right hon. Gentleman said that the measure was intended to bring together capital and skill, to raise a competition against large corporations and trading companies, and to avert strikes. How it was to avert strikes he could not see, and he could neither admit that a stimulus to competition was required, nor that any fresh means for bringing capital and skill together were necessary, as there never was a time when capital and skill were on such cordial terms. The terms in the Bill were very vague. A lender might be a mere lender of capital to another, or a capitalist employing his servant, or a principal employing his agent. In either of those cases he might take a lion's share of nine-tenths of the profits, and leave only one-tenth to his agent or servant. If the business went on well the arrangement proposed in the Bill would be perfectly satisfactory, because there would be profits to share; but suppose there were no profits at all? He wished to know how the lender would be satisfied in that case. As to inspection of accounts, the very essence of the proposal was that the lender was to be a sleeping partner, and no sensible man would allow himself to be put in a position in which he was asked to rest satisfied with statements as to the accuracy of which he had a right to obtain information. He looked on the Bill as mischievous, not merely as touching the law of partnership, but as affecting the law of principal and agent. That was a most important commercial law, and if they impaired that which was the test of a man being a principal they would destroy that law altogether. He was, therefore, at a loss to know how the right hon. Gentleman reconciled this Bill with the law of principal and agent. This Bill destroyed that law and substituted one which had no countervailing advantages. Under it the capitalist or principal might, the moment an undertaking was going wrong, take all his capital away; and the expectation that the creditors would reap the benefit of his contributions would prove quite illusory. He must deprecate a change which he thought would operate most detrimentally on the character of our commerce. It was argued that if a failure took place the creditors would be better off, because they would have the money of the lender. But how were they to get at it? There was no provision to compel the lender to leave his money in the concern a single day. It was said that the Bill was opposed by great capitalists; but if there was one point on which he felt more confident than on another, it was that those who opposed that measure did so in the interest of the community at large, and not of our great capitalists. If the Bill passed it would be easy for men of large capital to set up servants and agents and themselves direct their operations from behind a screen, reaping the profit as long as things went on smoothly, but withdrawing their money from the concern when they saw insolvency approaching, but before bankruptcy was declared. It was asked why, if one man had skill and another capital, they should not be allowed to come together upon any terms they chose? There could be no objection to any arrangement which concerned themselves alone, but if a third party is brought into their transactions, if they incur liabilities, if they obtain credit, ought not the creditors to be considered? If losses were made, who ought to bear them? Ought it not to be the man who had conducted the business, or the man who had received the profits, rather than the creditor, who had given a perfect consideration for his claim? For these reasons he should cordially support the Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was always glad to receive instruction from Gentlemen conversant with the practical operation of the law of partnership; but perhaps those hon. Members did not speak with equal authority when they referred to the principles of the law. The effect of the Bill as regarded the law of principal and agent was quite the reverse of that described by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. It would repeal an arbitrary law, established by judicial authority alone, which did interfere with the law of principal and agent. The law of principal and agent was that a man should be held responsible for contracts which he authorized another to make on his behalf, but not otherwise. Then, putting aside the arbitrary decision in the case of "Waugh v. Carver," he asked—did the man who lent money to be repaid with interest according to a fluctuating rate out of profits really authorize the borrower to bind his whole fortune by any contract which he might make? Clearly, nothing could be more foreign from his intention than to give any such authority; and the court of law which said that he should not lend money without being taken to give that authority interfered with the natural course of mercantile transactions, and virtually prohibited them by imputing to them a false character and intention. The principle on which the Legislature had hitherto proceeded in altering the law of partnership and introducing limited liability had been that of leaving the parties free in mercantile matters to make such contracts as they pleased, and not by arbitrary legal rules to circumscribe the range of contracts which had nothing evil in themselves. As long as a man knew what he was about let him do it. If A knew that B did not undertake to be responsible to him beyond a certain limit, that was his affair; he knew whether or not it was worth his while to deal on that footing. Many unsuccessful undertakings might be started on the principle of limited liability, and he confessed that when the principle was first introduced he looked upon it with jealousy, but experience had shown that the principle of limited liability had extended itself, and was practically successful in the mercantile world, as applied to companies, and why should it not be extended to other contracts? The simple question was, would they allow a man to lend money to a borrower on the terms which they might arrange between themselves? If the law did not interfere the transaction would not make the lender a partner. Then, why should they interfere to make him so? It was said they might mislead those who became creditors of the concern. But this was a transaction the creditors knew nothing about. To whom did they give credit? They gave credit to the man carrying on the business, and to the business he was carrying on; and the Bill did not take away or limit the liability of the person to whom they gave credit. His property was made liable to the trade debts before any part of it could be applied in repayment of those who lent him money on the terms described in this Bill. The object of the Bill was to prevent the arbitrary interference of law with the actual meaning of contracts made by parties. It was said there might be evasion, and that if a lender saw danger he might require repayment of his advances, and so withdraw the means which the trader had of carrying on business. But the law of bankruptcy, to a certain extent, provided against that. If, however, the House thought any further safeguards should be introduced they might be introduced in Committee. Nothing could be more irrational than the present state of the law. No practical man could understand the distinction between a loan for remuneration in the shape of interest in proportion to the profits, and a loan of which the interest was to be paid out of the profits. Could anybody but a lawyer follow that distinction? Every writer who had referred to this part of the law had condemned it, and its maintenance surely could not be essential to our commercial prosperity.

MR. BOVILL said, that the law was not quite so unreasonable as had been stated by the Attorney General. The principle of the law was perfectly intelligible—namely, that a man who took the benefit should also sustain the loss. Every merchant and every lawyer would concur in that principle. It had been said over and over again that this was a Bill to establish limited liability. He was not opposed to the principle of limited liability, but the object of this Bill seemed to be to absolve persons from all liability; in fact, it might be designated as a Bill to enable capitalists to commit frauds on the public. By its provisions a capitalist might place £10,000 in the hands of a person of skill, agreeing to remunerate him with £500. Large and gradually increasing commercial transactions might be carried out, and so long as they were prosperous the capitalist might draw out all the profit beyond the £500; but let the reverse be supposed, let there be a loss, the capitalist would withdraw his contribution, would be absolved from all liability, and leave nothing for the creditors. It was a mere farce to say that the capital could not be withdrawn. The Bill provided for no such thing. If an example were required he would refer to the large cotton speculations lately carried on in India. It had been said that the House had in two previous Sessions approved the principle of the Bill. In the Bills of 1862 and 1863 safeguards were provided, but the House was asked to read this Bill, and then send it to a Committee, and leave them to make such insertions as they chose; but against that course he protested. According to the Bill, a man who subscribed £10 or £10,000 might sweep away the whole of the profits and leave the ordinary creditors without any remedy. In the Bills both of 1862 and 1863 provisos had been introduced for the protection of the public, which were omitted from the present measure. There were in those Bills clauses which provided that all partnerships should be registered, and that no partner should withdraw his capital unless the debts were paid; but the present measure contained no such clauses. It would simply enable capitalists to lend money and reap the advantage without incurring any portion of the loss in the event of failure. His hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General said that credit was given not so much upon the security of a name as upon the security of a business; but that security was utterly fallacious if the capital could be withdrawn and nothing left for the creditors. He repeated that all the securities contained in the former Bills were removed from the measure then under the consideration of the House.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that the House had twice assented to the second reading of Bills precisely the same as that they were then discussing.

MR. BOVILL: The Bill, when it had first been introduced, had been read a second time and had then been abandoned; and it had, upon a subsequent occasion, been referred to a Select Committee, who had introduced into it a number of Amendments which had been struck out of the present measure. It was said that this was a very slight alteration of the law, but he could not regard it in that light. He contended that the Board of Trade were bound, before introducing the Bill, to see that it contained those guarantees for the safety of the public which were recommended by a Select Committee of the House, and which it contained when introduced by private Members. In the interest of the public he should feel it his duty to give to such a proposal the most decided opposition; and he should cordially support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Tamworth.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that the object of the Bill might be very briefly stated. It was to distinguish between lenders to a firm and members of a firm. To a certain extent the law distinguished between them now. If a man lent money and received for it a fixed rate of interest, he was not liable for the debts of the borrowers; but if, instead of a fixed interest, he received a share of profits, then he was liable, although he never was, and never intended to be, a partner in the concern. As the law at present stood, it made some lenders partners in spite of themselves, and in spite of the truth of the transaction. That was a defect which the present Bill was intended to remedy. It separated the lender and his liabilities from the partner and his liabilities. If, as his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Bovill) had urged, in illustration of his objections to the operation of the Bill, a man should advance a sum of £10,000 for the purposes of trade, and should pay a man £500 a year to carry on that trade, he was in reality the trader, and would therefore be responsible as such. The case adduced by his hon. and learned Friend had, therefore, nothing to do with the present question. Assuming that a man who advanced £10,000 was a real lender, where was the distinction between a man lending that sum at a fixed interest, and his doing so for a portion of the profits? The same argument was applicable in either case. The present Bill would define who was really a lender and who was really a partner, and would make clear that which at present was in a great degree confused. Every single inconvenience which his learned Friend had supposed was as applicable to, and was as likely to arise under the present state of the law as under this Bill. The whole subject really lay in a nutshell. The Bill would make a great improvement in the present state of the law, and he hoped the House would pass it.

MR. THOMAS BARING said, he agreed with the Solicitor General that the question lay in a nutshell, and the nutshell was this—should a system of trade be established in this country, under which a man should be enabled to get any amount of credit he chose, to trade to any extent, and when a time of misfortune came, should be able to withdraw his capital and leave the public to bear the loss, by turning round and saying “I am not a partner but a lender.” The system of trade hitherto had been to inculcate on our traders that everything depended on their integrity and prudence. A man in trade hesitated now before he rushed into speculation, because he knew that he would risk the whole of his capital and his future prospects, and it was this knowledge that had made the British merchant prudent and calculating. It was true that you could not even under a system of unlimited liability get rid of all frauds, but this was no argument against the adoption of every necessary precaution. Two-thirds of the trade of the country were carried on upon credit, and this rendered necessary all the safeguards which could be provided against plans to deceive the creditor. The commercial system of this country drew a distinction between limited liability in individual private partnerships, and from the same principle in great concerns which could not be carried on by individuals. The latter had always been sanctioned in one shape or other by Act of Parliament, Royal Charter, or, lately, by the system of limited liability; but hitherto this House had always rejected proposals for applying the same system to individual partnerships. This measure was without any of the safeguards contained in former measures which had been proposed. It was, therefore, necessarily

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, its object was to remove the toll as far as the foot passengers were concerned. The whole sum which had been advanced out of the Consolidated Fund for the construction of Battersea Park had been recouped; and the fund which remained was applicable to setting the bridge free. To the working classes especially this would be a great boon; as, since the improvements on the north side of the river, they had been obliged in large numbers to seek for dwellings on the south side of the Thames. One of many similar cases had been brought under his notice, in which a man living in a £20 house and paying £3 10s. taxes being obliged to cross Chelsea Bridge every day with his two sons, expended an amount which at the end of the year came to £3 18s., or actually more than all the taxes upon his house. The proposition of the worthy Alderman (Mr. Alderman Solomons) the Member for Greenwich to do away with the tolls upon metropolitan bridges generally went far beyond what the present measure asked for. It was not advisable that the Government should remain in possession of a toll-paying bridge, and he hoped the House would allow the Bill to be read a second time upon the understanding that by so doing they were not pledged to the principle, but that the measure should go to a Select Committee, with a view to devise some means for recouping the Consolidated Fund for the loss occasioned by the abolition.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir John Shelley.)

MR. BENTINCK said, it often happened that when those distinguished Gentlemen, the metropolitan representatives, came forward with financial proposals they were looked upon with some suspicion, because suggestions were made that might be beneficial to their constituents and injurious to the public purse; and he believed the present to be a proposal of that character. Some years ago, for the convenience of the locality in question, a sum of money was advanced out of the Consolidated Fund on the faith of tolls to be levied on the bridge. Until that money was entirely repaid there ought to be no diminution of the security so given.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY observed, that all the money had been repaid.

MR. BENTINCK said, if that were the case the toll would at once cease. He desired to promote the interests of the working classes, but there might be another motive for the proposed change, and that was the increased value that would be given to the property on the other side of the bridge. He concluded by moving that the Bill be read that day six months.

MR. BANKS STANHOPE seconded the Amendment, as he could not consent that public money should be taken for such a purpose.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Bentinck.)

MR. COWPER said, the chief fault he found with the Bill was that it was too short. It consisted simply of one clause of only two lines, providing that, after a certain time, the foot toll should cease. It ought, he thought, to have an addition made to it, providing that the money which would be lost by the proposed abolition of tolls should be made good out of a local rate or some other local fund. It was quite clear that the Government could not support, as it stood, a measure which would entail a sacrifice of £96,000 to the public revenue, but if the hon. Baronet would consent to refer the Bill to a Select Committee—as a somewhat similar Bill had been—who might suggest some plan for recouping the money, he should have no objection to vote for the second reading, for he should be glad to see the poor relieved, as far as possible, from the necessity of paying these tolls.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, he could not understand how the right hon. Gentleman could vote for the second reading of a Bill of which, as it stood, he so entirely disapproved. He could not see how Chelsea Bridge could be placed in a different position from Waterloo or Lambeth Bridges, or why, if the poor were to be relieved from the payment of tolls in the case of the one, they should not be freed from them in the case of the others also. As for the plea that the working men would be benefited, was it not a fact that the moment the tolls were abolished the rents would be raised? The abolition of the toll at this one bridge was a jobbing piece of favouritism, which would place the House in an absurd position. He was decidedly against the payment of all tolls, but then he thought they ought to be abolished on some general principle.

MR. HENNESSY said, he had to express his astonishment that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not present to protect the public revenue. If an Irish Member were to ask for £96,000 out of the Consolidated Fund for the purposes of Ireland he would be looked upon by the right hon. Gentleman as a mendicant. There was not the slightest necessity for the Bill, which sought to effect for the metropolis, what the House would be loath to do for any other part of the Empire.

MR. WHALLEY said, he thought the proposal of the First Commissioner of Works to refer the Bill to a Select Committee was a most reasonable one.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, it was his intention that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, when there would be an end of it if it was found that no means could be devised to refund to the Government the £96,000 in question.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 27; Noes 14: Majority 13.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS BILL—(No. 33.)

REFERRED TO A SELECT COMMITTEE.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON moved that the Order of the Day for the House to go into Committee on this Bill should be discharged with the view of submitting the measure to the consideration of a Select Committee. In the event of the Motion being agreed to, he would next move that it be an instruction to the Committee to hear counsel on behalf of certain petitioners against the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Order of the Day discharged, and Bill referred to a Select Committee.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON suggested that the Select Committee should consist of the following Peers:—

The Archbishop of Canterbury, The Bishop of London, The Earls Granville, Derby, Devon, Stanhope, Powis, Ellenborough, Harrowby, Carnarvon, and Clarendon, and Viscounts Eversley and Stratford de Redcliffe.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH desired to be excused from serving on it.

EARL STANHOPE said, he did not rise to object to any of the proposed names, but he thought the system of nominating Committees without any previous knowledge on the part of the House of the list of the Members was most unsatisfactory. He suggested that the mode followed in the House of Commons should be adopted by their Lordships, and that Committees should not be nominated until after the names of the Members had appeared in print in the Business Paper of the House. He would on a future day bring this matter under the consideration of the House.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he thought it was desirable that some change should take place in the nomination of Select Committees of their Lordships' House, and that at least one days' notice should be given.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, that if it was intended to make the proposed alteration, the sooner it was done the better. He proposed that the appointment of this Committee should be deferred until after the alteration had been made.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON said, he would not ask their Lordships to name the Select Committee until Thursday next, and in the meantime he would give notice for the names.

And, on Thursday, May 4, the Lords following were nominated of the Committee:—

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY (IRELAND) ACT AMEND- MENT BILL—[BILL 65.]

COMMONS' AMENDMENTS CONSIDERED.

Commons' Reasons for disagreeing to a certain Amendment made by this House considered (according to Order).

THE EARL OF ST. GERMANS moved that their Lordships should re-consider their determination with regard to their Amendment in the second clause. This Bill had passed the House of Commons without a dissentient voice. Here it had been referred to a Select Committee, on whose recommendation a most important part of the second clause was struck out by a small majority. He hoped their Lordships would now allow the Bill to pass in the shape in which it came up to this House, and he would therefore move that they should not insist on their Amendment.

Moved, not to insist on the Amendment to which the Commons disagree.—(The Lord Steward.)

LORD CRANWORTH said, he wished to enter his protest against the course proposed by his noble Friend. The facts of the case were these—It appeared that in Ireland railway companies could be made bankrupts, whereas in England the law was otherwise. Upon the faith of the law being as he had stated, a certain party entered into a contract with a railway company, under the impression that if the company failed to pay him he could make it bankrupt. Now, the Bill had been introduced to assimilate the law of Ireland, so far as railway companies were concerned, to England. That he (Lord Cranworth) did not object to. The measure, when it left that House, proposed to alter the law as regarded prospective contracts only. The other House had, however, so amended their Lordships' Amendments as to make it have a retrospective action. Now it might be quite right to enact prospectively that railway shareholders should never be liable in this way; but by the recital of the Bill it was stated, and the Bill enacted, that they never had been liable. If their Lordships assented to the Bill as it now stood, he thought they would be acting discreditably as a House of Legislature. They would, in fact, be declaring that though they knew what the law actually was, it should be held to be quite the reverse. He thought that their Lordships would lower themselves in the estimation of the country if they assented to any such proposition. He would therefore move that their Lordships insist on their Amendment.

LORD ST. LEONARDS entirely agreed that it would be contrary to all principle that a retrospective Act should take away the rights of an individual to a certain remedy, and he should support the Motion of his noble and learned Friend.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that the existing law left the whole of the railway companies of Ireland completely at the mercy of any of their creditors. That was a monstrous injustice as far as the sister country was concerned. The fact was that the Legislature, he believed, never intended to give any such power to creditors over railway companies, and that it was a mere oversight in drawing the Act. He believed that the party to whom his noble and learned Friend had referred had not been deceived. He believed that he had entered into the contract not knowing that he had the power of making the company bankrupt; but afterwards found his mistake and discovered that he could proceed against the company in bankruptcy. He did not admit that there was any mis-statement in the recital. He hoped their Lordships would accept the Bill as it had been returned to them by the Commons.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that he had heard no satisfactory answer given to the Reasons assigned by the Commons for objecting to this Amendment. Some hardship was probably to be apprehended on both sides ; but it never could have been the intention of the Legislature in 1857 to do that which now seemed to be contemplated by the words of the Act.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, that the contractor in question alleged that he had obtained various opinions, and thus became aware of the liability of railway companies in Ireland to bankruptcy. That being so, it would not be right to take away from this man the remedy which the law gave him and on the faith of which he had acted.

On Question, Whether to insist ? Their Lordships divided :—Contents 33 ; Not-Contents 43 : Majority 10 :—Resolved in the Negative.

PROTEST

Against not insisting on the Amendments made by this House to which the Commons disagree.

(No. 23.) COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee read.

Moved, That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee on the said Bill—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD REDESDALE said, there were several serious omissions in the Bill as it stood at present—for instance, there were no powers for making adequate approaches to the Courts of Justice proposed to be built. The proposal at present was simply to take a large plot of ground without any better approach from any quarter than the Strand in its narrowest part, which, as their Lordships knew, was crowded to excess at certain times of the day. This was a matter in which £700,000 was to be expended on the site, and the question was whether another £700,000 would not be required for making the approaches. And then with regard to the buildings themselves their Lordships had no estimate whatever before them. He believed there never was a proposal for the expenditure of a large sum of public money on which so little explanation had been given. If the money that should be voted by Parliament proved insufficient, an extra grant would have to be made from the public funds. He did not think the Bill should receive the sanction of that House without further inquiry, and therefore he should move that it be referred to a Select Committee, who should be empowered to report upon the question of approaches and other points which needed elucidation.

Amendment moved

To leave out all the Words after the Word ("That") and insert ("the Courts of Justice Building Bill and the Courts of Justice Concentration (Site) Bill be referred to a Select Committee, such Committee to inquire and report as to the probable Cost of the new Courts and the Buildings connected therewith, and what new Approaches to the proposed Site will be required, and the probable Cost thereof.")—(The Lord Redesdale.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Motion."

LORD ST. LEONARDS supported the Amendment. One of the Bills relating to the subject of the Courts of Justice provided money, the other dealt with the buildings; but each had a portion which belonged to the other. There were so many points which required investigation, and upon which so little information had been supplied, that it would be quite impossible to discuss the two Bills properly in a Committee of the Whole House. His only object was that the entire subject should be thoroughly investigated.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that one great objection to sending this Bill to a Select Committee was that the Lord Chancellor, who took so much interest in the subject, could not find time to attend the Committee. He trusted that their Lordships would not agree to the Amendment.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE wished to know how the Government arrived at the conclusion that seven acres of land in the heart of London could be purchased for £700,000. The site of the General Post Office, which occupied only a single acre, cost a million. There ought to be a Committee to inquire into this subject.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, that not only any private gentleman, but any Prince—Cræsus himself—would be very imprudent to begin to build a great palace without an estimate of the cost. The House, however, was asked to build not one palace, but half-a-dozen, each as large as the Vatican, for the purpose of making comfortable accommodation for 3,000 barristers, 2,300 attorneys, and 50,000 gentlemen whom they called their staff. Why, there was no one who did not feel satisfied that the design of these various works—to combine these various Courts—would be one of the greatest undertakings submitted to any architect since the time of Michael Angelo. But he saw no Michael Angelo now—he saw no architect of the most ordinary capacity who was to perform this work. One of the wisest statesmen of former days was reported to have said, "Stay a little, that you may make an end the sooner." But the passing of the present Bill would be not the end, but the beginning. They could not tell how long the work would last or how many millions it would require. Louis XIV. when he set about building Versailles, burnt all the estimates, and he was quite right. The Government did the same, or rather they said they would have no estimates at all. The matter did not much concern their Lordships, but would be for those who came after them. Their Lordships would never see this great Palace of Justice, although they might have to pay a portion of the cost. They would never expatiate in those Courts—they would never see the common law and equity lawyers flying into each other's arms and effecting a fusion of law and equity, not by Act of Parliament, but by casual intercourse as they walked through its ample passages. Those who came after them would say how carelessly and recklessly their Lordships began that great expenditure, and they would censure them for not having made due inquiry before entering upon such a work. He confessed that when he first looked at this Bill he was strongly opposed to it. He felt most unwilling to remove the Courts of Common Law from the position at Westminster which they had held from the time when they were first made stationary. He was sorry ever to see that the Queen's Bench had been removed from its former position at the end of Westminster Hall, in which Court the battle of the Constitution had been fought quite as much as in that or the other House of Parliament. At the same time the evidence led him to the conclusion that there was a grievance in a want of comfort in some of the Law Courts which practically impaired the administration of justice. That was the consequence of the continued neglect of successive Governments, which had made no provision for the new Courts they had called into existence, and the additional requirements of the old Courts. He was not, therefore, hostile to the measure; but he cautioned their Lordships against beginning blindly a course of expenditure of which they would never see the end, and for which they would be deeply censured by those who came after them.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that unquestionably their Lordships would never see an end of this work if they never made a beginning. The noble Earl said it would be better to wait a little. Why, they had been waiting for forty years — forty years of inquiry, of talk, and of obstruction — and at last they had come to the threshold of the undertaking. Now, again, there was the same cry of a lion in the path, and their Lordships were told not to do anything and to wait a little longer. For himself, he was not disposed to fold his hands any longer. Inquiry was a prudent thing, and so was calculation; but there had been all the inquiry possible, and all the calculation that could be obtained from the most experienced persons had been laid before Parliament. The Government had been much indebted to the Commission issued by the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby). That Commission made the most diligent inquiry, and they reported not only the results of their own investigation, but also the inquiries that had preceded their own. He had, on a previous occasion, stated to their Lordships that a Committee of the House of Commons in 1841 had diligently examined the subject. An estimate of the value of the land and buildings made at that time gave an outlay of not quite £700,000. Under the Commission issued by the noble Earl, Sir Charles Barry, and a local surveyor examined the whole of the site and went from house to house. They estimated the value of the land and buildings at about £670,000. Subsequently to that Report the Government commissioned two architects and surveyors—Mr. Hunt and Mr. Pennethorne—to make another estimate, and they stated that the cost would not exceed £700,000. The noble Earl (the Earl of Hardwicke) was thinking of the value of land upon a different site; but this site was covered with houses, many of which were of the lowest character, inhabited by persons who would not dare to present themselves to receive compensation for honest trades and a livelihood obtained by honest means. Thus, all that could be done had been accomplished to obtain a satisfactory and reliable estimate. He could see no advantage whatever in referring this Bill to a Select Committee. It would be impossible to add to or to alter the Bill without disturbing the whole plan of the measure. It was impossible to lay down what portion of the seven acres of land would be required or could be dispensed with. When the expense of the buildings and land was ascertained he had no doubt a considerable portion of land would remain, part of which might be dedicated to the improvement of the approaches from the Strand. It must also be remembered that uncertainty with regard to a great measure of this kind actually debarred a number of minor measures of improvement from being brought forward. When the Bill now under consideration was proposed, in 1861, its introduction was immediately followed by that of another measure, originated by a private company, for the removal of Holywell Street and the widening and improvement of the Strand. This was but a specimen of the proposals which might be expected to follow since this great public undertaking had been actually entered upon. To postpone the Bill again would be to lose the Bill, and the hopes of the public and the profession had been foiled so often that he was unwilling to do anything which might imperil its success, now that the opponents of the measure, even those most reluctant to believe in the merits of the scheme, had been compelled to do so by the force of evidence with which they were confronted. It was the greatest measure of legal improvement that he had known during his life, and after it had passed through so many perils and overcome so many difficulties the country would have reason to feel annoyed if, by the indefinite postponement of the third reading, the hopes excited were once more doomed to disappointment.

On Question, Whether the words proposed to be left out shall stand Part of the Motion? their Lordships divided:—Contents 55; Not-Contents 32: Majority 23:—Resolved in the Affirmative.

Then the said Motion, "That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee on the said Bill," was agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 4 (Plan of Building, and Arrangements for Care and Maintenance of Building.)

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, the Bill provided for the establishment of a Board of twenty or thirty persons, who were to decide upon the accommodation to be provided for the several Courts. With such a Board he thought there would be endless confusion. It would be much better to have a Commission of some two or three persons with some architectural knowledge, who would hear the persons representing the different Courts, and apportion the accommodation amongst them.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, he thought it was requisite to have such a Board to allot the space and determine on the accommodation to be provided. It would be better for the Board of twenty or thirty to call before them two or three architects than for the two or three architects to call before them the twenty persons representing the different Courts.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 7 (£200,000 to be contributed out of money to be provided by Parliament as the value of Courts and Offices transferred, and of Relief of Rent to the Public).

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, that the clause seemed to contemplate that property worth about £200,000 would come into possession of the Crown, and would be disposable for other purposes. This, however, would not turn out to be the fact. For instance, the Law Courts and other buildings adjoining Westminster Hall were worth perhaps £80,000; but instead of the public coming into possession of that sum, it would turn out, most probably, that the architecture of the building would be altered, and an expenditure incurred of £1,000,000.

After a few words in answer from The LORD CHANCELLOR,

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 8 to 15 agreed to.

Clause 16 (Chancery Compensations may be redeemed, or paid out of the Capital of Court Funds.)

LORD ST. LEONARDS complained of the proposed diversion of the Suitors' Fund for the purposes of the Bill, and said that the Lord Chancellor ought not to have the power, and ought not to wish for the power, of sanctioning any such application.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL contended that the Fund was clearly at the disposal of Parliament.

Clause 22 (Discontinuance of existing Courts and Offices.)

LORD ST. LEONARDS gave notice that he would move its rejection on the bringing up of the Report.

PROTEST

"1st. Because, although the provision made for the cost of the site and of the buildings is limited to £1,500,000, there is no information given which affords any assurance that this calculation has been made on any reliable estimate.

"2nd. Because the proposed site is unsuited for the architectural effect of a building which, on account of the purposes to which it is to be applied, and the expenditure to be lavished upon it, on account of the fall of ground from north to south being so considerable that on two sides uniformity of elevation cannot be preserved, while the frontage, as at present proposed, will be on the east, opposite to mean houses in Bell Yard, and on the north to wretched buildings in Yeates and Horseshoe Courts, and on the back of Lincoln's Inn in Carey Street.

"3rd. Because the above statement as to the boundaries of the site now to be acquired at the enormous cost of from £700,000 to £750,000, and the want of all decent approaches to it from any quarter but the Strand, which is already one of the most overcrowded thoroughfares in the metropolis, must satisfy all who give attention to the subject that much more property must be purchased and a far larger expenditure incurred than that already provided for.

"4th. Because these facts prove that the site is in many respects an unsuitable one, while it is notorious that others can be procured affording excellent general accommodation at less than half the cost, and free from all the above-mentioned objections.

"5th. Because it is proposed to tax the suitors in certain Courts, in order to raise part of the money required, whereas, if any is to be obtained from those using the new Courts, it would be far more properly supplied by a percentage levied on solicitors' bills, counsels' fees, and Judges' salaries, these being the persons for whose supposed convenience this extravagant outlay is more particularly demanded, while the necessity of any such change would be avoided by a reduction in the expense of the work consequent upon the selection of a cheaper site.

"6th. Because, it appears to me, it is the duty of the House to inquire into these matters, and to be satisfied as to the probable cost of the proposed Courts, and of any approaches to the same which may be necessary in connection therewith, before it sanctions a scheme which calls for so large and so uncertain an expenditure.

House adjourned at Eight o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

BAND OF THE COMMISSIONAIRES.

QUESTION.

MAJOR STUART KNOX said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether it is true that the permission accorded to the Band of the Commissionaires to play in St. James's Park has been withdrawn; and, if so, on what grounds, and for what cause; and, whether any Correspondence has passed on the subject; and, if so, whether he has any objection to lay it upon the table?

MR. COWPER: Sir, in reply to the Question of the hon. and gallant Member I have to state that some of the inhabitants of New Street, Spring Gardens, Spring Garden Terrace, and Carlton Gardens remonstrated on account of the annoyance which they stated they experienced from the playing of these bands just in front of their windows. Although the Street Music Act does not apply in precise terms to the band playing on that side of their houses in the Park, yet it appeared to me that it did apply in spirit, and I thought, out of deference to the Act of the Legislature in passing that statute, that it would not be right to grant permission to this band to play in front of the houses in question, as they had been allowed to do before the passing of the Act. The withdrawal of the permission previously given—for the permission was only annual—was not made by means of correspondence, and I have, therefore, no correspondence on the subject which I can lay upon the table of the House.

MAJOR STUART KNOX: I would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether he is aware that the permission was worth £1,000 a year to the Commissionaires, and whether he will grant a piece of ground within St. James's Park, away from the houses, during this season, and see whether any objection will be made to such a course?

MR. COWPER was understood to say, that he would take the subject into consideration.

QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY TRACY said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to make any alteration in the carriage of treasure on board Her Majesty's Ships, and in the distribution of the freight money arising therefrom, and when they will state to the House their intention concerning it?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET, in reply, said, it was the intention of the Board of Admiralty shortly to lay upon the table of the House a plan in reference to the conveyance of treasure by Her Majesty's Ships.

DRAINAGE ACT (IRELAND) 1863.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN STACPOOLE said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, If it is his intention to introduce a Bill to amend the thirty-eighth section of the Drainage Act of 1863, which limits the Power of the Board of Works in Ireland to make advances to any Drainage Board to one moiety of the amount proposed to be expended by such Board; and, if so, when he will be prepared to introduce the Bill?

MR. PEEL said, in reply, that the Board of Works in Ireland had power to lend money to the amount of one-half of the cost of the drainage works in a drainage district, and as the Government rent-charge for the repayment of that loan took precedence of every other claim, the proprietors of the district were placed under some difficulty in raising the other half; and he proposed, therefore, to introduce a Bill for the purpose of giving the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland the power to lend money to the whole amount of the cost of the drainage works.

EDUCATION—MINUTE OF COUNCIL.

QUESTION.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he had given notice that he would move the following Motion:—

“That the modification of Article 93 in the Education Code, 1865, according to a Minute of Council of the 11th day of March, 1864, by which the reduction of Public Grants to Schools by the amount of any Private Endowments is suspended only in the case of small Rural Schools is unsatisfactory.”

He would now beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether it is his intention to introduce a new Minute which will remove the distinction between Rural and other Schools in the Minute of March, 1864, relating to the reduction of Grants to Schools by the amount of any Endowments?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he was sorry that his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education was not present; but in reply to the Question which had just been put, he might state that he believed that it was his right hon. Friend's intention, in the course of a very few days, to lay upon the table of the House an altered Minute to the effect stated by the right hon. Member.

MR. ADDERLEY said, if it was to be understood that an opportunity would be given to discuss the new Minute when it was introduced he would withdraw the Motion of which he had given notice.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, certainly an opportunity would be given to discuss the new Minute, and if its provisions did not meet the right hon. Gentleman's wishes he could again introduce the Motion which he was to have moved that night.

MR. ADDERLEY said, on that understanding he would beg to withdraw the Motion.

INDIAN OFFICERS.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

CAPTAIN JERVIS rose to call attention to the petitions which had been presented by the officers of the late Indian Army. He said, it would be in the recollection of the House that last year, in consequence of a discussion which took place, the Secretary of State for India stated that it was his intention to carry out to the full, and in every particular, the Report of the Royal Commissioners who had been appointed to inquire into the various grievances brought before the notice of the House by the officers of the Indian army. After such a pledge as that had been given it was a very serious question to find, a year afterwards, twenty-three general officers, over 240 field officers, and more than 500 officers of lower ranks, not one of whom could have served less than seven years in the East Indies, should have thought proper to petition the House that the Report should be carried out. On ordinary occasions the mere fact of 750 officers petitioning a Government, from the general officer to the subaltern, and a large proportion filling high ranks in the service, was a very serious question for consideration, either for England or any other nation in the world. Where such a large number of officers felt the necessity of forwarding petitions, there must be a large body in addition who coincided in their opinions, but who preferred to wait and see what was done in the matter. When the House came to consider that this had occurred among the officers commanding Native troops in India, they would see it was a matter which could not long be postponed. It was not many years since the Native troops of India mutinied throughout the whole of our dominions from suspicion of the acts of the British Government. Whether it arose from the intrigues of the Court of Persia, the confiscation of Oude, or the greased cartridges, it arose from deep suspicion in the minds of the Sepoys, with regard to the intentions of the British Government. We kept repeating they had no cause for distrust, yet no sooner had we conquered them than the local European army mutinied, and the very troops who had assisted us to fight our battles were obliged to be disbanded. Distrust had caused their mutiny, and this was not relieved when, after being disbanded, and as soon as they reached these shores, they found our recruiting officers ready to re-enlist them. Now again we find discontent in the local service in India from 1860 to 1865. But this time it is the officers of the whole local army. He did not know which feeling was the greater—his admiration for the loyalty of these officers, or his surprise at the measures which had been taken to drive them to despair. They had trusted to Parliament as loyal Englishmen, and up to the present time had acted as British officers should do, relying upon the fulfilment of the promises given to them. He trusted it would be shown that their faith had not been misplaced. The right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles Wood) asked him (Captain Jervis) last year whether it was usual in other countries that officers whose services were not required should be kept on full pay, and then the right hon. Gentleman said they ought to be placed on half-pay or got rid of altogether. Now he (Captain Jervis) wished to state that this could not have taken place in any other army in the world, for this simple reason, that there was no other army in the condition of the servants of the late East India Company. In every civilized as well as every barbarous country men were either bound to take up arms, or they volunteered and became part and parcel of what was called the army of the country; but what was the army of the East India Company? They went into that service with certain distinct arrangements by which they were to receive certain pay so long as they remained there and did their duty, and they were to receive a certain pension when they left, and there was no analogy between their case and that of any other army. When it was considered politic that the power possessed by the East India Company should be transferred to the Crown one difficulty was, how to provide for the army which we had permitted the East India Company to raise. The army belonging to this Company was, to speak in plain language, nothing more nor less than a body of mercenaries who had entered as servants into the employ of a number of merchants. In order to protect our interests as well as of those servants, Acts of Parliament and Orders of the Board of Control were passed, by which a certain system of wages, discipline, and promotion was guaranteed to these men. Originally on these gentlemen entering the service a distinct agreement on parchment between the directors and themselves was drawn up. This practice, however, fell into disuse, not because the respective parties failed to observe it, but simply because Parliament interfered in 1796, and promised to every man who entered the service the enjoyment of certain rights and privileges as long as he performed his duty. In 1858 a Commission was appointed to inquire into the organization of the army then serving in the pay of the East India Company, and to report as to the terms on which it was to be transferred to the Crown. On that Commission were the hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel), then Secretary of State for War, the Commander-in-Chief, the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley), then Secretary for India, and a number of Members much respected by the country. The Report of the Committee was as distinct as any Report possibly could be. They said—

“The privileges and advantages thus referred to are detailed in the Appendix, but may be briefly stated to consist in a prescriptive right to rise strictly by seniority to the rank and emoluments of colonel of a regiment, with the option of retiring before attaining that position, or after various periods of service, on a scale of pay or pension considerably higher than that granted to officers of your Majesty's army of the line. No change, therefore, can be made which would in any way disturb the system of promotion by seniority as affecting officers now in the service, or interfere with any of their existing privileges; but the 57th section of the above recited Act gives to your Majesty full power to frame new regulations on this and all other points, to be applied to the case of officers and others who hereafter may enter the Indian army."

When the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles Wood) became Secretary of State for India he also brought in a Bill upon the subject, in accordance with the feeling generally entertained in the country, and while that Bill was before the House, the right hon. Baronet accepted a clause at the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), which the right hon. Baronet seemed to regard as unnecessary. As Secretary of State for India, he said he felt himself bound to maintain all the pledges that had been given, but nevertheless added he would accept the clause in deference to the opinion of the House. That statement was made in the House on the 30th of July, 1860, and yet on the same day the right hon. Baronet had signed the appointment of a Committee to which was to be referred a plan to overthrow all he had pledged himself to carry out. Within a short time that Committee reported adversely to the wishes of the right hon. Baronet, as follows:—

"We do not understand in what manner any change can be introduced into the existing system of promotion in the local army of India without an infringement upon the guarantee contained in the 56th and 58th clauses of the Government of India Act of 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 106)."

In spite of his own Committee reporting against him, the right hon. Baronet sent out a despatch to India, establishing the system which he probably regarded as correct, but which was in reality utterly opposed to the guarantee which had been given. No sooner had the despatch reached India and made public by the Governor General, than it excited the most extraordinary interest throughout that country. Every man in the service felt that the pledges of Parliament could not be relied upon, that not any of those promises upon the fulfilment of which they so confidently depended would be carried out, and the service believed they were a ruined body of men. No less than 278 questions were sent by Governors of Provinces, General Officers, and others, to the Governor General of India, with a view to obtain an explanation of the despatch. The Governor General did his best to satisfy the questioners and to settle the matter, but his answers to no fewer than sixty-nine of the questions were disputed by the Secretary of State for India at home. This plan had evidently been dwelling in the mind of the right hon.

Baronet for some considerable period. When the Bill under Lord Derby's Government was brought into the House, a very able discussion took place, and among others who drew the attention of the House to the subject, was the right hon. Gentleman the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman said —

"The Bill of the late Government did refer to the Indian army; and I must confess that the manner in which the reference was made, made me devoutly to wish that no reference had been made to it at all. I do not mean the extension of the European force serving in India; that is a matter, however, which may ultimately prove much more difficult than we have yet been accustomed to acknowledge; but rather the manner in which it dealt with the Native army properly so called. As regards that army and its officers they were no longer to be in the Company's service, nor, practically, were they to be in the Queen's service. No provision was made with regard to that vast body, upon which we must, under all circumstances, place a great part of our reliance, both for the maintenance of order and the defence of the country. It appeared, according to the provisions of that Bill, that the whole of that great Native army, including the body of officers by which it is commanded, was not to be a Queen's force nor a Company's force, but a mere local force, of a secondary character, deprived in a great degree of the military spirit which necessarily follows and is fostered by belonging to a distinguished service, even as if it were no more than an ordinary constabulary or police force in England. . . . I want to know in what position you are about to place the Indian army, what provision you are going to make to give full scope for its energies, and to enable it to hold that rank and title in the eyes of the world and Europe to which it has a right. These are difficult questions; they involve the entire question of the re-organization of that army, and yet they cannot be excluded from consideration in a final scheme for the government of India."—[3 Hansard, cl. 1628.]

What did the scheme of the right hon. Baronet provide? It entirely destroyed the regimental seniority and substituted a Staff Corps, one of the most extraordinary productions that ever emanated from the mind of man. They all knew what a Staff Corps at home and what the Corps d'Etat Major were, but if they were the same as the Staff Corps appointed by the right hon. Baronet he (Captain Jervis) had not in any way the slightest acquaintance with the service. The warrant authorized the formation of a corps from the ranks of which were to be filled the different appointments which belonged to the Staff, whether civil or military. But what did it next do? The right hon. Baronet issued an order which was contrary to the advice of every great man who had been in that country. The complaint that had always been made was that officers had been abstracted from their regiments for Staff duties, yet by this Staff Corps only six officers were left to each regiment. Having done that, he issued an edict by which the regular regiments were to be turned into irregular regiments; and then he framed a Staff of corps officers to command these irregulars, displacing the whole of the local officers. The Staff officers under this rule were about 1,300, and the number of local officers, who were in a state of disgust, numbered about 2,000. So many petitions were presented that a re-consideration of the question was thought desirable, and he moved for the appointment of a Committee. The right hon. Baronet met that by the proposal of a Royal Commission. At that time he (Captain Jervis) was told by some hon. Members who supported the Government that the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for India had misled him; but his reply was that he must trust the word of the right hon. Baronet until his statement was proved to be incorrect. He should like to draw attention to the way in which that was done. It was said that a Committee would take so long that it was necessary to get rid of the whole affair as soon as possible, and therefore a Commission was best. A Commission was appointed, and Lord Dalhousie was made Chairman, but afterwards resigned, and then the right hon. Baronet appointed as Chairman a learned Lord. He did not complain of such an appointment, but he thought that the subject was one which hardly fell within the province of lawyers. That Commission, however, having been appointed in May, sat, and in November following made a Report. At the commencement of their inquiry the Commissioners, being very properly anxious to dispose of the business as speedily as possible, addressed to him through their secretary a letter asking him to procure from the officers of the Indian army who were then in Europe a statement of what they considered were their grievances. That was not a very simple task when it was remembered that the officers were on leave, or invalids, and were scattered over England and Europe. However, a clear and succinct statement of grievances was drawn up, and a classification of all the petitions that had been presented to Parliament upon the subject was also prepared. The main grievance was the supersession of the right of promotion by seniority. The Report of the Commissioners admitted that the complaints of the Indian officers were in some cases well founded, and in others that they were not proved. The right hon. Baronet said that of the thirteen grievances submitted to them eight did not exist, two were doubtful, and three were substantial. The hon. Baronet, however, took care not to point out that the one great and real grievance, the supersession of rising by seniority, was confirmed by the Commission. The great grievance had been admitted by the Commissioners, and therefore the result of the inquiry was against the right hon. Baronet. It then became a serious subject for consideration with the right hon. Baronet and the Government what steps should be taken, and it was impossible to avoid a certain sympathy with the right hon. Baronet when he declared that the grievances of the officers of the Indian army had given him ten times more trouble than all the other business connected with India had done. But who was it that had created that difficulty? It certainly was not the officers themselves, and if the right hon. Baronet had considered who those officers were, he would have refrained from treating them as he had done. They had it from Sir Hope Grant that he scarcely knew an officer who, after fifteen years' service in India, was not suffering in health from the effects of his service. Those officers were men who had suffered many perils and losses during the mutiny; they were comrades of those who were slaughtered by scores when they stood by their regiments; they were husbands and relatives of ladies who fell victims to the atrocities of Cawnpore and Delhi, and surely such men deserved better treatment. How was it that the amalgamation of the Indian army with the British army was brought about? The Indian army at first was but a mere band of mercenaries, who entered into the service of the East India Company upon condition of receiving certain pay and pensions quite different to the terms upon which the British army was raised. That army could not be regarded as having been when first formed worthy to be amalgamated with the British army. They did not ask for amalgamation; but they were considered worthy by reason of their great deeds and their heroic bravery during the last hundred years, and the right hon. Baronet had no right to treat brave and honourable men as he had done. The right hon. Baronet accepted the Report of the Commissioners. He had established a Staff Corps in which a captain obtained, after twenty years' service, the rank and pay of a major, and after twenty-six years' service the rank and pay of a colonel. He had thus created an extraordinary supersession; broken up the whole system of promotion by seniority—the friendly and fraternal arrangements of the mess—by which sympathy was established between man and man—and placed the right hon. Baronet himself, as he had declared, in a painful dilemma. To remedy this evil the right hon. Gentleman sent instructions to India that the officers of the local army were to receive brevet rank, after the same periods of service for which the Staff Corps got substantive rank—namely, rank without pay. In the English army brevet rank to a certain extent did exist, and when an officer received brevet rank, he was content with the respect of his comrades, and cared little for the miserable sum which was due to his nominal rank. But in the Indian army the case was wholly different. Brevet rank in India, when it was given by wholesale, meant only so much gold on the officers' collar and sleeves, which he had to pay for and there was an end. The despatch in which the right hon. Baronet had conveyed those instructions to India was nothing more than a defence set up against the Report of the Royal Commissioners, but there was no opportunity afforded to the officers of the Indian army of making any answer. But how had the right hon. Baronet dealt with the Commission itself? When he (Captain Jervis) was invited to send in a statement of the grievances of the Indian officers he was also asked to send in a list of witnesses. The statement was prepared and duly forwarded to the Commissioners. Those gentlemen sent it to the Secretary of State, who forwarded to the Commissioners a statement in reply. That statement the Commissioners were anxious to forward to the committee of Indian officers for their observations, but the Secretary of State refused to assent to that course. The Commissioners assumed a perfectly correct conclusion upon the question as it was presented to them, but possibly they would have changed some of their views had they had a fuller statement of facts before them. Upon the bonus question the statement on the part of the Secretary of State was that the system which had arisen in the regiments in India of purchasing out the seniors, was illegal, and had not been sanctioned by the Court of Directors. But if the right hon. Gentleman had referred to information to be found in his Office he would have ascertained that that statement was not correct. That system had been encouraged by the Court of Directors, and had been sanctioned by the Board of Control. Was there any reason for the extraordinary measures which had been adopted? The right hon. Baronet had talked about the difficulty that arose upon the breaking up of the Bengal army. Upon that point his own Council did not agree with the right hon. Baronet; for in a Report, dated the 30th of June, 1859, and signed by Mr. Willoughby, Sir John Lawrence, and three other members of the Council, it was stated—

“The Madras and the Bombay armies exist nearly in their original integrity, and it is a palpable fallacy to speak of the Bengal army as so completely defunct that the assurance of Parliament is inapplicable to the large body of its European officers—men who have evinced the utmost devotion under the most trying circumstances, many of whom rendered eminent service to the State, and all of whom are temporarily employed in the command of a force, European and Native, equal, and even superior, in amount to the strength of the Bengal army before the mutiny of 1857.”

The right hon. Baronet in his despatch talked about what had been done for these officers in keeping them upon full pay and employment. But he would remind the right hon. Baronet that there was no such thing as half-pay known to the Indian army. In England, the army existed only from year to year, and Parliament of its bounty had created a system of half-pay and pensions, which it could terminate at its pleasure. But officers in the Indian army entered for a service of twenty-two years on full pay, and at the end of their service they were entitled to their retirement. If the right hon. Baronet had only spoken from what he found in this country his mistake would have been intelligible, but he was assisted by Sir William Mansfield, who in 1859 had stated that what was necessary for the Indian army was to cast aside all Parliamentary guarantees, and a re-organization of the whole service. But what did Sir William Mansfield tell him? Why that half-pay was unknown in the Indian army, and to place them on half-pay would be a violation of the pledges given by Parliament. Thirty-three years ago there was a searching inquiry into the affairs of the East Indies, when it was a matter of serious consideration whether we should not do away with the East India Company, and take their army over to ourselves. It was then stated most distinctly by the East India Company that there was no such thing as half-pay in their army, and that their great difficulty in reducing their army was the necessity of keeping the officers on full pay in the cadres of their regiments. When the right hon. Baronet received the Report of that Commission there were two things which he might have done. He might have broken up the Staff Corps, and replaced the officers in their regiments, which would have been the legal thing to do, or he might have placed the rest of the officers in the same position. There could be nothing more serious than to weaken the trust which military men placed in the pledge of a Government; and what were likely to be the feelings of the British army, who had no security but the word of the Government, if they saw an Act of Parliament passed deliberately over in this way? He had not taken up this case without deep consideration, and he had taken care not to communicate with any individual officer, beyond the Members of the Committee, because he felt how serious a matter it was to have a large body of military men in a state of discontent. He hoped that this matter would be so arranged that the British army would not turn round on them and say, "What are you going to do with us?" He was struck very forcibly with the spirit of discontent and dissatisfaction which was excited at the time when it was proposed to amalgamate a regiment of Tipperary Militia with the Royal Artillery, and if that feeling could exist among men domiciled at home, what must be the feeling of men several thousand miles away from home? He left this question in the hands of the House, trusting that they would look to their honour and to the guarantee. The hon. and gallant Gentleman concluded by moving—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying She will be graciously pleased to redress all such grievances complained of by the Officers of the late Indian armies as were admitted by the 'Commission on the Memorials of Indian Officers' to have arisen by a departure from the assurances given by Parliament by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 106, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 100."

SIR CHARLES WOOD: I have sometimes been accused of being unwilling to rise until late in these Indian discussions, but on this occasion I am desirous of presenting myself to the House at the earliest possible moment, not only to answer the Motion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, but to state the general course which has been pursued by the Secretary of State in Council upon the various questions connected with the Indian army. For there are other questions besides the amalgamation — there is the alteration of the whole organization of the Indian army, and the extraordinary reduction of that army. The three measures were carried into execution at the same time, and many of the complaints which have been ascribed to the amalgamation are really referable to the change of organization and to the reduction. I entirely concur in the high terms in which the hon. and gallant Gentleman has spoken of the officers of the Indian army. They were entitled to the greatest consideration from the Government, and if I could admit for a moment that the Government had behaved to them in the manner which the hon. and gallant Gentleman states, I should feel myself most guilty in the eyes of this House. But I do not hesitate to say—and before I sit down I trust to have proved it—that the result of the measures taken by the Government on the whole have placed the officers of the Indian army in a far better position as regards pay and promotion than they ever were in before. I am anxious to state this, not only to remove the false impression which exists on this subject, but also for the sake of those members of my Council, some of them Indian officers, by whose advice and with whose concurrence all these measures have been taken, and who, connected as they are with the Indian army by sympathy and by common services, have been accused of neglecting the interests and feelings of that army. Quite independently of any Parliamentary guarantee, their very natural feelings would have prevented their allowing any hardship to be inflicted on their former companions in service. The hon. and gallant Gentleman has said a great deal about the number of petitions which have been presented, and if I supposed that these petitions really expressed the opinions of the officers whose names they bear I should attach more weight to them. If I thought that the grievances were not repudiated by some of the officers in whose behalf they are put forward ["Name, name!"], I should think them of more importance. The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that a system of agitation and of invitation to sign petitions has been going on for some months past. Not very long ago an officer came to the India Office and talked over the changes which had been made, and said that the new arrangement had very much improved his position. Soon after that the petitions were inspected, and it was found that his name was signed to one of them. ["Name, name!"] Certainly not, I shall not give the name.

CAPTAIN JERVIS: Then it will be my duty to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the circumstances under which this officer's name was attached to the petition.

SIR CHARLES WOOD: In a matter of this sort I shall certainly not shrink from the hon. and gallant Member. Not long ago I received a letter from an officer whose name I will give. It is from Colonel Cherry, a lieutenant-colonel commanding a regiment in the Madras army. He writes to me thus—

"Saugor, Central India, March 22.

"Sir,—I write to inform you that a pamphlet headed 'Another Grievance,' has been printed, in which the author has used my name in the most unwarrantable manner, citing my case as a grievance. I beg to state it was composed and printed entirely without my knowledge, authority, or consent. I never knew anything of it till a printed copy was sent me. It is quite illegal, as the printer's name is not put on the pamphlet. I have no grievance, and have never petitioned, and am very much annoyed at my name being so used.

Believe me, &c.,

P. G. CHERRY,

Colonel 4th Madras Light Cavalry."

The hon. and gallant Member will not say that in this case I have not given the name. Next on the list to Colonel Cherry is the name of Colonel Kelso, and when it is stated that our measures with regard to promotion have injured every officer in the service, I would call attention to the case of Lieutenant Colonel Kelso, who is, nevertheless, a petitioner. In July, 1861, Colonel Cherry was lieutenant-colonel, and Mr. Kelso was a captain; but in consequence of the accelerated promotion which our measures have produced, in six months from that time Captain Kelso became a lieutenant-colonel, passing over altogether the rank of major. Three years after—namely, in the spring of this year—Lieutenant Colonel Kelso retired. Now he happened to be in a peculiar position. In consequence of the arrangement which I made last year for striking off the names of majors in the Staff Corps and new Line regiments when they rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, it so happened that three regiments had an interest in getting him to retire. The system of bonus, of paying for retirements, has not, as is stated, altogether ceased in India, and if I am to believe the Madras papers, Colonel Kelso has benefited to a considerable extent by the contributions from the officers of three regiments, in order to induce him to retire. He retires on a lieutenant-colonel's pension, and then he petitions the House of Commons, says he is hardly used, and his grievance is, that certain officers retiring on special bonus have not been removed from the list, whereas, if they had been so removed, he might now have been in the receipt of a colonel's allowance. Now, in the Madras army the ordinary time which an officer passes in the rank of major is seven years, and the ordinary time passed in the rank of lieutenant-colonel is twelve years more. Therefore, if nothing had been done out of the ordinary course, in all probability this officer would have reached his colonelcy in nineteen years from the year 1861; yet he now petitions Parliament on the ground that beyond the great acceleration of his promotion, and the extraordinary advantage he has received, something more has not been done which would have enabled him to obtain a colonel's allowance in four years from the time of his being captain. I do not think that is what Parliament will consider a legitimate grievance. A statement was sent round to Members of Parliament a few days ago, in which two or three cases are specially referred to. I should be glad if the House would permit me to enter into those cases as a specimen of the grievances which those officers complain of. The first grievance on this list is stated in these terms—

"Captain W. Winson, a captain in the Bengal Staff Corps, now commands the 18th Regiment Native Infantry, and has under him Major R. Larkin, of the late 49th Regiment of Native Infantry."

Now, if that has any meaning at all, its meaning is this—that, contrary to the practice of the Indian army, we have put a captain of the Staff Corps in command of an irregular regiment over the head of his senior officer, a major. Supposing that it was in consequence of orders from hence that this had been done, it would not be contrary to the practice of the Indian army, because it was always the custom in the East India Company's service to disregard rank in the command of irregular regiments. I turn to the Army List of 1856—the year before the mutiny—and I find there that the 3rd Irregular Cavalry was commanded by a lieutenant, the second in command being a captain; and that the 14th Irregular Regiment was commanded by a captain, a major being second in command. If, therefore, we had given orders for making the arrangement which is complained of, we should only have been acting in accordance with old practice in the time of the East India Company. In point of fact, we have done quite the contrary. We have given orders that no officer shall be required to serve under his junior unless with his own consent; so that this major serving under a captain can only be doing so entirely with his own consent. The next case is that of Major Spottiswood, who is stated to have been superseded in command by Lieutenant Browne, but, for the reasons I have just stated, the lieutenant could not have been put in command over him. And, in point of fact, Lieutenant Browne was in civil employment, and not in any military employment at all. The third case is thus stated—

“In the 46th Regiment Madras Native Infantry, the third captain, Alfred Cooper, was superseded not only by two captains junior to him, but also by the senior lieutenant, A. M'Neill, who was made a substantive major in the Staff Corps.”

Now, what is meant by this statement is explained in a note in one of the grievance pamphlets, where it is stated that it is only substantive rank which counts in these commands. This is directly the reverse of the fact, for a despatch of December, 1863, lays down the rule that it is not substantive rank but army rank which gives the right to command. In this case also Lieutenant M'Neill was in civil and not in military employment. In neither case, therefore, could any supersession in command have taken place. The supersession in rank is completely remedied by our subsequent measures. It has been made a charge against the Secretary of State that he withheld from the officers all knowledge of the points which he was bringing under the notice of the Commissioners; but, on reference to their Report and the Appendix, it will be found that the Commissioners very properly made the officers aware of all the points mentioned by the Secretary of State, and called upon them for their explanations. Appendix D contains the questions of the Commissioners, Appendix E contains the answers of the officers in detail. I am not going into the question of bonus, as the Commission has distinctly reported that on that point there has been no breach of the guarantee. The hon. and gallant Officer, however, says that I misled the Commission by stating that the bonus was an illegal proceeding. Now, of course,

I did not state that upon my own authority or my own legal opinion. I stated it on the authority of two decisions in the Court of Queen's Bench, both of which had been reported. The hon. and gallant Officer shakes his head, but he will find the cases reported in the newspapers. In both cases there was an action by an officer to obtain payment of the amount of a contribution towards a bonus, which was refused by the officer who had undertaken to pay it. In both cases the defence was that the transaction was an illegal one. I have the report of one of the cases before me, and I find the statement of the defendant to be substantially this, “I won't pay the money though I promised to do so, because it was an illegal transaction, and you cannot compel me to perform an illegal bargain.” I say nothing of the conduct of the officer who made such a defence; but that was the defence, and I refer to it and the judgment of the Court to show that I was justified in stating the opinion by which the hon. and gallant Gentleman says I misled the Commission. The Lord Chief Justice, in giving judgment in the first case, said—

“The Court must take cognizance of what offices were legally saleable, and they knew that a commission in the East India Company's service was not legally saleable, and no rule of the Indian service could repeal the statute. There must be judgment for the defendant.”

In The Times newspaper I find the following report of a subsequent case which came before the Court on the 4th of June, 1855:—

“A rule was immediately obtained for a new trial in the Court of Exchequer. After taking time to consider, judgment was given by the Judges on the 4th of June, 1855. In the unanimous opinion of the Bench, the transaction by which a sum of money was secured to the major of the regiment to which these officers belonged, to induce his retirement, was illegal, and the bond given by the defendant could not be enforced by law. The transaction amounted to the gift of a money consideration to an officer holding a commission in the East India service to induce him to leave it. It behoved the Court to let it go forth that, in its opinion, any tampering with the sale of a public office not only rendered the transaction void, but subjected the parties concerned to the penalties consequent on the commission of a misdemeanor. There must, therefore, be judgment for the defendant.”

Well, Sir, I beg to say that I do not think I misled the Commission, and I do not think I misled the House, by what I said on the subject of the illegality of the payment of bonuses, when a Court of Law had stated, in language as strong as any which could be used, that such payment was illegal. I am not speaking in favour of the officers who made the defence; I am speaking of the illegality of the transaction. Having now disposed of these separate points, I will refer to the general terms of the Motion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman. He calls upon the House to vote an Address to the Queen for the redress of all the grievances of the Indian officers, admitted to be such by the Royal Commissioners, but he has not made any attempt to show that the grievances have not been redressed with respect to the cases in which he says I have not fulfilled the promise I made to accept the opinion of the Commission and to act upon it. I will not refer to those cases only, because that would not give the House a fair idea of the difficulties we had to surmount, or the way in which we have dealt with them. I will state the whole course which we have pursued from the first in order to effect the three great measures of amalgamation, change of organization, and reduction of the Indian army. After long and anxious deliberation with the members of my Council we made up our minds what should be done, and despatches were prepared containing all the instructions for carrying out our plan. The whole of the documents and despatches were laid before the Law Officers of the Crown. We did not make a case for them, we merely submitted the papers to them and asked whether there was anything in the instructions which we proposed to give which was contrary to the pledge contained in the two Acts of Parliament. The then Attorney and Solicitor General and the counsel for the East India Company stated that, in their opinion, there was nothing in what we proposed to do which might not have been done by the East India Company, and whatever the East India Company might have done it was within our power to do. Fortified in our opinion by that answer to our question, we proceeded in the course we had determined upon with considerable confidence. Various complaints were afterwards made of the effect of these measures on the position of a portion of the Indian officers, and as I did not wish to stand only on a legal and technical construction of the words of the Acts of Parliament, I referred the question to the Commission which has been alluded to. I do not know whether the hon. and gallant Officer meant that blame attached to me for having appointed a Law Lord to the Chairmanship of that

Commission, but I may state that when the state of Lord Dalhousie's health (who had been appointed Chairman of the Commission in the first instance) precluded him from attending their sittings the Commissioners themselves asked me to appoint somebody of legal knowledge and acquirements to the vacant place, and therefore, in nominating Lord Cranworth to the position, I merely complied with their request. I am sure the House will be of opinion that no fairer or more impartial person could have been appointed Chairman than Lord Cranworth, and I am glad of having the opportunity of expressing my obligation to that noble Lord, and to the rest of the Commissioners, for the care and attention they bestowed upon the matter. It is perfectly true, as the hon. and gallant Gentleman says, that the Commission classed the alleged breaches of the guarantee under thirteen heads. They stated that in eight of these there was no just cause of complaint, that in three others there was cause of complaint, and that in two others there might possibly at some future time be cause of complaint. I can unhesitatingly state my belief that in the three cases in which the Commission reported actual causes of complaint to have occurred, I have completely remedied the grievances complained of. In one of the two cases, in which the Committee stated that cause of complaint might hereafter arise, it is quite impossible that up to this time any grievance can have been felt for the rule under which they thought that cause of complaint might arise, has not come into operation. In the cases where there were grounds for complaint which it might be impossible to deal with directly, the Commissioners stated their opinion that it would be fair to give some compensatory advantages to the Indian army, and that this would be a redemption of the pledge given to Parliament; and I trust that, before I sit down, I shall show that, in respect to any possible retardation of promotion in a particular rank, more than ample compensation has been given, as the acceleration of promotion generally and the amount of additional pay given to the Indian army during the last four years has been unexampled. In speaking of the three measures with which we had to deal, amalgamation, change of organization, and reduction, I shall endeavour to keep them entirely distinct. As to the first measure, which is termed amalgamation, I think I shall be able to show that no cause of complaint can now exist with reference to it ; and, in making that statement, I may rely upon the admission in the statement now put forward by the officers themselves, that the only complaints which could be said to have any connection with amalgamation have been fully met by our recent measures. The word amalgamation does not exactly express what was done in the matter. What really was done was this. The three old European regiments of Infantry in each of the three Indian Presidencies were invited to volunteer for general service, they being already Queen's troops by the measure of the noble Lord. The soldiers, almost to a man, and nearly the whole of the officers, accepted the proposal. For example, in the three first regiments of each Presidency, out of 119 officers ninety-nine volunteered either for the new Line regiments or for the Staff Corps, and of the remainder eight were already in Staff employment leaving only twelve to be disposed of. The nine regiments thus formed were added to the regular army. A similar course was taken with regard to the three Cavalry regiments, which were formed out of the newly raised regiments of Europeans. Nearly all the officers and men volunteered, and vacancies were filled up in them, as in the Infantry regiments, by volunteers from the rest of the army. Every man who joined did so of his own free will, and I must therefore be permitted to say that, although I have seen some newspapers endeavouring to invent grievances for them, I do not see what possible cause of complaint they can have. It was a voluntary proceeding on their part. They are officers in Queen's regiments, with the right which they had in their old regiments of rising by seniority, and they retain the privileges of the old Indian officers as to retirement and pensions. The Artillery, with hardly any exceptions, volunteered for general service. Their organization was assimilated to that of the old Royal Artillery, which gave them considerable promotion and advantages. The Bengal Artillery, for instance, had thirty-nine field officers before the change, and forty-eight afterwards. The whole of the increased pay and emoluments of the Artillery in the three armies of India given to them in making the late changes amounted to about £75,000 per annum. The only officers who could suffer in any way were some of the older officers, and additional pensions of £200 per annum were offered to them, on which, I think, seven officers retired. A similar course was pursued with regard to the Engineers. The increase of pay and emoluments in their case amounted to about £55,000 per annum. In the mode which I have thus described the European Infantry and Cavalry, as well as the Artillery and Engineers, became part of Her Majesty's general army by their own voluntary act, with an increase of pay and of promotion and retaining their right to retire on the Indian rate of pension. It seems to me that on their part there can be no cause of complaint. There was, however, one measure adopted, and it is the only one to which the expression of "amalgamation" can properly be applied. It was thought desirable, as all the officers of the Queen's and of the late Indian armies were now to receive the same commissions from the Queen, and to be eligible for the service in any part of the world, that the field officers should rise on one list to be general officers. The commencement of this system was postponed so far that it seemed impossible to say whether they would gain or lose by it. The Royal Commission, however, reported that this step was in breach of the Parliamentary guarantee. As the warrant had not come into operation there was no difficulty in cancelling it. Nobody could be injured. The warrant was therefore cancelled, and the Indian officers rise to the rank of general officers as before. It is admitted by the officers themselves that this grievance is completely remedied. There was another complaint admitted by the Commission to be a breach of the guarantee not, indeed, arising out of amalgamation, but as it is connected with the formation of the new Line regiments I may as well mention it here. The Indian officers complained that the non-removal from the cadres of their regiments of the names of officers who joined the Staff Corps or the new Line regiments was a breach of the guarantee. The Commission reported that it was not so as regarded those who joined the Staff Corps, or as regarded those who joined the new Line regiments from the cadres of the European regiments ; but that it was a breach as regarded those who joined the new Line regiments from Native regiments. I cannot understand the distinction, but we accepted their view, and removed the latter class from their cadres. This step is also admitted to be a complete remedy. Now these are the only two grievances complained of which have the slightest reference to amalgamation, and I wish particularly to impress this upon the House, because I know that there is a general notion that the alleged grievances arise out of the measure which I myself carried of amalgamation. It is, however, from other measures to which I will refer by-and-by, that any grievances arise which are now said to exist. Out of amalgamation it is not now even alleged that any case of complaint remains. The other two measures we had to carry out were the changes in the organization and a very large reduction in the army. It will be obvious that it must have been within the power of the East India Company to effect both these changes, and that the power which they possessed was transferred to us in all its entirety. On that point the Commissioners said—

“It could not have been intended to prevent the Crown, if in the interests of India and of the Empire at large it should deem it necessary, from reducing the numbers of the Indian army or altering its organization. It would have been in the power of the Company to make such reductions and changes, and a similar power was transferred to the Crown.”

It only remains, therefore, to show how we acted in the exercise of what was unquestionably within our power. I will proceed, in the first instance, to explain the change which we have made in the organization of the Indian armies, an essential part of which was some such measure as the formation of a Staff Corps. The hon. and gallant Officer has talked of the Staff Corps as if it were an extraordinary and unheard of anomaly; but now let us see how that matter stands, and what were the reasons for its creation. In order to arrive at any just estimate of the merits of the system which we have introduced, it is essential to look back to that which existed before. In the Indian army as it existed before the mutiny—and that is the fairest period to take, in order to understand the former state of things — there were two descriptions of force, the regular, and the irregular regiments differing in their organization in several respects, but mainly in the number of officers. Including the armies of the Presidencies, the contingents, and other forces, there were 176 regular and 108 irregular regiments. We have substituted irregular for regular regiments throughout the army of Bengal, where, indeed, the regular regiments had almost disappeared in the mutiny. We have done the same in the army of Bombay, and intend doing so with the army of Madras. Under the old system of the Indian army there were twenty-three officers to each regular regiment, of whom five were placed there, not for duty with the regiment, in order that they might be available for Staff employment. A large number of officers, in political, civil, and other employment, and all officers of the irregular regiments, were, under this system, withdrawn from their own regiments. It will be remembered that this was described as almost the ruin of the Indian army. It was stated that the élite of the officers—the picked men—were taken away from their regiments, and those who were left were kept back and discouraged. I might quote the opinions of many very distinguished officers of the Indian army, expressed in the strongest terms to that effect, but I do not wish to do so, because it might be painful to some to hear the expressions that were used. But I may be permitted to quote a short paragraph of a letter from Lord Elphinstone, which will be found in one of the papers on the table of the House, and which states the case very clearly. Lord Elphinstone says—

“The best regiments in Bengal were the Irregular Cavalry, and the same holds good throughout India. In these regiments you had only three or four English officers, but they were picked men, and so were the Native officers. I would apply this system to the whole Native army—Infantry, as well as Cavalry. The saving of expense would be great, for, if I am not mistaken, one regular Native Cavalry regiment costs as much as three times the number of irregulars. But the saving of expense would be nothing compared to the gain in efficiency.”

That is the opinion of Lord Elphinstone, who had been Governor of Madras and was then Governor of Bombay—a man of very considerable experience, and who showed by his conduct during the mutiny how sound his judgment was on such subjects. That extract shows that, in his opinion, by adopting generally the irregular system, the efficiency of the army would be improved, and no inconsiderable expense saved. In the state of Indian finance at that time, with a large yearly deficit, the saving of expense was no trifling consideration, and the same reason is hardly less strong at present. When the whole change is completed, the saving effected by substituting irregular for regular regiments will be no less than £330,000 per annum. We, therefore, determined on this step. It was no measure of mine, pressed by me upon an unwilling Council. The great advocate of the change was Sir John Lawrence, and it was adopted by a large majority of the Council. It then remained to be determined how officers were to be provided for the regiments so formed, as well as for Staff employment generally. The question of providing officers for Staff employment in some other manner than by withdrawing them from their regiments had often been discussed in India, and it was pretty well agreed that the only means of doing so was by the formation of a Staff Corps. Lord Dalhousie was anxious to carry some such measure into effect when the army existed in its original state. There was, of course, great difficulty in the way; but when nearly the whole of the regular regiments of the Bengal army had ceased to exist the difficulty was very much diminished. In 1860, there were 106 regular, and 131 irregular regiments in existence; we acted on the opinions so long entertained and confirmed by the great authority of Sir John Lawrence; we put the army on the irregular system, giving six European officers to each regiment instead of three. Then came the question from whence were the officers for the irregular regiments to be drawn. In truth, there was no resource but that portion of the British army which passes through India in its course of service—there was no other body from which they could be taken. Lord Elphinstone had pointed this out very clearly in the letter which I have quoted before, and Lord Clyde, Sir William Mansfield, Sir Hugh Rose, and Sir Robert Napier all concurred in opinion that, as soon as we had room for the employment of line officers, we should find no difficulty in obtaining their services. At present there is no room for more Line officers than were already in Staff employment, as there are plenty of Indian officers—either in the Staff Corps or available from the cadres—for all the places of Staff employment. There are, however, several Line officers in Staff employment. Now, it is obvious, as regards officers of the Line, who would naturally quit India with their regiments, that in order to retain their services for India they must be withdrawn from their regiments and formed into a corps devoted to Indian service and at the disposal of the Government in India for the various

Staff situations in political, civil, or military employment. The formation of a Staff Corps, in order to retain the services of the officers of the Line, then in Staff employment, and in which all Line officers wishing for permanent employment in India would be placed, and as the only source from which ultimately, when the officers of the late Indian armies cease to exist as a separate body, all officers for such employment must be provided, was therefore a matter of necessity. We might certainly have formed a Staff Corps, consisting only of Line officers, but would it have been right to exclude from it all Indian officers? I think that such a course would have given them a just cause of complaint, and therefore it was determined to admit into it also those officers of the Indian army who were in Staff employment, or had been so within three years. The next question was how the officers of the Staff Corps were to be promoted. There could be no establishment, because the number of persons required for Staff employment might vary. If the army was increased more officers would be wanted, if diminished fewer would be required, and in like manner as more or fewer officers were required for the various civil and political situations which have at all times been filled with great advantage by military men. It followed, as a necessary consequence, that the numbers of the Staff Corps must vary with the demands of the service. There could, therefore, be no possible mode of promotion except by length of service. The Commission to which the hon. and gallant Member referred, which was presided over by my noble Friend opposite (Lord Hotham), on the question of amalgamation, made a Report, from which I will read some extracts in reference to this question of a Staff Corps. They said—

“A Staff Corps to be formed for service in India, to consist of an unlimited number of officers of all ranks. All officers of the local armies and of the Line now holding permanent Staff or detached appointments, excepting such as are purely military, but including service with irregulars, to have the option, subject to the approval of the Indian Government, of being transferred to the Staff Corps or returning to regimental duty. . . .

... Promotion in the Staff Corps to be governed by length of service, and to be irrespective of departmental position. . . . The whole of the officers of irregular Native corps to be on the Staff list. . . . We conceive, however, that officers so circumstanced must hold a commission for their substantive rank in lieu of their former regimental commission.”

We have done what is there recommended. We offered to all the officers of the Indian army who were in Staff employment, or who had been so within a certain time, the option of going into the Staff Corps. We went one step further. We thought it not unfair to give to those officers who had been in Staff employment the benefit of that service as regards promotion as if the Staff Corps had been formed when they went into Staff employment. It is this step which in fact has led to the complaint of supersession. I fully admit that it was the case that officers transferred to the Staff Corps might rise more rapidly in that corps than those who were senior to them in their regimental cadres, and might thus supersede them in army rank. They could not supersede them in regimental rank, for that went on as before, and an order was issued preventing a Staff Corps officer being in any case put over the head of an officer who had been senior to him in his old regiment. The only supersession was in army rank. I remember my hon. and gallant Friend behind me stating the case to me very fairly in this way. He said that at Bangalore, or some other station, there were several Staff Corps officers who had gained rank in this way, and that it was very possible that if their old regiments came there these officers might take precedence at a court-martial of some of their former seniors, or take command of them on parade, or in the field. I may be permitted to say, in justification of the course which we took, that there are examples enough of supersession in rank having been caused by different measures adopted in India under the rule of the East India Company. When my hon. and gallant Friend talks of what he calls the indisputable rights of the Indian officers, he seems to forget that on several occasions the East India Company showed by their acts that they did not recognize these alleged rights. There is none on which he lays more stress than the right of rising in a regiment by seniority. I fully admit that it was only in extraordinary cases that the general practice of promotion by regimental seniority was interrupted. But if the East India Company thought right on extraordinary cases, for the good of the public service, to depart from the rule, that is enough to show that seniority was not acknowledged as a certain and indisputable right. There are examples given in the statements of the officers themselves in which regimental seniority is entirely set aside. It is stated that in the Caubul expedition some regiments lost a great number of officers. One regiment lost four, another five. Four does not seem to be a very great loss in a regiment of eighteen or twenty. Were, then, the officers in the regiment always allowed to rise by seniority in India? ["Yes!"] No, they were not. There are three or four cases stated by the officers themselves, which show that officers from other regiments were placed over officers in the regiments there named. In the 5th Bengal Cavalry four lieutenants were placed above cornets in that way. [Colonel SYKES: They were boys.] Does the hon. and gallant Member mean to say that an officer forfeits his alleged indefeasible right of promotion because he is a young man? In the 5th Native Infantry there were a captain and five lieutenants from another regiment placed above all the ensigns. In two other regiments four lieutenants from other Corps were placed above all the ensigns. In all these cases the officers of the regiment, according to the proposition of my hon. and gallant Friend behind me, had an indisputable and indefeasible right to rise in their own regiment by regimental seniority; but that right was not recognized by the East India Company, and officers from other regiments were put over their heads in their own. We have done nothing of the kind, but I mention these facts to show that the assertions put forward as to these alleged rights are not so well founded in fact as they are asserted to be. We have not, in the slightest degree, interfered with regimental seniority. The officers of the Indian army continue to rise step by step on that basis. The cadet who went into the army in 1860, who has never seen a day's service, and had not even joined his regiment, will rise to the rank of colonel or general officer in a regular course by seniority, by successive steps, with the full pay of the successive ranks which he attains, and without any interruption from the day on which he received his first commission. I come now to other instances of supersession in former years. When the Royal Artillery went to India the East India Company thought it desirable to promote the majors of their own Ordnance Corps as that rank did not exist in the Royal Artillery, and they gave to all the majors of the Artillery and Engineers the substantive rank of lieutenant-colonels. The effect of this was that these officers superseded at one step all the majors of the Cavalry and Infantry of the Indian armies. The junior lieutenant-colonel of Engineers in Bengal superseded 118 majors, and all these officers got substantive rank in their corps. In 1824 the East India Company formed the second battalion of each regiment of the Indian army into a new regiment; and appointed to it half of the officers of the old regiment. In these new regiments the officers transferred to them might rise in substantive rank and pay above their seniors in the old regiment, thus superseding them precisely as an officer rising in rank in the Staff Corps might supersede an officer of his old cadre. Further than that, according to the practice of the East India Company, a lieutenant-colonel might be moved from one regiment to another, so that an officer who had risen rapidly to the rank of lieutenant-colonel in one of these new regiments might have been sent to command his old regiment and so be placed over officers who had been his seniors in that very regiment. We have done nothing of this kind. We have issued a positive prohibition against any officer being put in command of a regiment containing a man who has been his senior in the same regiment. We are accused of departing from the practice of the East India Company by superseding senior officers by juniors, while we have actually prohibited its being done. Now what the East India Company did in this case, of forming the new regiments, that is giving to a great number of officers substantive pay and rank in several new corps by which they might supersede in army rank the officers of the regiments from which they were taken, is precisely what we have done in giving substantive rank and pay in one other new corps by which they might in like manner supersede in army rank the officers of their old regiments. I mention these different cases to show that the Government had some justification for the course they pursued regarding this grievance of which the officers complain, and that we only did what the East India Company had done in repeated instances. The Commission, however, reported that in their opinion this was a breach of the guarantee. Their statement of the complaint is as follows:—

in the Staff Corps, which was the inevitable consequence of the rules regulating promotion in the Staff Corps, and especially of that which allows previous Staff service to count towards the period of service qualifying for promotion in the Staff Corps.”

I accepted their opinion. The question then was how to remedy it. The hon. and gallant Officer has referred to one course which certainly was possible and would have been effectual—namely, cancelling the rank given in the Staff Corps. The gallant Officer behind me (Colonel Sykes) advocated this course, but I never heard of any one else who did so. He stood alone. It would, I think, have been a grievous hardship to have deprived many of the best officers in the Indian army of the rank which they had enjoyed for more than three years, besides which to have sent them back to their regiments would have been injurious in some cases to the officers who had remained with the regiments. The only alternative, therefore, was to give to the regimental officers the same army rank as the Staff officers had obtained. I consulted his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief upon the question, because it was one which not only affected the position of the officers of the Indian army, but also that of the officers of the Line. The Duke of Cambridge has shown the greatest consideration for the Indian officers, and has done his utmost to consult their interest in every way. His Royal Highness concurred in the opinion that this was the best mode of dealing with the question. It had been always the custom in the Indian army when a lieutenant had served fifteen years to give him the brevet rank of captain, and to lieutenants in the line of the same standing the local rank of captain was given. It was determined to follow this precedent. Brevet rank to the regimental officers of the Indian army, and local rank to the officers of the Line serving in India was given from the date of the formation of the Staff Corps, so that from that date the whole of the officers of the Indian army, including the Staff Corps, will be promoted in army rank after the same periods of service. The Bombay Government remonstrated against this order as causing some supersession of the Staff Corps' officers, and of some fortunate officers who had been lucky in obtaining their promotion, and their remonstrance was sent to the Government of India who referred it to Sir Hugh Rose, the Commander-in-Chief in India. Sir Hugh Rose, an officer who has taken the greatest possible interest in the whole of this question for four or five years reported upon it to the Governor of India, and I may be permitted to read his opinion upon the mode of meeting the grievance which we adopted. It is as follows :—

“ Under the measures directed by the right hon. the Secretary of State, the chief cause of complaint, as frequently brought to the notice of Government by his Excellency—namely, the supersession of regimental officers by their juniors of the Staff Corps—has been removed entirely. It may at the same time be observed that, while some officers will continue to suffer supersession, the privileges now conferred on the army generally are specially advantageous to the officers who have not joined the Staff Corps, and to those who have been unfortunate in their promotion. It is not for the Commander-in-Chief to question or discuss the measures deliberately sanctioned and directed by Her Majesty's Government in redress of the grievances of the officers of the Indian service, but his Excellency may be permitted to say that, without cancelling the amalgamation arrangements altogether, he does not think that a more equitable scheme could have been devised than that which the Bombay authorities desire to suspend.”

“ It is scarcely possible that extensive changes in the army should ever be made without unfavourably affecting the position of some individuals relatively—that is, as compared with that of some others—and the instance in question is no exception to this rule. But we think that there can be no doubt that, by the measures ordered in your despatch, substantial hardship in the matter of promotion is avoided.”

I do not know that anything that I can add could be more satisfactory or could be stated more clearly than that opinion of Sir Hugh Rose. I do not think, therefore, that I need say anything more upon this subject, and I beg the House to observe, that if this be so, the three cases in which the Commissioners reported that just cause of complaint had occurred are entirely remedied by the measures which we have taken on the Report of the Commission. In two of these cases it is admitted by the officers themselves that the grievances are completely remedied, and in the third I think that I have now shown that our remedial measure is not less complete. I come now to the last great measure which we took, and out of which arose two contingent grievances, if I may so call them—the reduction of the Indian army. It was within the power of the East India Company to have reduced their army as it was within our power ; and certainly, in the circumstances of the time, it would have been their duty, if the Company had been in existence, as it was our duty, to make that reduction. I doubt whether the House is at all aware of the extent of that reduction. The whole Native force, including the contingents, and other forces, numbered previous to the mutiny 265,000 men. Now, the only source of danger arose from our Native army. The princes and people were all faithful, and it was the army alone which caused our difficulty, and it was therefore clearly incumbent upon us to reduce that over-grown force. Nor was there any means of providing for the payment of the increased European garrison of India, which everybody considers to be indispensable, smaller in numbers, but far more costly than the Native army, except by diminishing the expense of the latter. This was accordingly done. The Native soldiers were discharged with pensions or gratuities. The officers are all retained on full pay. The gallant Officer has referred, not quite correctly, to what I have said about placing the Indian officers on half-pay, and has denied that there was any half-pay in the Indian army. I admit that there is no half-pay of the same character as that of the British army. What is termed half-pay in India is, in fact, a lower rate of pension. But what I have said, and I say again, is, that when the British army was reduced after the peace of 1815, a great number of officers were placed on the half-pay of their rank, and there they remained, were never promoted, or got anything more. The same thing occurred in the navy. The same thing takes place on any reduction—the officers are placed on half-pay. Now, I certainly stated this to show in how different a manner we had treated the Indian officers. I do not know why, if a large reduction had been made by the East India Company, they would not have been warranted in placing their supernumerary officers on some rate of pension proportioned to their pay. It is quite true that there never has been any great reduction in the Indian army. The continually increasing size of our Indian Empire never allowed of any large diminution of their military force. The only case of reduction complete in itself, though not large in amount, was the reduction of the St. Helena Establishment ; and in that case the officers received a retiring allowance somewhat more than the pensions of their respective ranks. I do not know why some such course might not have been taken on a reduction of the armies of India. We did not, however, adopt any such course. We have given—and this is the least advantageous position in which they can be placed—to all Indian officers full pay and promotion to the end of their career in the service. But we certainly thought that we were warranted in making some small reduction of officers on so large a reduction of the army, and it is out of the very mild measure for this purpose that the first of the possible breaches of guarantee, as stated by the Commission, may arise. We thought that with the reduction of the number of regiments, there might fairly be some reduction of the colonels' allowances. Let the House remember what colonels' allowances really are. In former times colonels were paid by the profits on the clothing of their regiments. If there were no regiments to be clothed there could be no profits for the colonels; and in like manner when an annual payment—the colonels' allowances—was substituted for the profits of clothing, the colonel's allowance would cease also when the regiment ceased to exist. We reduced the Native army by 135,000 men, or by 101 regiments, of which from sixty to seventy were regular regiments. Consequent upon this reduction was there to be no reduction of officers? The first question naturally was as to the possible reduction of the number of colonels' allowances. Upon this subject Lord Hotham's Committee, to which I have referred, reported to the following effect:—

“If in the process of passing from a war to a peace establishment any regiments are reduced absolutely, and the strength of the army reduced to a corresponding extent, then the number of colonels must necessarily be reduced also, and the number of allowances at the same time.”

Of course, we never thought of taking the allowances away from those who had enjoyed them, or of reducing them all at once. We did propose gradually to reduce the number of colonels' allowances. We proposed, in the first instance, to fill up only three vacancies out of four. It is not unusual, I believe, in cases of reduction, to fill up only alternate vacancies, but we gave a much larger proportion. This, of course, would have caused some retardation of promotion, as there would be fewer colonels' allowances to which officers could rise. Changes of various kinds, and of a complicated nature, were afterwards proposed, into which it is unnecessary that I should enter, and the ultimate arrangement was that there should be an unlimited number of colonels' allowances, but that lieutenant-colonels who attain that rank, after a certain date, should only attain to the colonels' allowances after a service of twelve years in the rank of lieutenant-colonel. This term was shorter than the average period in the Madras army, longer than that in the armies of Bengal and Bombay. The possible retardation arising out of this measure—for none has occurred as yet, and I very much doubt whether any ever will occur—is alleged to be a departure from the pledge to treat the Indian officers as the East India Company would have done. Now, it happens that the only reduction made in the East India Company's time, that I am aware of, was in 1828. In that year two lieutenants were reduced in each regiment. These officers were kept as supernumeraries in their regiments until by casualties among the officers above them they could be absorbed. Of course, till this was done, the promotion of all the officers below them was retarded. Our measure, therefore, by which some retardation of promotion might be caused, was in strict accordance with what the East India Company had done, and I can hardly admit this to be a breach of the pledge. Another measure, one of the effects of which was of a somewhat similar character, was also taken at the same time. We gave an extraordinary bonus, in order to induce the older officers to retire. About 300 officers accepted the terms, but we did not feel ourselves bound to fill up all the vacancies created by this extraordinary measure. We filled up only half the vacancies on the list of lieutenant-colonels, giving, however, all the other promotions consequent thereon. In consequence of this extraordinary scheme of retirement 49 officers were promoted to be lieutenant-colonels, 87 to be majors, 123 to be captains, and 190 to be lieutenants. It was considered by four members of the Commission that the retardation arising out of this measure might lead to a breach of the guarantee. Three members, including one of the two Indian officers, thought that when a costly measure of retirement entirely out of the ordinary course was given, it was not incumbent on us to fill up all the vacancies, and that it was only fair, when so large a reduction of the army was to be made, that some gradual reduction of the higher rank of officers should take place. I hope the other members of the Commission will forgive me for thinking that this is the more reasonable view of the case. I hope, too, that they will forgive me for saying that I do not think that any small retardation of promotion which may arise out of these two measures—firstly, not keeping up as many colonels' allowances as before, for an army reduced nearly to one-half of its former strength—secondly, not filling up all the vacancies caused by an extraordinary retirement can fairly be considered as a breach of the pledges given by Parliament. The only ground on which it is supposed that they may lead to it, is that they may in some degree retard the attainment of colonels' allowances. I doubt whether, in point of fact, any officer will be retarded, with reference to his whole period of service, in the attainment of his colonel's allowance. I will now proceed to show to what extent we have given increased pay and promotion to the officers of the Indian army, so that I believe I am fully entitled to say that never in its history was their position, in point of pay and prospects of promotion, so good. The Commission reported that if it was impossible to retain all the advantages enjoyed under the East India Company some counterbalancing benefit should be given in compensation for them. I do not know what I have taken away, and I will now proceed to state what we have given in pay, pension, promotion, in all that is of advantage to the officers; and I think the House will admit, when they have heard my statement, that what we have given is ample and more than ample compensation for any possible loss of advantage if, which I do not believe possible, that loss can be shown. I begin with pay. I have already mentioned the increased pay to the Artillery and Engineers; and I may now state, without going into particulars, that the whole charge imposed upon the revenue of India consequent upon the increased promotions and pensions recently given has amounted to a little more than a quarter of a million. That charge will, of course, be diminished as pensions fall off, but the immediate effect of our measures was to increase the pay, pensions, and emoluments, in one shape or another, of the existing officers to that amount. I come now to promotion, and in this respect I must say that it is not fair to consider only what may occur in one particular rank. The promotion given in the whole of an officer's career should be taken into account; and I will state to the House two or three examples of the extent to which promotion has been accelerated by the measures we have adopted. It must be evident that no measures can affect the highest ranks. Vacancies in the rank of colonels only occur by death, and the tendency in the Indian army, up to the time of the mutiny, had been to prolong the period of service. The length of service of the colonels at that period and now, is more than it was in 1849. But we could produce an effect upon the lower ranks, and more, of course, as we go down in rank. One of the complaints of the Indian officers was, that we had not removed from the cadres the names of the officers who joined the Staff Corps and Line regiments, and given promotion in their room. This would have led to the most unequal and unjust supersession. For instance, in one regiment of Bombay Infantry, the major, all the captains, and the three senior lieutenants, joined the Staff Corps. If the demand, made in the memorials from many Indian officers, had been acceded to, the fourth lieutenant would have at once become major. He was an officer of nine years' service, and he would have superseded the senior captain of the next regiment on the other side of the page in the Army List, an officer of twenty-one years' service. It is not a little remarkable that those who complain so violently of supersession by our measures, should have themselves proposed a measure which must have led to greater and far more unequal supersession than any which could have resulted from our measures. But the same objection does not apply to removing from the list of regimental field officers of the Indian armies the names of such officers when they attain the rank of lieutenant-colonel, for then, throughout all the regiments of the army, the promotion in their place goes equally in their turn. Every regiment gets its fair share of the promotion. After the Report of the Commission, and in addition to the measures for the remedy of the admitted complaints, we determined on removing the names of all Staff Corps and new Line officers from the before named lists on their attaining the rank of lieutenant-colonel and giving the consequent promotions to the regimental officers. The immediate effect of this step was to promote 35 officers to be lieutenant-colonels, and in 63 regiments captains got a step nearer to that rank. The prospective effect may be judged of from the fact that in the Bengal cadres there are now 82 majors, of whom 48 are in the Staff Corps or new Line regiments. They will go off those lists altogether on becoming lieutenant-colonels, and the promotion of the remaining number of majors in the cadres, that is, 34, will promote 82 captains. The immense effect of this measure in rapidly accelerating promotion is obvious. Since our measures have come into operation promotion has become much more rapid. I will compare the time of service in two ranks, that of lieutenant-colonel and major in the last year before the mutiny, and in the present year. The average length of service of the lieutenant-colonels in the three Indian armies on the 1st of January, 1857, and the 1st of January, 1865, were respectively—In the Cavalry—Bengal, 37 years 6 months and 37 years 3 months; Madras, 37 years 6 months and 35 years 3 months; Bombay, 33 years 3 months and 28 years. In the Infantry—Bengal, 36 years and 35 years respectively; Madras, 38 years and 37 years; Bombay, 36 years and 34 years. Then, coming to the majors, I find that the average service has diminished in the Cavalry—Bengal, from 33 years and 4 months to 22 years and 6 months; Madras, 34 years 4 months to 25 years 6 months; Bombay, 33 years to 29 years. So with regard to the Infantry, there has been a diminution in the average period of service of from four to five years, so that a considerable acceleration of promotion is clearly traceable to the operation of our measures. In 1857 I find that the 20 junior colonels of Bengal Infantry had obtained that rank in 44 years and 9 months. The 20 junior lieutenant-colonels in 1865 will attain the rank of colonel under the 12 years' rule in 38 years 9 months—an acceleration of 6 years. Now, let me call the attention of the House to this fact, as bearing upon the alleged hardship of the rule for 12 years' service in the rank of lieutenant-colonel. If the officer attains his colonel's allowance in the same time as before, but of that period passes 12 years instead of 10 in the rank of lieutenant-colonel, the additional 2 years in that rank must be deducted from the time of his service in some lower rank, and at any rate he gains the advantage of lieutenant-colonel's pay instead of the pay of some lower rank for 2 years; but if he attains the colonel's allowance 6 years sooner, then 8 years is to be deducted from his service in a rank below that of lieutenant-colonel—he gains for 2 years the higher pay of

lieutenant-colonel, and for 6 that of colonel's allowance. Surely so far from there being any cause of complaint, there is great advantage to the Indian officers from our measures. I will now compare the average length of service of the 20 junior lieutenant-colonels in the three armies on 1st January, 1857, and 1865. Their service was at the above periods respectively—Bengal, 34 years and 30 years; Madras, 36 years and 32 years; Bombay, 36 years and 30 years; showing a gain of 4 years in two Presidencies, of 6 in the other. The average periods passed in the rank of major has been diminishing to the following extent in the three Presidencies respectively, Bengal, 2 years and 8 months, Madras, 3 years and 8 months, Bombay, 3 years and 4 months. Lastly, let me take the number of promotions to substantive rank in the three Indian armies in the four years ending 1857 and the four years ending 1865, being the last four years of the ordinary state of India before the mutiny, and the last four years since the constitution of the Staff Corps and commencement of our measures, and I think the House will be astonished to find what an extraordinary increase of promotion has taken place. I find that there have been promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the first period, 84 officers, and in the last, 223; to the rank of major, 142 in the first, and 534 in the last period; and to the rank of captain, 585 in the first, and 616 in the last period; but, of the 585 captains in the first period, no less than 176 are due to augmentations of the army, leaving the natural promotions at the number of 409. I will not trouble the House with further details. I think I have shown that in respect of pay, pension, retirement, and promotion, so far from the position of the Indian officers having been prejudiced, that the promotion has been of unexampled rapidity in every rank, except the highest, which no measure could affect, and that the position of officers in that army at this moment is infinitely better than it would have been if our measures had never been adopted. I trust, therefore, that the House will be convinced that there remains now no just cause of complaint, and I earnestly hope that these discussions may now cease. They are unsatisfactory to all parties, and lead to expectations which cannot be fulfilled. All things are unsettled by these discussions, discontent is produced, and as long as this agitation is kept up no one is satisfied with his position. The measures which have been recently adopted, have been so beneficial to the regimental officers, that officers of the Staff Corps, officers of the new Line regiments, and retired officers, have asked to be allowed to revert to their cadres. What will be the effect if more is to be done for them? The whole Indian army will be disorganized. I entreat the House to give no encouragement to what would be an evil of such magnitude, and to show by their vote to-night that they believe that, in acting upon the Report of the Commissioners, we have dealt with the subject in a fair and generous spirit towards all parties.

COLONEL SYKES: Sir, the question before the House is one of very grave import, more than 712 British officers and gentlemen, comprising 23 general officers and 280 field officers, have appealed to the House in individual petitions to redress wrongs for the violation of their rights and privileges by the Secretary of State for India, and which were guaranteed in two separate Acts of Parliament. My right hon. Friend has, in my opinion, in his speech, very unfairly endeavoured to diminish the weight and sincerity of those 712 petitions of British gentlemen, by adducing a solitary instance of a recreant petitioner who denied the object for which his sole signature had been attached to his own petition. I would fain hope, for the honour of a British officer, that my right hon. Friend has been misinformed. But though he had made out a dozen cases of unfounded grievances, the remaining 700 are entitled to consideration. But the question is not confined to the wrongs of individuals; it involves also the larger and more important question of the adoption of a new policy in the military government of the Empire of India, in which lie dormant the seeds for future development of inevitable disaster. I will, however, on the present occasion, confine myself to the question of the redress of grievances, and reserve the consideration of the new military policy to a future time. I shall have to prove to the House that the whole of the wrongs inflicted, and the present serious discontent, are traceable to the rejection by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for India of the advice given to him by several official bodies and distinguished officers, all of great experience, whom he had consulted. After the mutiny of the Bengal army, with the exception of fourteen regiments of Infantry—a mutiny brought about by the ignorance of the military authorities of Native character and their intolerance of Native prejudices, and which mutiny might have been averted without any sacrifice of authority—it pleased the British Government to withdraw the administration of India from the East India Company who had raised up that glorious Indian Empire, and to transfer to the Crown their civil and military servants. In the case of the military servants their existing rights were guaranteed by a clause in Act 21 & 22 Vict. c. 106, dated 2nd August, 1858, incorporated by the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn, who was then India Minister, which enacts, section 56, that the officers and soldiers should be entitled to the like pay, pensions, allowances, and privileges, and the like advantages as regards promotion and otherwise, as if they had continued in the service of the East India Company. This it might have been thought was a sufficient guarantee; but between the Act 21 & 22 Vict. c. 106, and the Act 23 & 24 Vict. c. 100, the Ministry had changed, the Conservative Government had gone out and Lord Palmerston's Government had succeeded, and it was thought needful, on the introduction of the European Forces Bill, that the Liberal Government should endorse the guarantees of the Conservative Government. Accordingly, the following clause was proposed by Mr. Henley, in the Act 23 & 24 Vict. c. 100. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India (Sir Charles Wood) assured the House there was not any necessity whatever for the introduction of the clause, for it was fully intended to carry out the previous guarantee in good faith, nevertheless, if pressed, he would cheerfully accept it. Accordingly it was enacted—

“That the advantages as to pay, pensions, allowances, privileges, and promotions, and otherwise, secured to the military forces of the East India Company, by the Act of the 21st and 22nd year of the Queen, cap. 106, secs. 58, 56, and 58 respectively, shall be maintained in any plan for the re-organization of the Indian army, anything in this Act contained notwithstanding.”

Here, therefore, both sides of the House of Commons guaranteed in the fullest manner to the officers on their transfer to the Crown their then existing rights and privileges, promotion, allowances, &c.; and be it remembered the guarantee was of every right then possessed. The first questions the House will necessarily ask are, What were those rights and privileges so guaranteed; and secondly, in what instances have they been violated by the Secretary of State for India?

Sir, from my boyhood I have been an officer of the Native army of India, I have passed through all its grades up to my present rank, and my duties in India, and subsequently as a member of the Court of Directors of the East India Company for nineteen years, necessitated a knowledge of the organization, constitution, rights, and privileges of the military servants of the East India Company. May I not, therefore, with propriety, ask the House to accept and give its confidence to my testimony as to what the guaranteed rights and privileges really were, independently of the statements of the petitioners to the House.

1st. The cadet on being appointed by the Court of Directors to the East India Company's Military Service, had conferred upon him the right to succeed to the highest rank of the service by seniority, unless disabled by sentence of a court-martial.

2nd. On his appointment to a regiment he had the right to succeed by seniority as vacancies occurred, whether by deaths, resignations, or transfers to new regiments to the rank of major in his regiment.

3rd. After becoming a major regimentally he fell into the line of field officers of his arm of the service in the army, and had the right to succeed by seniority as vacancies occurred to the rank of full colonel with colonel's allowances.

4th. He had the right to succeed to the command of a company and to the command of his regiment in case it became vacant, while he was senior officer.

5th. It was his right that no officer belonging to any other regiment should be put into his regiment to the prejudice of the above rights.

I have myself exercised all these rights, and for more than half a century never knew a case of their violation, except in a modified and exceptional instance after the massacre at Cabool, and on that occasion it was to prevent the supersession of senior officers by junior officers. The officer's regiment was his fixed home until he became a lieutenant-colonel; and thus, by long association with the veteran Native officers and men, a mutual sympathy and confidence grew up.

6th. It was also a right, that although brevet rank might be conferred for distinguished services, no officer could supersede a regimental officer by having conferred upon him substantive rank in the army independently of regimental succession. These were the rights twice guaranteed by the House of Commons, and there is not one of them that has not been violated by the Secretary of State for India, in the person of some one officer or other. My right hon. Friend asserts, absolutely, that he has not altered the right of succession by seniority that—

“The cadet (I quote his words) who went into the army in 1860, who, perhaps, would never see a day's service, will rise to the rank of colonel or general officer in a regular course by seniority, by successive steps, and without interruption from the day he enters.”

The House will learn with surprise that the Secretary of State for India has concealed from the House the fact that officers not in the Staff Corps have no longer regiments in which to rise; that the regiments exist upon paper only; that there is no company to command or succession to the command of the regiment with the respective command allowances, to which before the re-organization the officers had a right. This surely, therefore, is a violation of the Parliamentary guarantee of their rights. The Secretary of State for India also maintains that the exceptional case of the removal in Bengal of a few subalterns from their own corps to regiments which had suffered in the Cabool massacre, justify his acting in a similar manner at his pleasure for the three armies of India at large. This I entirely deny. The object of the Company in the case alluded to by the Secretary of State was to prevent some cornets or ensigns who had not been with their regiments at Cabool superseding old lieutenants of other regiments. Some lieutenants were, therefore, put over the cornets and ensigns. The object was good, but myself and other directors strongly objected to the measure at the time because it violated a principle. Other rights of the Company's officers were comprised in fixed retiring pensions and annuities to widows and children; commands of brigades and divisions, &c. The privileges of pay, allowances, furloughs and otherwise, to an officer, were of the most liberal character from his generous and considerate masters the Directors of the East India Company. But a privilege which to the Indian officer was of vital importance was that of the Regimental Bonus Fund, twice officially sanctioned by the Court of Directors and the Board of Control, and consequently by the British Government in 1838. Notwithstanding ing the adverse climate of India, promotion was very slow in the Indian army. I was myself sixteen years a subaltern; many were a longer period, and Mr. Babington, of the Madras Cavalry, was ten years a cornet. In consequence, before an officer could attain a rank, the pension of which would justify his retirement from the service, advanced age and broken down health affected his efficiency, and it was a matter of public policy, therefore, to encourage officers so circumstanced to retire, and this was done by each officer of a regiment contributing voluntarily in proportion to the advantage he was to derive from a step to a Regimental Bonus Fund; and an officer was frequently obliged to borrow money to pay his quota; but as on his own retirement a much larger sum would be presented to him, his contribution was cheerfully made. Another privilege enabled colonels and major generals to remain in India after promotion upon Indian allowances. Cavalry officers were entitled to Cavalry pay; and officers holding regimental commands were entitled to prescribed allowances.

The preceding constituted the chief rights and privileges of the officers of the East India Company's armies, which were guaranteed to them by two separate Acts of Parliament. With a full knowledge of the rights and privileges enumerated, the Secretary of State for India resolved to amalgamate the armies of India with that of the Crown, and establish a Staff Corps, and effect a re-organization of the three armies of India, which the Act of 1858 did not contemplate, and my right hon. Friend has just told the House that everything he has done has been done with the advice of his Council—the present Viceroy of India and other great functionaries—but the following extracts from the Parliamentary papers will prove to the House that the memory of my right hon. Friend is singularly treacherous. He first referred the consideration of the modus operandi of his projected changes to the Military Committee of his own Council. This Committee consisted of the present Viceroy of India, the present Sir J. Willoughby, Lieutenant General Sir R. Vivian, K.C.B., Colonel Durand, C.B., at present Military Secretary to the Government of India in the Foreign Department, and Captain Eastwick, all gentlemen of great Indian experience. Their Report is dated June 30, 1859, and they unanimously adopt the following language, embracing the consideration of the re-organization, the amalgamation, and the establishment of Staff Corps in India. Paragraph 8—

“To the amalgamation advocated by the majority of the Royal Commissioners, the Committee perceive other and almost insurmountable obstacles. The first is that it would occasion a breach of the Guarantee Clause 56.”

Paragraph 14—

“Except at exorbitant cost to the State the Committee have failed to discover any practicable suggestion by which the inherent difficulties of amalgamation are attempted to be met.”

But the present Commander-in-Chief in India, Sir William Mansfield, then Chief of the Staff, in a memorandum dated June 5, 1859, very unhesitatingly solves the difficulty by recommending a breach of faith in the following words:—

“I believe that whatever may have been our opinions before on account of political convenience and the guarantees given by Parliament to the officers of the Indian army, all the considerations must be swept entirely away.”

Again—

“It is necessary to look the state of things straight in the face and blot out altogether all local and partial or class considerations, the Parliamentary Guarantee being provided for in some other manner as best may be done.”

These observations were recorded on the occasion of the local European troops insisting upon their rights, when a breach of faith was attempted with them. In a second memorandum dated September 26, 1859, Sir William Mansfield is equally unscrupulous in saying that, in his opinion, instead of the guaranteed pensions to Indian officers on their retirement, it would be better to give them the “home system of a scanty half-pay.” In opposition to the views of Sir William Mansfield for the abolition of a local European force and amalgamation, the present Viceroy of India, Sir John Lawrence, speaking from thirty years experience, strongly advocates its maintenance in a memorandum dated the 17th December, 1859, and these views are strongly concurred in by Colonel Durand, Captain Eastwick, Lieutenant General Sir R. Vivian, and Colonel Sir Proby Cautley. Sir John Lawrence says—

“I need not add that these views, in my opinion, embody a sound policy, and the time is not far distant when it will be found absolutely necessary to revert to it.”

James Outram, in which is the following paragraph:—

"Believing as I do that that measure (amalgamation) if carried out will prove most injurious to this country, and that it will inflict grievous injustice on the servants of the East India Company, I have deemed it my duty to record a solemn protest against its adoption."

This is concurred in by the present distinguished Governor of Bombay, Sir Bartle Frere, K.C.B., under date 7th January, 1860, who emphatically records—

"That the interests of India, and therefore those of the Empire at large, require that the army of India shall henceforth be, to the same extent as heretofore, a localised army 'serving in India.'"

Even, Mr. Wilson, as a member of the Council of India, in a Minute dated 8th March 1860, in his short experience testifies to the necessity of having localised Europeans in India, whether civil or military, to insure a proper influence with the people. In a memorandum of Sir William Mansfield, addressed to Earl de Grey, dated 13th November, 1859, he says—

"It is certainly very desirable not to touch the armies of the two minor Presidencies for the present, if it can be avoided."

And yet, on giving up the command of the Bombay army, he published a general order, dated the 14th March, 1865, in which he assumes great credit for having carried out the amalgamation scheme in all its mischievous accompaniments of conversion into irregulars, and establishing the Staff Corps, and consequent superseding of senior officers. The Report of the Military Committee of the Indian Office Council already quoted, was in such complete opposition to the views of the Secretary of State for India that he resolved not to lay the Report before his Council, or consult his Council at all upon the subject of amalgamation and the suppression of the local European army. This determination produced the following Minute or Protest, dated 5th July, 1860:—

"If on any grave question it is competent to the Minister to set the Council on one side, and to consult them or not at his pleasure, it is obvious that the objects of the Legislature will be frustrated, and that the Council must entirely fail in the efficient performance of the duties intrusted to them by Parliament. We are, therefore, of opinion that the course adopted by the Secretary of State in refusing to bring the Report of the Political and Military Committee on the future organization of the Indian army before the Council, or allowing the subject to be discussed there, is contrary to the provisions of the Act of the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 106.

This is signed by the present Viceroy of India (Sir John Lawrence), and 13 other members of the Council, the signature of one only being wanting. But this was not all. The Military Finance Commissioners sitting in Calcutta reported by special instruction from the Viceroy of India (Lord Canning), in May, 1860, before the Secretary of State for India formed Lord Hotham's Commission, that the formation of a Staff Corps could not be affected without involving the Government in a very serious expenditure, creating great difficulties in the service, and entailing upon the Government a variety of complications, and they recommended the maintenance of the regimental organisation. This was signed by Major General Jameson, the present Auditor of Indian Accounts, and Colonel Balfour, both engaged in re-organizing the finances of India after the mutiny; the latter ably, energetically, and successfully completing the work after Colonel Jameson had left India. My right hon. Friend looked to Lord Hotham's Commission for aid and support, which he had appointed on the 30th July, 1860, and which made its Report on the 30th August 1860; but here again the India Minister was not to meet with complete satisfaction, for it pointed out serious difficulties ahead. On the subject of the appointment of a Staff Corps, Sir P. Melville and distinctly recommended that the attention of the Government of India should be called to them. Nevertheless, at page 5 of the published case of the Grievances of the Indian officers, it is stated that the Secretary of State for India kept the Government in India in ignorance of these objections; thus, in fact, taking upon himself the very grave responsibility of being the cause of all the injuries of which Indian officers complain, and of the discontent which is the consequence; for unquestionably, had not the Staff Corps on its present footing been established the chief grievances which have reached the House of Commons would have been obviated. Lord Hotham's Report contains several remarkable recommendations which, if they had been adopted, the present discontent would have been less. The establishment of a Staff Corps, or rather List, was certainly suggested, but with qualifications and an alternative proposition, and it contemplated the removal of the officers from their own regiments, who were appointed to the Staff Corps in the following words:—

"Saw so many difficulties and injuries resulting from it to the extent even of rendering it impracticable;"

This has not been done: above 1,300 officers have been permanently removed to the Staff Corps, but their names are retained in their regimental lists. Moreover, at the end of paragraph 5, the Report says—

“By applying the principles which have been laid down in raising new regiments, and generally in all army augmentations.

These principles were the absolute removal of officers from their own to the new regiments. Had the Secretary of State for India adopted this recommendation, which was in accordance with the usages of the service, one of the principal grievances of regimental officers would not have arisen. Paragraph 6 of the Report recommends retirements of senior officers. It recommends increased pensions of £150 to £200 per annum, or a bonus; but expresses a belief that no old officer would retire with a less bonus than £2,500 to £3,000. An increased pension has been given to some old officers, but not any bonus. What the petitioners ask for is, that all their confiscated contributions made to the regiment's retiring fund may be returned to them, as a bonus on their own retirement from the service; but the Secretary of State refuses to act upon the recommendations of the Commissioners. Again, in paragraph 7, the Commission use these words—

“If the present organization is maintained, and it was maintained in the Madras and Bombay armies, we feel some difficulty in suggesting that promotions shall not be made in room of every one of these retirements.”

And, in the next paragraph, speaking of retirements in the Engineers and Artillery, it says—

“We conceive it would be absolutely requisite to promote in the room of these retiring, and so with any Corps that is maintained.”

The Secretary of State for India, nevertheless, unhappily found no difficulty in deciding against the Commission, and he has placed sixty-one field officers of the three armies on the pension list without filling up their vacancies, and has, therefore, violated the usages of the service and the guarantees; and finally, with respect to the prize of all regimental officers, the colonelcy, and its allowances, the Commission say if they are reduced—

Nevertheless, the Secretary of State has reduced the number of colonelcies, and added two years to the previous time in which lieutenant-colonels had obtained the prize, and in the Artillery the number of colonels have been reduced from twenty-four to fourteen. The officers of the Indian army, therefore, complain that they have been wronged. Now these were recommendations of seven of the most distinguished and experienced officers of the Royal and Company's Armies, which have been treated so lightly by the Secretary of State for India. Who, then, have been the advisers of my right hon. Friend—certainly not his own Military Committee—less so his Council; the present Viceroy of India was opposed to his amalgamation views; so was Sir James Outram, the present Governor of Bombay, and a host of other experienced officers and public servants. Will my right hon. Friend, then, tell the House upon whose fatal advice he acted, if he had any advisers at all? Well, Sir, the order or warrant for the amalgamation was nevertheless dispatched to India, and promulgated in general orders in India on the 10th April 1861; and it was so unintelligible that no less than 129 questions were put to the Government of India, and by it to the Secretary of State, for interpretation. A Parliamentary Return, No. 5 of 1862; records these questions together with a supplemental list of 146 questions, in all 275 questions for the explanation of a general order! The order or warrant completely subverted all the rules and regulations which had governed promotion in the Indian armies ever since the year 1796; officers were promoted to substantive rank and pay independently of regimental seniority; the consequence was multiplied supersessions of their brother officers, multiplied petitions to the Secretary of State for India, all of which were unredressed, and at last, in despair, at whatever risk to their personal interests, the officers poured in petitions to the House of Commons. The attention of the House was called to these petitions and the prospect of a serious discussion, and the probability of an adverse majority, led to the appointment of Lord Hotham's second Commission to investigate the grievances. But not one of the petitions presented to Parliament were referred to the Commission. Viva voce evidence was not taken, the Officers Grievances Committee was called upon to make its statement, but the counter-statement of the Secretary of State for India the Officers Committee were not permitted to see, and the officers felt convinced, if they had had an opportunity for a thorough explanation, they could have satisfied the Commission that the Regimental Bonus Retiring Fund was no more illegal than the purchase of Commissions in the Royal Army, indeed less so. On the 9th of November, 1863, the Commission reported that the Parliamentary guarantee had been departed from in five instances; two of these have been since redressed, but three still remained unredressed—namely, supersession of local officers by Staff Corps officers, secondly, retaining the names of retired lieutenant-colonels on the Army List, and thus retarding promotion, and thirdly, fixing twelve years instead of ten for a lieutenant-colonel obtaining his colonelcy. These are all violations of the guarantee. But a leading feature of all the 712 petitions presented to Parliament this Session is a grievance which presses with disastrous severity upon all officers, except those of the Staff Corps. It is the practical confiscation of all their contributions to Regimental Retiring Funds to assure a Bonus to retiring officers. The Royal Commission, on the evidence afforded to it from the India Office, concurred in the opinion of the Secretary of State for India that all such contributions were illegal, upon the supposed operations of the Act of George III. against the sale of offices. But that Act applied to a Government office bearer, selling his appointment to another, in a personal transaction. The operations of the Regimental Retiring Funds had no analogy to such a state of things; an old and senior officer in a regiment, as I have already stated, with his health broken down and encumbered with a growing up family, cannot retire upon the pension to which he is entitled, because it is insufficient for the support of himself and family in Europe; but he says to his regiment, if you choose to repay to me the sums I have myself contributed to the Regimental Fund, and the value of my present position, I will make way for the advance of my juniors. The contribution was made by the body of the officers, and the major or lieutenant-colonel retired, and this was literally in the interests of the public service, for otherwise a broken down and inefficient officer would have been compelled to drag on a miserable existence in India. So thoroughly satisfied were the Court of Directors and the Board of Control, and consequently the British Government, of the advantage of this system to the public interests, that they approved of it in two despatches to the Government of India. The importance of the Bonus to the retiring officer and his family, is shown by the amounts paid. In the officers' "Case" at page 11, it is stated that Major General Pears, now Military Secretary at the India Office, received £6,000 from his regiment on his retirement. He (Colonel Sykes) has known a lieutenant-colonel of Cavalry receive £7,000, and a lieutenant-colonel of Artillery who was near his colonelcy and off-reckonings even more. It is most ungenerous, therefore, in the Secretary of State for India, to take advantage of a supposed legal impediment and a decision in the Queen's Bench, which was inapplicable to the bonus system of the Indian armies, to confiscate all the contributions of present officers and all the advantages which they had a right to derive from those contributions. What would be the astonishment and indignation of the officers of the Royal Army if it were attempted to bring the sale of commissions under the operation of the Act of Geo. III.; and they were told, "You laid out your money illegally in the purchase of your commissions, and purchase must cease for the future, and the money you have laid out is lost." But even the great Duke of Wellington sanctioned a measure analogous to the bonus system in India. In May, 1823, the Duke found the stagnation of promotion in the Royal Artillery so great that he proposed and carried a measure to allow a certain number of field officers to retire from the Artillery, receiving for their commissions the regulated value that would be given to an officer of similar rank in the Line. In 1824 the same boon was granted to the Engineers and marine officers. This is all recorded in the Report on Army and Navy Appointments, Parliamentary paper 650 of 12th of August, 1838, at page 221. Why, Sir, this is the bonus system of the Indian army, which has been called illegal, but it is not quite so justifiable. The officers of those arms of the Royal Army had not and could not purchase their commissions; but they were offered lump sums to retire. As junior officers of these arms could not buy, the device was fallen upon of allowing Cavalry and Infantry officers of the Line to purchase the commissions so vacated; but as they could not serve in the Artillery or Engineers, they went upon the half-pay unattached list, and upon that unattached list I am told there are some 500 officers. If this was done by the Great Duke, and commissions are still purchased in the Royal Army, how is it that a less objectionable system constitutes a legal offence with officers of the late Company?

My right hon. Friend boasts of the success and economy of converting the whole of the regular Native army into irregulars, the practical result is to make efficient troops inefficient; but he and his advisers confound the effects of applying the same principle to two distinct classes of Native soldiery. With bodies of proud, independent, and fanatic Mahomedans of the Pothan tribes, or with the chivalrous and high caste Rajpoots, European officers thoroughly acquainted with Native character, good linguists, and resolute of purpose, are absolutely requisite. But it is very different with the mixed castes of the Infantry. They require not selected men, but numerous European leaders; for in a line of battle, or in the storm of a breach, they are efficient precisely in the ratio of the number of their European leaders. They will not lead, but they will follow to brave any danger. To give, therefore, six officers only to 800 or 1,000 men, is to render them useless, if not dangerous. In fact, so strongly did the Court of Directors of the East India Company feel on the subject that, after repeated orders limiting the total withdrawal of officers from any one regiment to seven, one of the latest acts of the Court of Directors, while I was Chairman, was a despatch to the Government of India, ordering that no Native regiment should have less than thirteen European officers with it, independently of the ensigns. The limitation, therefore, of six officers to a regiment is impolitic and dangerous.

My right hon. Friend has led the House to believe that promotion has been infinitely more rapid since the amalgamation or reorganization than before, and that the cost of officers has been greatly augmented, but he is quite aware that both these circumstances owe their origin to the mischievous advantages given to the officers of the Staff

Corps to the injury of the local officers. 162 lieutenants became captains on joining the Staff Corps, 192 captains became majors, and 23 majors lieutenant-colonels. These very officers, who had been so promoted with substantive commissions and augmented pay in the Staff Corps, were nevertheless kept on the rolls of the regiments from which they had been removed, no vacancy being permitted on the ground that had their vacancies been filled up in some regiments there would have been an anomalously rapid promotion of juniors and consequent supersessions. The first question to ask is, "Why Staff Corps at all; and next, why, then, were so many officers from any one regiment allowed to go into the Staff Corps?" The number might have been restricted so that undue promotion might have been prevented in any one regiment; but nothing of the kind was done, a continued flow of promotion and pay was given to the regimental officers who went into the Staff Corps, and the regimental officers who remained were left only to be superseded by their brother officers. The Secretary of State objected to the rapid promotion that would have ensued; but anomalously rapid or retarded cases of promotion have been of constant occurrence even in the Indian seniority service. The late General Sir David Leighton, K.C.B., got his majority in nine years—and this was before 1800—while he (Colonel Sykes) was sixteen years a subaltern. The promotion in an army could only be judged of by a system of averages. The supersessions occasioned by Staff promotions Lord Hotham's Committee pronounced a breach of the Parliamentary guarantee, and the Secretary of State has attempted to fulfil the guarantee by giving the superseded officers brevet rank, which does not carry pay or regimental command, and the officers view the remedy as a mockery, as its operation in individual cases will show. The present 18th Bengal Irregular Infantry is commanded by Captain W. Winson of the Staff Corps, who is sixth captain in the late 45th Native Infantry, and of fifteen years' service. His second in command is Major R. Larkins, of the late 49th, an officer of twenty-six years' service. In the 46th Madras Infantry, Captain A. Cooper, of twenty-seven years' service, stands third captain; but he is a brevet lieutenant-colonel. Many of his juniors have been made substantive majors. Supposing them all married men, Brevet Lieutenant

Colonel Cooper dies, and his widow can only get a captain's pension, while the widow of any one of the majors, his juniors, will get the pension of a major's widow. But what officers of the class of Brevet Lieutenant Colonel Cooper, of whom there are hundreds, have justly a right to complain, is, that they can only get their substantive majorities in the paper cadre of their regiments, as vacancies occur above them; while officers, who happened to be on the Staff at the time of the establishment of the Staff Corps, are allowed to count their past services on the Staff as a qualification for promotion to substantive rank, hence the multiplied supersessions. The Staff officers are progressing to brigade and divisional commands, while Captain Cooper's class have a hopeless prospect. Captain T. W. R. Boisragon of the Staff Corps is a lieutenant in the cadre of the late 69th Bengal Infantry; he commands the 30th Bengal Infantry, and there are five other regimental lieutenants commanding regiments, while numerous field officers, some of them C. B.'s, and others bearing the Victoria Cross are unemployed; indeed, it is stated that of the 105 Native regiments in Bengal, eighty are commanded by captains and lieutenants, seventeen of whom are captains in the Madras army. Discontent, under such circumstances, is inevitable. But I will not weary the House with multiplying cases of individual wrongs. In October, 1860, the Company's army employed 5,988 European officers of all arms; of these, 4,138 belonged to the Native army. By Parliamentary paper, 522 of the 27th of July, 1863, the total number of officers who had joined the Staff Corps was 1,297, so that at the present time there must be not less than 2,800 officers who are deprived of their regimental guaranteed rights. My right hon. Friend (Sir Charles Wood) will no doubt tell the House again, as he told it before, that he has done nothing that the East India Company could not have done. My reply is that the East India Company had not the power to give substantive rank independently of regimental succession. The court never did and never could annihilate the right of regimental officers to succeed by seniority to the command of companies and command of regiments. Now, from 2,800 to 3,000 officers not in the Staff Corps have had all these rights annihilated by the Secretary of State for India. The India Company never would have converted their veteran regular troops into irregulars to be commanded by officers selected by favour, while old officers with the honours of C. B. and Victoria Cross are left unemployed, and the Secretary of State has practically confiscated the regimental contributions of officers, and left them beggars. In short, unless some measures of redress are adopted, I feel assured the present agitation and discontent will continue to the detriment of the public service, and the disgrace of the country.

MR. SMOLLETT said, in his judgment the amalgamation, as it was called, of the Indian army had not been carried out with stinginess; but, on the contrary, there had been great profusion and cost, the result being that even those who had derived benefit from the profusion were dissatisfied. The great error had been the creation of a most extravagant and unnecessary Staff Corps; but the greatest mistake of all was committed by the House in passing the Amalgamation Act of 1860. That was an Act which, under the pretence of stopping recruiting from England for service in India, at once annihilated a most admirable service, which with some amendments and revision might have continued with the highest possible advantage to the State. At that time a perfect mania seemed to have attacked the authorities at the Horse Guards and the India Office and even to have reached Calcutta with respect to Indian affairs. They appeared to imagine that henceforth India was to be governed by 100,000 English bayonets, and that the only question to be decided was whether it was to be done by means of the Queen's troops or of a local service. The plan of ruling India by brute force broke down from financial considerations. It was found that sufficient money could not be raised in India to pay 100,000 British troops sent from this country. It was at first proposed to retain only some 20,000 or 30,000 Native troops, who were to be employed on unhealthy stations, where the English soldier could not exist. But all this had entirely passed away; sounder opinions prevailed, and the Native troops now amounted to 155,000 in number, but, as he was informed, they were very inefficient, owing to a relaxation in the regimental organization. In proof of the profusion connected with the amalgamation, he need only cite the case of several hundred cadets being sent out to the Indian service during the last year of its existence, when the service had been condemned to extinction. This was altogether unnecessary. It was not right to send out young men to be quartered upon that country for life. Surely some of those young men might have been transferred to the Queen's service, or had awarded them a sum of money by way of compensation for the loss of a service for which they had been trained. The next measure taken in India was the permission accorded to a large number of officers who had obtained the rank of lieutenant-colonel to retire from the service on vastly enhanced retiring allowances. By those means a great charge was entailed upon the Indian Treasury, while great dissatisfaction was occasioned among those officers so dealt with, who now declared that they had accepted the increased retiring allowances under a misapprehension, and who had joined the rank of the malcontents. At the time when this amalgamation took place there were 5,300 officers on the rolls of the Indian army, and of these some 1,340, more or less, had been merged in the Queen's army. They principally consisted of officers of the corps of Engineers in all the three Presidencies and of officers of the Artillery, who had been merged in the Royal Artillery. Some officers were also permitted to volunteer from Native regiments, and together these all formed a body of 1,340 officers. Some 4,000 others remained, who adhered to the advantages of the Indian service as it had existed up to that time, and he proceeded to show how these 4,000 officers were dealt with. The Government of India immediately set about the formation of a Staff Corps unlimited in number and expense. Every man who had been fortunate enough to perform duties apart from his regiment was competent to join this Staff Corps; adjutants of regiments, quartermasters, and interpreters were permitted to volunteer, even officers who had thrown up their appointments and come home on furlough, and who, under the old régime, would have had to rejoin their regiments on going out were permitted to join the Staff Corps provided they returned in three years. In this way a most unprecedented corps—what he might call a legion—was formed; and, strange to say, although the members of the Staff Corps obtained promotion by joining it, no promotion followed in the regiments from which they were draughted. One of the evils of the old system consisted in the facility with which officers were permitted to shirk regimental duty; married officers especially were ready to accept the smallest appointments and the most trifling emoluments rather than go marching over India with their regiments. But from the principles on which this Staff Corps was formed it would seem as if a difficulty in inducing men to join had been apprehended. A subaltern, for instance, of twelve years' standing was promoted upon joining to be captain; a captain of twenty years' standing became major; and a major of twenty-six years' standing was made lieutenant-colonel. In this manner, not in single instances, but in hundreds of cases, officers were superseded in their own regiments by others junior to themselves, for the names of these fortunate Staff officers still remained on the cadre of the regiment in their proper places obstructing promotions. If there had been one distinctive feature of the Indian service it was that no man once appointed to a regiment should jump over the head of a senior in that Corps by purchase or in any other way, except by sentence of a court-martial. But the effect of this Staff Corps was to revolutionize the whole army system, and to make supersession by juniors the rule instead of the exception. The regimental officers naturally murmured against such a practice, but their remonstrances were unheeded. There would have been a ready way of redressing the wrong that had been committed, by cancelling the warrant which gave promotions to Staff officers out of their turn and returning to the old system of promotion. But the Secretary of State would not do this. He regarded these 1,400 officers, as he had declared again that evening, as the élite of the army. For his part he entertained a very different opinion. Of the members of the Staff Corps very few had been chosen for service in the field or for real merit; most of them were promoted because they were well introduced or recommended, or from other causes which he need not enter into. Among them were some who had never done any regimental duty at all, but almost from their entrance into India had been filling civil appointments. Such men were actually on the ladder of army promotion and in a fair way to become general officers, while those who continued in the performance of regular regimental duty were quietly passed over. As the Secretary of State would not cancel those promotions which had been improperly obtained, the only other course was to give substantive rank pari passu to officers who had been passed over by juniors. This, no doubt, would entail a large charge upon the revenues of India, but to that complexion it must come at last. The strange spectacle would then be seen of a service doomed to death improperly and indefinitely continued by sending out a great number of young officers to join in 1860-1, its members permitted to retire upon allowances which they never would have gained under the old régime. And more than this, they would have the anomaly of 1,400 officers quartered on the country and promoted to be field officers long before they could have expected, with 2,600 regimental officers ultimately sharing in the like advantages, all because some blunder had taken place either in the India Office, or at the Horse Guards, or in both of those Departments.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to redress all such grievances complained of by the Officers of the late Indian Armies, as were admitted by the 'Commission on the Memorials of Indian Officers' to have arisen by a departure from the assurances given by Parliament, by the Acts 21 and 22 Vic. c. 106, and 23 and 24 Vic. c. 100." —(Captain Jervis.)

BOROUGH FRANCHISE EXTENSION BILL.

[BILL 82.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BAINES: Sir, I am sure the House will favour me with its indulgence whilst I once more appeal to its sense of justice and wisdom to redress an acknowledged wrong, pressing upon the great majority of the people. I say an acknowledged wrong, because the defective state of the representation has been admitted as such by the highest authorities in the kingdom. Indeed, I know of no subject in modern times on which there has been a greater weight and concurrence of authority. Nor is the question admitted merely as a grievance, but also as a grievance demanding practical and immediate remedy. With this view no less than five times has the defective state of the representation been recommended by Her Majesty on the Throne to Her Parliament, with a view to practical reform. Four Prime Ministers, at the head of five Administrations, have introduced measures for that purpose. This House itself has passed the second reading of a Bill for the Reform of the representation without a division; and the House which preceded it still more emphatically acknowledged the grievance by rejecting a Bill presented by the then Government, in consequence of its falling short of the amount of extension of the franchise which they thought should be granted. Above all, the constituencies of England and of the United Kingdom have at the last general election expressed their opinion on this subject in a way not to be mistaken. For it is notorious that this was the question that was submitted to the constituencies at that election, and that they sent us here, charged above all other things with the duty of reforming the representation of the people.

Sir, I shall be pardoned for offering a single word of personal explanation. It is known—because I have publicly and repeatedly declared it—that I have not been anxious myself to continue in charge of this question. I was anxious it should be volve upon those whose influence was more extensive. I wished that the charge of the question should be assumed by the Government, and especially to leave it in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) whose opinions, expressed last Session in this House, did him so much honour, and gained him so much gratitude in the country; a gentleman who has the heart to appreciate the rights and wrongs of the people, and the talents and influence to obtain the redress of those wrongs. In this hope, however, I have been disappointed; but I never can allow that it is right to wait for a Ministerial initiative in a measure of this kind. If we were to admit that principle we should be sacrificing some of the most important rights and some of the most sacred duties of this House. If that rule had been acted upon, the most important reforms of modern times would have been prevented. When I found that the Government had laid aside the Reform question, and inasmuch as I had given them my most zealous help so long as they had it in charge, it seemed to me my duty to present one point of that great question before the House. It was only a single point, but one which it seemed to me no presumption for an independent Member to present, especially as I had bestowed upon it considerable labour, and as it was the prominent and distinguishing point of the measure of the Government, and that in which this House, or rather its predecessor, had manifested an especial interest. When I received the charge which sent me to this House, I gave my constituents a pledge that I would support the measure sketched by Lord John Russell before the general election took place. I considered that pledge to be binding, and when I came here I felt bound to do what I could to act on the pledge. Moreover, I have been asked by that association of working men—the Working Men's Parliamentary Association of my own borough—from which I have just presented a petition, by public meetings in my own borough presided over by the Mayor, and by several other boroughs, to persevere with this Bill. And having always had a firm conviction that an extension of the suffrage was absolutely inevitable, and that it was as just and wise as it was inevitable, I have thought it my duty once more to present the Bill to the House. I may, perhaps, be met by the preliminary objection, that in the last Session of a Parliament, when the Parliament has only twelve months to run before it dies a natural death, there is no time to carry such a measure as this, and to bring it into operation before the next general election. But to that objection I reply that it is altogether mistaken. The precedent of the year 1832 seems to me abundantly sufficient to remove that objection. In that year three Reform Bills, for England, Ireland, and Scotland, were passed in the months of June and July. Bills were also passed for regulating the boundaries of boroughs and of divided counties; the new system of registration was brought into operation; and the appeal was made to the country before the close of the year. That objection, therefore, falls to the ground. But, Sir, on the other hand, I conceive there is a special advantage in introducing the measure in this the last Session of Parliament. It is known that whenever any considerable extension of the franchise shall be carried, it must be followed by an early dissolution, in order to give an opportunity to the new voters to exercise the franchise of which they have been thought worthy. It is therefore evident that whenever a Reform Bill is passed that must be the last Session—the expiring Session—of the Parliament in which it is passed. Then there is a very great convenience to Members of this House, to the constituencies, and to the whole country, in having a Reform Bill carried in the concluding Session of Parliament. We know the immense indisposition there is on the part of Members of this House, on both sides, to go again to their constituencies soon after they have had the cost, excitement, and toil of a general election. It is known that one considerable obstruction to the passing of the Reform Bill of 1860 was the indisposition that existed on both sides of the House to go again to their constituents. Therefore one general election would be spared by passing a measure of this nature at the conclusion instead of the beginning of the Session. But, independent of that, it seems to me that it is right at the present time that opportunity should be given to Her Majesty's Government and to the Members of this House of declaring the opinions which they hold and the principles by which they intend to abide on a question of this constitutional magnitude. This was the question on which the last election turned and it is a question which I believe never will be settled until a satisfactory measure of enfranchisement shall take place. It must therefore continue to agitate the country; and on such a question it may fairly be expected Her Majesty's Government will give an explanation as to the principles by which they are actuated and by which they intend to be guided. I believe the country expects such an explanation. It is well known that the Government came into office pledged to a measure of Reform—pledged to this House—pledged to their own friends assembled before they became a Government, and pledged to the Queen. Before the last Parliament was dissolved, Lord John Russell, then in this House, sketched a Reform Bill, which he intimated his willingness to introduce. At the meeting at Willis's Rooms, before the present Government was formed, he adhered to that measure; and when Parliament met, in the second Session, a Bill was actually introduced by the Government; but it has not yet become law. The question was allowed to drop, and it is for the Government to explain how it was allowed to drop, and what will be their course in the future in regard to a question upon which high expectations have been raised, and upon which decided opinions have been expressed by the people of this country. The measure which I have taken the liberty again to lay before the House is one which is copied in so many words from the Government Bill of Lord John Russell, of which it was the most distinguishing and important feature. The Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey (Mr. Locke King), to enlarge the county franchise, though that would have admitted many excellent and well-qualified persons, was not calculated to meet the great want which the Borough Franchise Bill is intended to meet. The Borough Franchise Bill is avowedly intended to lower the franchise so as to bring in a considerable portion of the working classes who now are all but wholly unrepresented. That is its distinct ground. I believe the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) who will move the Previous Question, and who was a consistent supporter of the Reform Bill of Lord Derby's Government, will avow his opposition to any lowering of the qualification. Now, what to the noble Lord appears the vice of the measure, is to me its recommendation. It is distinctly and avowedly intended to admit the better portion of the working classes to the franchise, and I am glad that the issue is so broad and clear, and that the noble Lord's candour will allow so distinct a discussion of the question, and not suffer any ambiguity to remain regarding it. Many persons have charged the Government with having broken their pledges, and I have heard in very crowded meetings in important boroughs, most bitter and indignant denunciations uttered against the Government for having, as it was said, betrayed the country on the Reform question. I do not wish to use strong language. I am known to be a consistent, though perfectly independent supporter of the Government, and I wish to give a just view of their position. But I am bound to say that I do not know how to defend the Government from this charge. I admit that there were some reasons, though I think inadequate, in the state of foreign affairs, and also in the prostration of the largest branch of our manufacturing industry, for postponing legislation. But I see no justification for postponing it when those reasons have passed away, or beyond the existence of the Parliament which was specially elected to legislate on the subject. If Government had shown the same resolution on this question as they showed on the French Treaty, on the great Budgets of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and even on the repeal of the paper duty; if they had staked their offices, as I think they had previously staked their honour, on carrying a Reform Bill, I believe they would have carried it. And if they could not have carried it, they would at least have stood in a much more satisfactory position before the country; while the party to which they belonged would have been placed in an altogether better position than they now occupy. I am bound, however, in candour to admit that the Government was not sustained, either in the House or out of the House, in the manner in which it ought to have been sustained on this question. It is quite right to admit that most frankly; but there are two things I must also say. First of all, there was apparently a lukewarmness on the part either of the Government, or of some of its more influential Members on the question of Reform, which threw a fatal chill upon it; and further, the constituencies, having done their part at the general election, considered they had a right to rely on Government and Parliament doing the part to which they were publicly pledged, without the spur of popular agitation. Admitting, as I must, that the popular demand for Reform has not recently been so loud as I think it should have been, but believing that the demand will as certainly be renewed with increased and augmented power as the sun will rise to-morrow morning, and that unmistakable signs of this renewal are displaying themselves in many quarters, I find in the existing quietude a strong reason for settling the question at the present time. I appeal to the House to consider whether it is not the part of a wise, a prudent, a foreseeing Legislature, to legislate for a subject avowedly calculated somewhat to excite public feeling, in a time of the greatest quietude. Shall we discuss it in a time of calm or in a time of storm? Shall we discuss it when the country is lulled by prosperity, or shall we wait till the people are roused, and perhaps inflamed, by adversity and distress? It seems to me the wisest to discuss it at such a time as this? If you call upon the wind, may you not evoke the whirlwind? If you refuse to discuss this measure in a time of tranquillity, I am afraid you may have to consider it with claimants thundering at your doors, and with a call throughout the kingdom from political unions for household or manhood suffrage.

I would remind the House that Parliament has not acted in this way in other matters which are prospective. It has not considered that, because we now enjoy peace, we ought not to prepare for war. So far from it, the two sides of the House have vied with each other in urging the adoption of every improvement in our national defences that is called for by the changes in the art of war. You have reconstructed your navy, you have re-armed your army, you have re-fortified your coasts, you have planned defences for your colonies, you have established reserves of seamen and soldiers. All this has been done, and the noble Lord who is to move the Amendment has been himself honourably conspicuous by his efforts, begun years ago, and continued to the present time, to raise up a Volunteer force for the defence of the kingdom, when there was no well-founded apprehension of any enemy threatening us. Was all this dictated by prudence? And can it then be prudent to leave a great majority of the people with a degrading and insulting grievance, pressing upon the great majority of the people; a grievance that does you no good whatever, dividing classes which ought to be welded together, and weakening the body politic—when by simply doing justice you might give the Empire more strength than it would derive from a million of fighting men?

I invite the House seriously to look at the condition of the representation. In 1861 the population of England and Wales—to which portion of the kingdom, in accordance with former precedents, my Bill is confined—was 20,000,000; of whom 5,000,000 were adult males. And how many of these had you represented? The number of electors was nominally somewhere under 1,000,000; though, deducting duplicate entries, and those who, having votes both for counties and boroughs, ought only to be counted once, probably the real number does not much exceed 800,000, and certainly is not more than 900,000. Of these it is quite certain that the upper and middle classes form the great proportion. I do not object to any measure—such as the lodger franchise—which would fill up any vacancies in those classes, by admitting persons who are well qualified to vote; but, as classes, they are abundantly represented at present. Indeed, they have the representation entirely in their own hands, although they form only one-fourth of the people of England. The working classes comprise three-fourths of the population, and I venture to say that this great body is all but wholly unrepresented. I do not deny that there are several Gentlemen in this House who have among their constituents a few members of the working class; but the number on the lists of voters is so exceedingly small that it has no appreciable weight in the representation. Yet that class numbers 15,000,000 of people; and the male adults number nearly 4,000,000. These are the men who carry on the vast and varied industry of the country; they till your soil, they work your mines and machinery, they manufacture the products which command the markets of the world; their labour and skill make all your capital available, and produce all your comforts and luxuries; they navigate your ships of war and trade, and they fill the ranks of your armies. Their sinews are strong, their energies are not surpassed, their courage is high, their natural abilities are as good as those of the classes above them, they are now an educated people, who daily read the news of all the world. These 15,000,000 of people have vast interests to defend; the annual income of the working men and their families can scarcely be less than £200,000,000 sterling. They require the protection of the law for their persons, their earnings, their savings, their houses, their wives, their children, their civil and religious liberties. They have the feelings which belong to human nature; and they have a spirit which, though not disposed to violence or tumult, is perhaps still less disposed to submit to injury or insult. And this is the people—these 15,000,000—possessing an amount of moral, mental, and physical power not surpassed by any community in the world, whom we think it wise and safe to leave under the infliction of a degrading exclusion! I do not know what hon. Gentlemen may think, but I cannot understand how you can believe it to be safe to leave a people like this unrepresented. And, allow me to say, these people are not inferior to us in natural talents; they have brought those talents to a considerable degree of cultivation; I believe the working men in the workshops of the manufacturing districts are as well acquainted with the news of the day and of the whole world, as most of the Members of this House. You exclude them, and yet you expect them to remain obedient, contented in times of distress as well as in times of prosperity; well affected, loyal, bound up in heart and feeling with the classes above them, ready to obey the laws which they have no hand in making, and, if needful, to shed their blood in defence of institutions from which they derive neither honour nor immunity! Is this a wise and reasonable course?

I admit that the House has a right to demand, when an extension of the franchise is asked for, satisfactory evidence that those whom you seek to introduce to its exercise are likely to make a good use of it. If I could not give such evidence, I could not conscientiously propose this measure. I think I can prove that they are well qualified. But, before doing so, let me ask the House to consider what kind of qualifications it is reasonable to demand in a body of electors. You do not require, of course, that they should themselves be qualified to be legislators, that they should possess a knowledge of all subjects upon which this House is called upon to legislate, but only that they should be able intelligently to choose, among the candidates offered to them, the men who will best protect their interests and represent their views. If you should demand, in a constituent body, an understanding of all the questions to be discussed in a legislative body, I am afraid you have already gone too far, and that your constituents would be a very select company indeed. But if you ask for elementary education, general intelligence, the habit of political reading, and some habits of business in their own concerns and associations,—then I am certain, you may as safely go to the £6 occupiers in 1865 as you went to the £10 occupiers in 1832. I do not think you have a right to ask for much more. If you do, it seems to me you confound two things which ought not to be confounded—the qualification of legislators and the qualification of those who have to choose legislators. They are the men to select from a number of candidates the man whom, from their knowledge of his character, his independence, and his talents, they judge to be best qualified to represent their views and feelings in this House; and I conceive that it does not require a very high degree of scholarship for men who daily read what is passing in this House and criticize freely our debates, to be qualified to elect those who are to be their representatives in Parliament. I believe, Sir, a fallacy lurks in the minds of many honourable men, which makes them, to a most remarkable and most unworthy extent, afraid of a perfectly safe extension of the franchise. The fallacy is this. They suppose that any lowering of the qualification for electors would correspondingly affect the character of the legislative body. Now, clearly this could not be the case if the people are in a state of rapid advancement, so that education and intelligence have anticipated, and more than equalled, the extension you propose to make of the suffrage. The advance of education and intelligence has now made men of somewhat lower rank equal or superior in intelligence to men already intrusted with the franchise, and about whose qualifications no one has ventured to express a doubt. But, independently of this, the point I wish especially to impress upon the House is this—that the character of a legislative body is determined much more by the class from whom the legislators are taken than by the class who elect them. Now, as a rule, it may be said that the class from whom the legislators are chosen in England consists, and is always likely to consist, of those who have enjoyed the best education, who possess good property, or who have already gained experience and distinction in the public service of their country, their county, or their borough. A seat in this House is an honour to which the foremost men in the country always have aspired, and always will aspire. This would be the case, whatever were the composition of the electoral body. It is not in the power of working men in any considerable numbers possessing very small means, and dependent on their own industry, to live half the year in London at considerable expense, and either separated from their families or bringing their families with them. Moreover, there is only too strong a tendency in human nature to look with favour upon rank, wealth, and adventitious distinctions; and, in general, constituencies will choose candidates who possess those distinctions; not to mention that cultivated talents and experience of affairs necessarily and properly recommend candidates to electors, as rendering them worthy of being intrusted with the duty of making the laws and carrying on the Government of the country.

In my opinion, Sir, it would be a positive advantage both to this House and to the constituencies if some intelligent and virtuous working men, who had won the confidence of their fellows by their characters and talents, had seats in this Assembly. They would communicate valuable information to the House as to the interests and feelings of their own class, and would help us with their sound sense and unsophisticated feelings; and it is probable that they would learn something here which would expand and enrich their minds, modify their prejudices, and have a beneficial influence out of doors. It is altogether unlikely that any considerable number of working men will ever be found here; but if they were, I, for one, believe it would be productive of decided benefit to the public interests. Entertaining this view, I do not sympathize in the least with the fears which some entertain of the consequences that would ensue if, in a dozen or a score of boroughs, a £6 franchise should give the working classes a clear majority of the electors. It seems to be thought by some that they would, in such a case, either return men of their own class, or extreme politicians, and perhaps mere adventurers. I know that vague fears of this kind have given the ague fit to many honest men in contemplating an extension of the suffrage. But surely this implies a strange forgetfulness, not only of those principles of human nature to which I have been referring, but also of our own history. There is nothing that goes so far with this House, or with practical politicians all over the country, as fact and experience. Now, we have it in our power to test the validity of these apprehensions by an appeal to a large and long experience. We have had in this country, in many of its largest towns, not merely a £6 franchise, but household, and even universal suffrage. In those towns, therefore, the working classes constituted a large majority of the electors. The working classes, indeed, composed a much larger proportion of the borough constituencies in the Unreformed Parliament than they do in the Reformed Parliament. A fatal blow was struck at the working classes by the Reform Bill, which did full justice to the middle classes. Its virtue was in bringing the middle classes into a position of influence, but to the working men it was a most fatal act, because that class were either cut off at once, or placed in a position in which they gradually wasted away, and there are now comparatively few of those who formerly constituted the majority of the constituencies who have votes. Now, what was the effect under the old system? Did the large towns, in which the widest suffrage prevailed, return demagogues and adventurers? I have been looking over a list of the Parliaments for 120 years, from the union of England and Scotland, in 1708, down to the Reform Act, as given in Beatson's Chronological Register of the British Parliament, and other works; and I especially looked at the Members for the large towns where the suffrage was the most extended. As far as my local knowledge went, the Members for that long period in these towns were—I may almost say without exception—from the old and principal families in the respective neighbourhoods, great landowners, rich bankers and merchants, together with an infusion of men who had distinguished themselves in the service of the country. As this is a point of the utmost importance, I will ask the House to allow me to read a few notable illustrations of cities and towns which had the largest body of electors, with a selection of the principal names which occur in successive Parliaments and generations. In the City of London, where before the Reform Act there were 12,000 voters, we find such Members as Bernard, Hoare, Heathcote, Glyn, Beckford, Sawbridge, and Curtis. In Westminster, where there were 16,000 voters, we find the names of Fox, Rodney, Townshend, Hood, Romilly, Burdett, and Hobhouse. In Liverpool, where there were 5,350 voters, there are the names of Gascoyne, Tarleton, Roscoe, Canning, and Huskisson. In Bristol, with 6,000 voters, were Burke and Lord Sheffield. In Hull, which had 2,200 voters, occur the names of St. Quintin, Maister, Manners, Weddell, Hartley, Wilberforce, Mahon, Graham, and Sykes. In Norwich, with 4,200 voters, are found Bacon, Walpole, Harbord, Windham, Frere, Gurney, and Grant. In Leicester, which had 5,380 voters, are found Beaumont, Babington, and Smith. In Nottingham, which had 5,050 voters, occur Warren, Howe, Anson, Coke, and Denman. In York, with 3,750 voters, are Robinson, Milner, Cavendish, Wentworth, Milnes, and Dundas. In Chester, where there were 1,300 voters, are found Grosvenor, Bunbury, Wilbraham, Bootle, and Egerton. In Worcester, which had 2,200 voters, are Boulton, Ward, Lechmere, and Robarts. In Durham, with 1,100 voters, Lambton, Shaftoe, Tempest, and Wharton. In Stafford, with its 1,000 voters, Foley, Vernon, Chetwynd, Monckton, and Sheridan. In Newcastle-upon-Tyne, which had 3,000 voters, occur Liddell, Blacket, Fenwick, Ridley, and Brandling. In Newcastle-under-Lyne, which had 830 voters, were Leveson Gower, Waldegrave, Egerton, Bootle, and Evelyn Denison. In Preston, which had 7,500 voters, we find the names of Hoghton, Fleetwood, Hesket, Stanley, and Horrocks. In Coventry, with 3,500 voters, occur Conway, Wilmot, Eardley, Glyn, and Ellice. In Gloucester, which had 1,900 voters, are the names of Selwyn, Barrow, and Howard. Many other county towns and populous seats of trade had very large constituencies, the suffrage there being household or that of freemen. For example, Lancaster had 4,000 voters, Southwark 4,500, Northampton 2,400, Southampton 1,350, Canterbury 2,325, Exeter 1,300, Ipswich 1,150, Dover 2,385, Colchester 2,500, Lincoln 1,333, Maldon 4,000, Cardigan 2,300, Great Yarmouth 1,800, and many more with numbers nearly as great.

Now I have Beatson's work here; and I challenge any hon. Gentleman to find names in the Parliaments for the last 120 years, giving the slightest shadow of a justification for the fear that working class constituencies would return persons of a low class as their Members. I say that the investigation to which I appeal must sweep away like cobwebs every fancy like that which I have been combating, and satisfy the most timid person that even a wider suffrage than I propose would still return to this House an overwhelming preponderance of men who are identified with the property and education of the country. I can conceive that Gentlemen may say, "Oh, but there was a property qualification." We all know what that meant. We know it was possible for any attorney to get up a qualification for £80. It was deposited, as every one knows, with our librarian, and at the conclusion of Parliament the property was again transferred to the owner. It was so broad a farce, so ridiculous and contemptible, that the House entirely repealed the property qualification. Then I may say that the experience of the country before the Reform Act has been entirely confirmed by its experience since that Act. Indeed, I may add to my former argument that the mere necessity of party strife compels each party (as a general rule) to put forward the best men it can find.

And now, Sir, I come to consider whether those whom I propose to admit, the occupiers of houses between £6 and £10, are worthy of the franchise. I must express to the House my unhesitating conviction that they are. I may remind the House that both the noble Lord who so frequently brought forward this question of Reform in this House, and the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), based their respective Bills on the assumption of a very great progress in popular intelligence. The right hon. Gentleman made these striking remarks—

"I beg the House to consider well those effects of time, and what has been the character of the twenty-five years that have elapsed since the Reform of 1832. They form no ordinary period. In a progressive country and a progressive age progress has been not only rapid but precipitate. There is no instance in the history of Europe of such an increase of population as has taken place in this country, during this period. There is no example in the history of Europe or of America, of a creation and accumulation of capital so vast as has occurred in this country in those twenty-five years. And I believe the general diffusion of intelligence has kept pace with that increase of population and wealth. In that period you have brought science to bear on social life in a manner no philosopher in his dreams could ever have anticipated. In that space of time you have in a manner annihilated both time and space."

Those eloquent words were uttered six years since; and within that short interval two other mighty impulses have been given to the popular intelligence, by the abolition of the taxes on knowledge, which has led to an enormous extension of the education of the country, and by the general establishment of the submarine telegraph. These have led to a very great extension of political and general reading, by the establishment of the penny daily newspapers all over the kingdom, and of cheap periodicals of every description.

It is important that I should not trust my case to general observations, like those of Lord Russell and the right hon. Gentleman, however notoriously well founded. The fact of an advancement which I believe to be quite unparalleled in history admits of being proved by official evidence; and a Return has this day been laid upon the table of the House, on my Motion, which gives a large amount of evidence in the most condensed and most authentic form. That Return presents a comparison of the condition of the people in the years 1831 and 1864 respectively, that is, the year in which the Reform Act was presented and discussed, in comparison with the last year for which the accounts have been made up. The comparison could not always be made between those years, but an approximation is made to it. I believe a Return more gratifying to every patriotic mind was never issued; and I confidently invite the attention of the House to a few particulars extracted from it, as triumphantly proving the advancement of the people in education, virtue, and good habits. I shall not give the figures in full, but simply state the percentages of increase, which will give simplicity and distinctness to the statement. The basis of the whole is the increase in the population of England and Wales, and with that all the other items are to be compared. In the thirty years from 1831 to 1861 the population increased, according to the census, 44 per cent; but, bringing down the population by computation to the year 1864, the increase within thirty-three years was 50 per cent, and perhaps hon. Gentlemen will bear this in mind as the datum line with which all the rest are to be compared. Within a shorter period, namely, from 1833 to 1861, the number of day scholars increased 146 per cent, or nearly three times as fast as the population. From this some deduction ought to be made on account of children educated at home, which are included in the last Return, and not in that of 1833. Between 1831 and 1860 the quantity of paper, the raw material of books and newspapers, which paid duty, increased 230 per cent. And since the abolition of the paper duty there has been an augmented production at home, together with large importations from abroad. Between 1839 and 1864 the number of letters which passed through the Post Office increased 834 per cent; and these may be regarded both as an evidence and as a stimulus to extended education. Between 1831 and 1864 the number of depositors in savings banks increased 338 per cent, and the amount of their deposits increased 209 per cent. In addition to this mode of saving, between 1847 and 1864 (or half the thirty years) the number of enrolled or certified friendly societies increased 120 per cent. Between 1831 and 1861, whilst the population increased 50 per cent, the amount expended for the relief of the poor actually diminished 15 per cent on the expenditure of 1831. In the twelve years from 1849 to 1861 the number of paupers diminished 18 per cent. Between 1831 and 1864 the number of persons committed for trial actually fell off, though only fractionally. Between 1831 and 1864 the official value of our imports increased 249 per cent, and of our exports 350 per cent, evidencing a vast improvement in the condition of the whole population. Within that period 8,500 miles of railway were constructed at a cost of £322,237,978—one of the most marvellous creations in the history of the world. Looking at the consumption of some of the principal articles of food, we find that those which indicate domestic comfort have increased in far larger proportion than those which are consumed in self-indulgence, and sometimes in demoralizing intoxication. Of tea, the increase was no less than 195 per cent; of coffee 44 per cent; and of sugar 91 per cent; of wine the increase was 93 per cent; of malt only 33 per cent, and of spirits only 39 per cent. I appeal to the judgment of the House whether these figures do not prove beyond all dispute an enormous advance of the body of the people in education, reading habits, habits of providence and temperance, together with an increase of domestic comfort, whilst they also show a great diminution in pauperism and crime. I have to add to the information contained in that paper two facts, which, I think, are still more striking, with regard to the increase in the political and general reading of the people, as evidenced by the increase in the number of copies of newspapers, magazines, and serials issued. In 1831 the number of single copies of newspapers issued was 38,648,000 in the whole of the United Kingdom; while in 1864 it was 546,000,000, or an increase of 1,313 per cent. The increase in magazines and serials issued weekly and monthly was from 400,000 a month to 6,094,000 a month, or 1,423 per cent. I say that those facts evidence progress which is something marvellous in this country, and one which, you may rely upon it, has afforded a sufficient foundation for that extension of the suffrage which I am now inviting you to make. I might multiply greatly the evidences of improvement, but it would be perfectly superfluous; no man can possibly doubt the advancement of the working classes of England in all the qualities which fit them for the exercise of the franchise.

I must now, Sir, in conclusion, state to the House what I believe would be the addition made to the number of electors by the reduction of the borough franchise from £10 to £6. I regret not to have received the official information which I had expected when I moved for a Return of the male occupiers in boroughs some weeks since. When I inquire the reason that that Return has not been made, I am told that it would cost a considerable sum of money, owing to the necessity of paying the clerks of the guardians for their trouble, and that, as the Treasury has not authorized the payment, the Return has not been made. I am therefore driven to refer to the information obtained for Government in 1860, and thoroughly sifted by a Committee of the House of Lords, supplemented by partial Returns made on a Motion of mine last year. According to the Returns of 1860, the addition that would have been made to the borough voters by a £6 franchise would have been 210,022, or 48 per cent on the existing number of voters. According to the information which I obtained last year at the Poor Law Board, the addition to the borough voters would have been 240,705, being 49 per cent of the then existing number. I am assured, by the gentleman who has always prepared these Returns at the Poor Law Board, that if we had obtained the Return which I moved for this year, it would have shown very little difference. But it has been objected to the Government estimate of 1860 that the metropolitan boroughs ought to be deducted from the total number of borough electors, inasmuch as their position would scarcely be changed by the adoption of a £6 franchise, and, therefore, the new voters would almost all belong to the other boroughs. I admit the validity of this remark, and therefore I have deducted the metropolitan boroughs, and, at the same time, endeavoured to calculate the number of the working classes who would be put on the register by a £6 franchise. It would weary the House if it were to attempt to carry it through all the steps of my calculation; but the result at which I have arrived is this — that the whole number of borough voters, exclusive of the metropolitan voters, under a £6 franchise, would be 443,480, of whom 302,159, or 68 per cent, would be of the upper and middle classes, and only 141,321, or 32 per cent, of the working classes. This calculation was made on the figures given in the official Return of 1860, and I have every reason to believe that the same proportion, or very nearly, would still hold good. If I am right in my calculation the proportion of working class voters in boroughs would be one-third of the whole. But when we take into account the county voters, and remember that no appreciable number of these are of the working class, it would follow that the working class voters in England and Wales would not be more than one in five of the whole electoral body. My firm belief, therefore, is, Sir, that if any smaller extension of the franchise than to £6 were offered, it would not be worth acceptance by the classes now unrepresented, and that they would regard it as a mockery and an insult. I am sure the extension sought by this Bill might be made with perfect safety. I would appeal then, Sir, to the justice and the prudence of this House not to reject so moderate a measure for settling a great constitutional question. I would encourage hon. Members to believe that in removing a great grievance from the majority of the people, they would be removing a great, though at present it may be a hidden, danger. I would conjure them to act with a wise trustfulness, and to try whether enfranchisement will not prove a better safeguard to the realm than exclusion—will not narrow the area and lessen the intensity of all future discontent. I would ask them to look back at all the great reforms of the last forty years, and to consider if they have not every one, being adapted to the spirit of the age, proved not merely safe, but conducive in the most eminent degree to the contentment and prosperity of the people. This concession, Sir, would cost not a farthing to your Exchequer, but, on the contrary, would enrich it; it would not aggravate, but mitigate, your anxieties in any future period of war or distress; it would not deprive any man in the country of any privilege or advantage he now enjoys ; it would add to the sweetness of your political rights, by taking from them all savour of monopoly or injustice ; it would elevate, as well as gratify, the classes whom it enfranchised ; and it would swell into an invincible phalanx the ranks of those who now proudly and affectionately guard the shrine of the Constitution.

MR. BAZLEY said, that in seconding the Motion, he must congratulate the hon. Member for Leeds for the excellent speech in which he had brought forward this Bill. He thought the speech was worthy of all praise because it truly represented the opinions and feelings of a large proportion of the working classes of this country. All classes had become, as it were, more federated in consequence of the spread of education and the means afforded to the great body of the people to form opinions, equally with the upper and middle classes, on all the great events which took place from day to day. The people out of doors were close observers of what passed within the House, and he believed that they would obtain—and that at no distant day—not only a considerable extension of the franchise, but a redistribution of political power. Much had been said about the apathy of the public on this question ; but he believed that the charge of apathy attached more to that House than to the people out of doors. Broken pledges had not done much to give the people of the country confidence in their representatives. On both sides of the House the necessity of Reform was admitted by leading politicians ; and on both sides measures had been introduced which would have enfranchised the people to a great extent, and provided for a redistribution of political power. Neither side, however, had been able to carry the measures they had proposed, and he feared that those failures had not tended to increase the confidence of the people in the present Parliament. He feared impressions prevailed that the conduct of the working classes in the northern counties and the manufacturing districts had to some extent diminished the confidence of the Legislature in the great body of the working classes in this country ; but it was a mistake to suppose that the active and intelligent men of the North, because they occasionally spoke out in plain language, were disloyal, and not fit to be intrusted with political power. On the contrary, his belief was that in expressing these opinions freely they were discharging something like a duty, and that in those very ebullitions of feeling there was increased safety. He would remind the House that at the time of the Reform of 1832 the people of Lancashire were in a state of great excitement upon the necessity of Reform, and the Duke of Wellington, who had even declined to give representatives to Manchester, Leeds, and Birmingham, saw at length that the spirit of the people would be roused and the constitution endangered unless something like a comprehensive system of Reform were established. There was a revolution threatening at the time ; but happily the good sense of the Legislature made great concessions to the just demands of the people, and from that moment the prosperity of the country had increased, and the people had been better satisfied. In 1832, when the population of the United Kingdom numbered about 24,000,000, the amount collected and paid into the Treasury did not exceed £47,000,000 sterling, and the expenditure was laudably less than at the present time. Now, with 30,000,000 of people, the country was contributing at the rate of £70,000,000 per annum, and that £70,000,000 was paid to the Exchequer with less animosity and with more confidence, and was levied less oppressively, than was the £47,000,000 collected in 1832. He hoped the House would continue to legislate in the direction of reducing expenditure ; but, for himself, he apprehended that they would never have an economical Government in the strict sense of the word, till they had a reformed House of Commons. Nor did he think they would have the non-intervention principle carried out, and that pacific relationship with other countries which was necessary to the diminution of expenditure secured, till the people were in possession of more power, and had a broader field of representation. If a larger number of practical men were admitted to Parliament there would be fewer blunders and extravagancies in the navy and the other public departments than there were at present. If the labouring classes had improved their position by increased intelligence and good conduct, surely Parliament could not deny their simple request that they should have the privilege of voting in the election of Members of Parliament. The people of Lancashire had on many occasions been sorely tried, but had always evinced their loyalty and good conduct; and he had known workmen say to their employers, "We know that you have been paying us wages out of capital, and we are perfectly prepared to submit to a reasonable reduction, if you will only be moderate in your demands." In Lancashire vast numbers of people had frequently assembled, and had conducted themselves with extreme propriety. When the Queen and the lamented Prince Consort opened the Manchester Exhibition there was no disorder and no confusion; but, on the contrary, there was but one feeling—a feeling of respect to those who occupied the highest positions in the kingdom. It was a mistake to suppose that calling in the aid of the labouring classes to support the good government of the country would be attended with danger to the wealthier classes. We depended upon them for the protection of our shores, for the preservation of peace, and for the safety of our property, and the only disqualification under which they now laboured was the denial of their right to vote for their own representatives. When the Queen went to the manufacturing districts on the occasion of the opening of the Peel Park, she was received with a spirit of rapturous devotion by the assembled multitudes, and a chorus of 80,000 school children welcomed the Royal visitors, and probably not one in a hundred of those children who have since grown to maturity, and have become parents, possess the privilege of voting for Members of Parliament. Recently gloom and depression had fallen upon the cotton manufacturing districts, and the patience with which the people had borne the privations to which they had been subjected afforded abundant proof of their good conduct and good intentions, for they were peaceful under the most lamentable circumstances, being willing to work, but deprived of the material from which they usually derived their employment. It would appear, then, that there were only imaginary reasons why they should not give the franchise to these people, and provide a redistribution of the political power of the country. Everything surrounding them spoke of their good conduct and intelligence, and there was evidence of their fitness to take their share of the responsibility of electing Members of Parliament; they were anxious to promote their own interests, but they were also anxious to promote the dignity and honour of the State. He hoped the Government would give due consideration to the Bill proposed by his hon. Friend, and if they should not be successful on that occasion in carrying the measure, that at least some declaration would be given that in another Parliament the great question of Reform might be fairly and impartially considered. Let the Legislature be just and wise in time, and do not let them rouse that unfortunate intimidation which came upon them some thirty years ago. The people had earned the confidence of the Legislature, and he hoped they would receive that confidence for which they had worthily laboured. The people on every hand had conducted themselves not only judiciously but in the best manner possible; and in the spirit alone of a reward for faithful service he asked the House to extend to them the franchise. They were not in the position of mere hewers of wood and drawers of water; they were intelligent people. It was not to the privileged classes that we owed our railways and great public works, but to the George Stephenson class. Let them, then, call to their aid the counsels of those who had given increased wealth to the country, and by their advice and co-operation, raise the fame of this country to a higher pitch than it had ever yet attained.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Baines.)

LORD ELCHO: Sir, I rise to move the Previous Question, and in so doing I must claim the indulgence of the House for a short time. I do not feel with the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bazley) that the fact of 80,000 Sunday-school children having been enabled to sing the National Anthem upon the opening of Peel Park is a sufficient reason for conferring the franchise upon the parents of those children. Neither can I adopt the view put forth by the hon. Member who moved the second reading (Mr. Baines) who, in his last observations, urged that the franchise ought to be extended in the manner he proposes because of the existence of railways and electric telegraphs. I must, however, refer to some former observations of the hon. Gentleman, who, as far as I could gather, seemed to reproach the Government with inconsistency upon this question. I have no desire to pronounce whether they have or have not been inconsistent in the course they have pursued. They require no answer from me — I am not the defender of the Government; but the answer was really given by the hon. Member himself when he excused the conduct of the Government. On what ground? On the ground of the apathy of the country. And if there was apathy when the Government brought forward their Bill, has not that apathy continued to this very hour? When we came down to the House to-day, did we see a single working man anywhere near who manifested any interest in the passing of this measure, which, to use the words of an hon. Member who has recently been returned to this House, is to “free him from a state of serfdom?” The hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Potter) has stated that he comes into this House in order to free the people of this country from serfdom, and also to make war upon the aristocracy. Do we find any sign out of doors that any interest is taken in this question by the public at large? And what do we find in this House? Was there any sign when the Order of the Day for the Second Reading of this Bill was read that any interest was aroused among the representatives of the people? Very few petitions have been presented to-day — only six, I believe; and were they in favour of Reform, or of this Bill? The first petition was presented by an hon. Member who, I believe, is to follow me in debate—the hon. Member for Huddersfield. [Mr. LEATHAM: Not on this subject.] The hon. Member tells me that he did not present a petition upon this subject. I know it, and that is the point I am coming to. The hon. Gentleman was one of the first to present a petition to-day. Knowing the relation of the hon. Gentleman with another distinguished Member of this House, and knowing the position which he justly occupies upon these Benches, one would naturally expect that the petition which he presented this morning would have been from Huddersfield in favour of Reform; but he got up and presented a petition about the Union Chargeability Bill. Another petition was presented by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield. [Mr. ROEBUCK: Not I.] No, not the hon. and learned Gentleman. He has presented no petition on this subject, and I expect to have the benefit of his speech in support of my Motion; but his Colleague did present a petition. Did that relate to the question? No; it was a petition about some part of the Budget. Another Gentleman, who, I believe, goes “the whole hog” in favour of universal suffrage, the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Lawson), presented a petition, but it was not in favour of Reform, but referred to something connected with tea. So that both in the House and out of the House the utmost apathy prevails upon the question. That is the justification of the course which has hitherto been adopted by the Government, and, continuing in that course, I hope the Government will not support this Bill, seeing the continued apathy which exists. I now come to the question of the consistency of the hon. Gentleman himself. The hon. and learned Gentleman—[Mr. HADFIELD: Not learned]—I must apologize for calling him learned in the law, but I may call him learned upon the question. He contrasts his own consistency with that of the Government. Now, as the hon. Gentleman will have a right of reply, I will put to him a question to which I hope he will give me an answer. It is this. The hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White) if I recollect right, in 1861, when there was no mention of Reform in the Queen’s Speech, moved an Amendment to the Address, incriminating the Government for the omission. Forty-six Members voted for that Motion; and I wish to ask the hon. Gentleman who introduced this Bill, and who twits the Government with inconsistency, and prides himself on his own consistency, whether his name will be found among the forty-six? [Mr. BAINES: It is not.] I thought so. The hon. Gentleman left the House in a sudden and unexpected manner, with difficulty escaping from being shut in, and in his hasty exit he came into collision with another hon. Member who was coming in to the division, and who, I believe, suffered during the remainder of the evening from the effects of that collision. Wishing to know whether so remarkable a story was true, I asked the hon. Member for Brighton about it, and he told me that it was true that the hon. Member for Leeds did not vote on that occasion, and that he (Mr. White) considered the Bill to be a perfect sham, and that, although he had been asked to speak and vote for it, he had refused to have anything to do with it. So much for the inconsistency of the Government and the consistency of the hon. Gentleman. Now, as regards consistency, I claim to be a better and more practical reformer. The hon. Gentleman tells us that under his Bill 240,000 voters would be added to the constituencies of the kingdom. Now, if the relative claims of men to be considered practical reformers are to be judged of by the numbers to be introduced into the constituencies by the measures they respectively supported or opposed, I claim to be a better reformer, as I supported a Bill brought in by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) which would have added 500,000 persons to the constituencies. That Bill was rejected by a Resolution to which the hon. Gentleman the Member for Leeds gave his support. I voted for that measure, not believing that any measure was required then, any more than I believe that a great re-construction of the Constitution is needed now. I believed then, as I believe now, that we have the best and most working legislative machine in the world, and that it is not necessary to take the machine to pieces because of any imperfect working, or in consequence of any dissatisfaction on the part of the people of this country with the present system of Government. But, when urged by party motives, hon. Gentlemen on both sides competed upon this question, and when it was formally brought before the House there was no choice but to vote for or against the proposition, and I voted for it. But in voting for that Bill, and in voting against the Bill of the hon. Gentleman, I will show that I am quite consistent. There is in the question before the House a broad principle to start from—the question of departing or not from the £10 household line drawn by the Reform Act. I do not wish to argue this question upon points of detail. The hon. Gentleman invites us to pronounce upon a broad issue, and I put it on the broad issue, whether or not it is advisable to depart from the base of borough franchise defined in the Reform Act. I will not enter into details as to the number of persons who would be added to the electoral list by the Bill of the hon. Gentleman, nor as to how different constituencies would be affected; but I wish to notice a petition which was presented recently from Blackburn and which seemed to me to be so curious that I copied the prayer. The petitioners say—

“Your petitioners believe that any measure short of manhood suffrage will fail to secure justice, or give entire satisfaction to that great body who are at present deprived of political power.”

That is a remarkable fact. Here is a petition in favour of the hon. Gentleman's Bill which begins by saying that any measure short of manhood suffrage will not give satisfaction nor render justice. Now, if the question of justice is urged, it must be borne in mind that manhood suffrage, which these petitioners look forward too as justice for their own class, they being a majority of the population, would be an injustice to all other classes in the Kingdom. That is not a question to be discussed upon an abstract question of justice. These petitioners go on to say—

“Nevertheless, they pray that, as an instalment of political justice, your honourable House will pass into law the provisions of Mr. Baines's Bill, which confers the franchise on all inhabitant householders paying a £6 rental, and whereby the number of Parliamentary electors within the borough of Blackburn would be increased from 1,845, as at present, to upwards of 7,000.”

I think that sufficiently shows what would be the effect of this measure upon the constituencies of the Empire if it were passed into law. [Mr. BAINES: No.] That is the statement as to Blackburn, and it is for the hon. Gentleman to disprove it. The hon. Gentleman has read from some old book a list of Members elected before the Reform Act under the potwalloping system—a kind of universal suffrage—and it struck me that if he had gone on much longer he would have induced the hon. Gentlemen who sit behind him to vote against his Bill, for he went on reading one historic name after another until it seemed as if his Friends behind him did not approve the results of universal suffrage as much as might be expected. However, as I have said, we ought not to discuss this question upon mere details, but to consider whether it be wise to depart from the £10 limit of the Reform Act. Now, what are the reasons put forward by the hon. Gentleman? I think I shall fairly state his case in this way:—At present it appears that the middle and upper classes are represented, but the working classes are not represented—that they are, therefore, dissatisfied; that this Bill will satisfy them, and will strengthen the bases of the Constitution. Now, as to the working classes not being represented in this House, if it is meant that they have no special representatives, I admit it; but I can say, from many years' experience in Parliament, that although the working classes have no special representatives here, yet their interests are well looked after—and that in preference to the interests of any other class of the community. The first question which generally arises in the minds of hon. Members in considering any measure is how will this affect the masses of the people? That is the ruling principle of all the Budgets of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The working classes may not be personally represented here, but I doubt very much whether it will be a wise thing for the Constitution of this country that we should have in Parliament, not men representing the whole people, but merely delegates to represent certain opinions. If these persons, taking extreme views, should find themselves in a minority, dissatisfaction would be the result. I therefore greatly prefer the system under which men are sent to this House, not to represent one class but the whole people. But how far are the working classes excluded by the present line? The hon. Gentleman admitted that a great many might come under the £10 line. The hon. Member for Salisbury, I believe, stated last year that the mass of his constituents came in. I have been endeavouring to get information on this point, and I believe I can show either that the working men do now come in, or that if they do not they exclude themselves by their own fault. A friend connected with the iron manufacturing districts has collected the following statistics for me, from the works in his neighbourhood, relating to workmen whose average wages are £2 5s. per week. There are 41 men living in houses of from £12 to £10 rental; 51 in houses of from £10 to £8; 34 in houses of from £8 to £7; and 28 in houses of from £7 to £6, making a total of 154. Of the other men employed at the works the greater proportion lived in houses above £12, and the remainder were labourers. It is easy to see from these figures with what a slight effort a large proportion of these men might, if they chose, have raised themselves to the possession of the franchise. If those living in houses of from £10 to £12 would only raise themselves to the franchise, two-thirds would be represented. What is true of these works is true of other works throughout the kingdom. When this Bill is spoken of as a gigantic instrument for raising the condition of the working classes, I believe it will have the effect of taking away a stimulus to providence and to the ambition of getting into a good house, and so getting possession of the franchise. On this point we have recently had some instructive information from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who told us the other night that a temperate working man drank eight quarts of beer a day. ["No, no."] That is certainly what he is reported to have said in The Times newspaper. [An hon. MEMBER: It was workmen of a particular class.] Well, that may be; but any one can calculate, taking the price of beer at 6d. per quart—for these men will not drink the fourpenny beer—that the difference between a £6 and £10 house may easily be surmounted by knocking off one quart of beer per day. It is not unreasonable, therefore, to say that it remains with the working men whether they will cross the present line or not; and, according to the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it appears as though there will be a considerable dilution of beer in the cream of the working classes of which the hon. Gentleman speaks. The hon. Member said there was at present a great deal of dissatisfaction among the people, which would be removed by this Bill? But is it probable that the people will be satisfied with this Bill? The facts are certainly against the hon. Gentleman's assertion. An attempt has recently been made to establish a Reform League between the middle and the working classes, and a conference has been held between the representatives of the working classes and of the middle classes to establish what is called in the United States a "platform" for a reform agitation. Mr. Odgers, the Secretary to the London Trades Unions, attended it, and he reported to the working men the result of the conference. In this report of his he says:—"Mr. Bright made a speech in favour of household suffrage" (so that the hon. Member for Birmingham is not in favour of this Bill, but goes beyond it), "which produced a most desponding effect on the meeting." Then he went on to say—

"After him came Mr. Ayrton, who expressed exactly similar opinions, notwithstanding that he had been elected solely and simply because he advocated manhood suffrage. He would not follow Mr. Ayrton, as his twaddle was too contemptible to notice."

Then came Mr. Mason Jones, an Irish gentleman, a very clever man, who gives lectures, a friend, I believe, of the hon. Member for Bradford. [Mr. W. E. FORSTER: He was not before.] On Easter Monday there was to have been a great meeting on the subject of reform, at which 100,000 working men were to have been present, and Mr. Jones waited on my hon.

Friend the Member for Bradford in the lobby and asked him to attend a preliminary meeting and "go the whole hog" for universal suffrage. My hon. Friend said that he would attend if he might express his own views; and the answer was, "Then, Sir, we don't want you." Whereupon my hon. Friend turned away and went off into the House, and Mr. Jones apostrophized him in these words, which the hon. Member himself did not hear until I repeated them to him afterwards:—

"You have no business to set your foot in those walls—a man of such opinions as yours has no right to a seat in there."

That is Mr. Mason Jones. At this same meeting of the working classes that gentleman moved a resolution in favour of manhood suffrage, which was seconded by Mr. Beall, Mr. P. Taylor, M.P., and Mr. Lawson, M.P., and carried without a division. I believe it will be said that this merely applied to the working men of the metropolis; but at a recent meeting of the working men of Bradford to consider this Bill a resolution was passed in favour not of this Bill, but of a rating suffrage, which was a very different thing from a £6 franchise. Therefore the working classes, as represented by their agitators (and these must not be confounded with the thoughtful portion of the working classes) are not satisfied with this Bill. Among others Mr. Potter. ["What Potter?"] Why, the Potter. Not the hon. Member for Rochdale, who came into the House to rescue us all from serfdom, but Mr. Potter of Trades' Union notoriety. He said at a recent Reform meeting—

"None of the Reform Bills hitherto brought forward were acceptable to the working classes. The admission of 150,000 by the £6 franchise cannot for a moment be considered satisfactory. We ask for manhood suffrage, equalized electoral districts, ballot, triennial Parliaments."

Therefore the agitators were hostile to the Bill. And how did the thoughtful men among the working classes regard it?—for I quite agree in all that has been said by the hon. Member as to the high qualities of the working men, and, probably, if we were all put on our P's and Q's by the Civil Service Examiners some of the working men might turn out better than many Members of us. Were these men satisfied with the Bill? Hon. Members, who in reality know nothing about working men, occasionally talk of them as if they were the only persons acquainted with their feelings and opinions, just because they have a few working men in their constituencies or employ a few. But what are the facts? We have recently had a great strike in the iron trade; and to whom did the working men go in their difficulties when they wanted arbitration and conciliation? Birmingham is the great centre of that manufacture, and the men certainly did not go to the hon. Member for Birmingham, perhaps because they thought that for a work of conciliation it was not wise to go to a man whose whole public life has been spent in setting class against class. ["No, no!"] I repeat it, and it is a statement incapable of denial. No—they went to one of those men whom the hon. Member would tell them were opposed to the working classes and who disliked them, they went to a lord—to the lord-lieutenant of the county. If there is one man who has done more than any other to raise the working classes, and that, too, in the teeth of those who would represent that men of his order are the enemies of the working classes, it is Lord Shaftesbury. The good which the noble Earl has done is written in the Statute Book. The hon. Member himself referred, in terms for which I thank him, to my humble services in the Volunteer movement. I do not put myself forward as empowered to speak on behalf of the working classes, but I have been thrown much into contact with them since the commencement of the Volunteer movement. I have always struggled to get the working men into that movement, because I have always felt that nothing in the world will do more to strengthen this country against her enemies, wherever they are to be found. I am happy to say that that result has been obtained to a great extent, and I believe that two-thirds of the Volunteer force is composed of the working men of this country. Among those working men was one in my own corps with whom I had some little difference. He went away, but came back again to the corps, and subsequently became one of my best sergeants. He then went to America; but finding very soon that he did not like it he came home again. However, thinking that food was cheaper and employment more remunerative there—for he was a very clever workman, a painter and grainer—he went back to the United States, where he now is. I have kept up a constant correspondence with him; and when this Bill was coming on I wrote to him, with a view of ascertaining what the working men really think on the subject. The following is an extract from his letter, which, with the permission of the House, I will read:—

“My dear Lord—Returning from a trip of 400 miles, I found your letter. I had been away some time graining the cabins of the big steamers that run from Grand Haven to Wisconsin. I consider the time favourable for a consideration of the suffrage question, but only for a consideration of it. Any action of a satisfactory kind is impossible without a long, careful, and searching inquiry into the intellectual and moral condition of the masses, directed in good faith by the heads of parties, with a view to the extension of the suffrage. There is no ground between the present standard and manhood suffrage, save educational tests or the evidence of providential habits. The proposal of a £6 rental qualification would be an insult to those among the working classes whose intelligence, loyalty, and patience deserved consideration. Stop any workman you meet in our cities, he will tell you that his rent amounts to at least a sixth of his weekly earnings, or a fifth of his yearly income; this is of necessity, but from choice the proportion of an intelligent workman's rent to his income is much higher. I know London, Manchester, Glasgow, and many other towns and cities well, but do not know any mechanic, having respect for himself or his family, who would live in a £6 hovel. Workmen, heads of families, pay for lodgings 5s., 6s., 7s., and 8s., a week in London, and from 4s. to 6s. in all our provincial cities. Clerks pay more than mechanics in proportion to their income, but they prefer half of a £30 house to the whole of a £15 house. But if rent is to have anything to do with voting, why not let all who pay £10 a year, but who are not rated because they are lodgers, vote? Domicile for a given time would be necessary, as it is here, for identification, and landlords' receipts give title for registration. You would thus greatly enlarge the constituency by men who prove their respectability by their own respect for the decencies of life.”

But for this large and important class of lodgers not the slightest provision is made in this Bill. The writer goes on to say—

“Universal suffrage was part of my youthful creed, but I have seen it in operation. The illusion is dispelled. There is no man in America who will deny the existence of the most frightful baseness and corruption in all political matters here, and while you are pressing forward this nation wants to go back. Educational tests are proposed by most, but many, desirous to throw the odium on emigrants, propose that all persons shall reside twenty-one years here before becoming entitled to vote. This would be a long apprenticeship to liberty for a freeborn Briton. It is easy to talk about the working classes, but there are few who have studied them. The Volunteer army has got the flower of them; those who enter the ranks are dead to faction.”

He then goes on to mention some men to whom he referred as authorities, describing them as not active politicians, but thoughtful men, and far ahead of their class; and in particular he mentioned two who were pianoforte makers, and who, he said, knew well every wire and hammer of the political instrument. The letter, I believe, was written in March last. I sent for these two men, and I found that their views coincided exactly with those of my friend in the United States. I have also talked with a gentleman connected with 280,000 working men—an official of the Foresters' Society—and his views also concurred with those expressed in this letter. I have also conversed with another gentleman, Mr. M'Donald, the President of the Miners' Association, who represents some 60,000 men, and who has recently been in London on a mission of practical good for the workers in mines. It was greatly through his exertions that a Committee to inquire into the Workmen and Masters' Act had been appointed—another instance, by the way, of the manner in which the House, as at present constituted, attends to the interests of the working classes. Mr. M'Donald has some right to speak on behalf of the thoughtful and provident working men, because when he was a miner in Lanarkshire, he worked during all the summer months in order to save money to pay for his classes in Glasgow University during the winter. He had not got a vote —[Mr. BAINES: Hear, hear! ]—because he lived in lodgings. I asked Mr. M'Donald to put his views on this subject on paper, and the following is the letter which he wrote to me:—

“I think that fancy or provident franchises might well be carried out on the following or other bases:—1. By giving a vote to all who could show that for two years they had had not less than £50 in any chartered or Government savings bank. The effect of this condition would be to increase providence among the working classes to a very great degree. 2. By giving votes to all who pay income tax, and to all entered as Government annuitants under the recent Government Annuities Bill. As regards the question of Reform, the working classes at this moment, so far as I see, take but little interest in it. They look more to substantial comforts than to Reform. This much I do know, that they have little sympathy with that class of Reformers who would as yet have had the factory children working all but interminable hours in the factories, who would have had still the young engaged in the bleaching and dye work, all but chained to the stoves, and who are at the present time totally indifferent as to the long hours that the young are engaged in the mines of this country.”

The ground I take is this—I find all those thoughtful men think that by lowering the franchise as is proposed in this indiscriminate way, while you will get a certain number of good, prudent, and intelligent men, yet inasmuch as the mass of men are improvident and ignorant, in spite of mechanics' institutes, and perhaps will be so till the end of time, the thoughtful and provident working people will be swamped as entirely as any other class of the community. I maintain, therefore, that this is not a satisfactory mode of dealing with the question. I say boldly that the grounds on which this Bill is brought forward will not hold water. The measure is one which strikes at those of the working classes who are thoughtful and provident, and places the political power of the country in the hands of the thoughtless and improvident. These, generally, are the grounds as regards the working classes—and it is in their interest the hon. Gentleman says he comes forward—on which I oppose the Bill. But I object on principle to lower the franchise, because once you do so the result is inevitable. This will not be denied by hon. Gentlemen; for, indeed, they have admitted it to me in private conversation. ["Oh, oh!"] I do not see any objection to my alluding in general terms to such private conversations as those to which I refer. Hon. Gentlemen are perfectly at liberty to repeat every word that I have said in this sort of private conversation. They admit, I say, that the result of this Bill, or any measure like it, will be to lead to universal suffrage. I have brought forward facts to show you that such will be the result; that this Bill will be taken only as an instalment, and that even now those who attend meetings in its favour are obliged to "go the whole hog." And looking to the history of the past, this is only what may be expected. Why, two years after the passing of the Reform Bill, a measure was introduced having for its object to bring about another great change in the Constitution; and from the date of the passing of the Reform Bill to the present time there have been something like forty great measures for a change in the suffrage and the constitution submitted to Parliament. Is there any likelihood that the history of the future will differ in this respect from that of the past? Is it not one of the peculiarities of the Liberal party that however they may advance, there will always be advanced Liberals? There will be different grades; there will be democrats at one end of the scale, and men of moderation at the other. There is no such easy way of obtaining popularity as by taking up the Constitution and giving it a good shake. That is a much easier mode of becoming popular than for the Retrenchment party to come down here night after night, and, by taking part in the debates on the Estimates, endeavour to keep down the expenses of the country. I happened to be here one night when a question of £14,000,000 was being discussed, and the only Member of the Retrenchment party present was the hon. and learned Gentleman who represents the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton). My hon. Friend the Member for Bridgewater (Mr. Kinglake) will bear me out in that. If you adopt a £6 franchise now, you will have a £5 franchise hereafter. I object to this lowering of the franchise, as being certain to lead to universal suffrage. I say that if any change is made it should be in a contrary direction, as the principle of universal suffrage is contrary to the whole system of our Constitution. I shall not enter into a long argument to prove this, because I think it must be admitted. The theory and principle of our Constitution does not rest on "the rights of man," but as Lord Russell once said, every man in our community has a right to be properly governed, not a right to vote. It is contrary to the spirit of our Constitution that you should have a representation of individuals. Classes and not individuals ought to be represented. This point is so ably put by one of your School Inspectors, the Rev. J. Norris, that I shall take the liberty of reading what he wrote in reply to a question which I asked him, with respect to the feelings of the working men, as far as his experience enabled him to form an opinion on the subject. He says—

"In this sort of talk (not caring for individual representation) and in these instincts, surely one may trace the true principle of representation—that it should be a representation of classes and of great interests, not of individuals. A Parliament elected on the former principle (the organic principle) is a true mirror of our national life. A Parliament elected on the latter principle (the principle of disintegration) is a smashed mirror—each fragment represents something, but what the whole represents who shall say? Now a mere lowering of the franchise is a step in this last direction; neither right in philosophy nor likely to meet the healthy desire of the people, to have the wage paid class (as a class) more proportionately represented."

But there is another argument. You hear a great deal said about the pressure of an arbitrary line. No doubt £10 is a line which you have drawn; but there is no argument founded on that which will not apply with equal force to a £6 or any other line. As I said in 1859 the line which you drew in 1832 has changed, is changing daily, and will continue to change, and this, through the increase that has been gradually going on in the relative value of property and money. I have had this matter calculated in Edinburgh by the actuary of one of the greatest of the Scottish Assurance Companies ; and he says—

“ Houses which in 1832 were let at £10 would now bring a rental of £12 10s. Other property has increased in money value to something like the same extent. Land, which in 1832 was sold for twenty-five years' purchase, giving for what then rented at £10 £250, would now sell for thirty years' purchase of the increased rental of £12 10s., or £375. The probable change hereafter will, no doubt, be in the direction of a similar increase ; whether the tendency will be accelerated or retarded, must depend on many contingencies. Perhaps a safe assumption would be that the same rate of enhancement will continue to prevail.”

In addition to this, remember the 40s. freehold, which in the reign of Queen Elizabeth represented eleven times the value of what it represents now ; so that this arbitrary line is perpetually changing. In sixty years the franchise, which was fixed at £10, may, as a consequence of those changes, be reduced to a £5 franchise ; and when dealing with a Constitution which has lasted for so many centuries this is an element that ought not to be left out of consideration. I wish to say, in conclusion, that I think the real danger to the country lies in the way in which this measure is treated within this House. We have this side roughly divided into advanced Liberals and orthodox Liberals. [A laugh.] Well, then, regular Liberals. I say it is roughly divided by this gangway into regular Liberals and advanced Liberals. Above the gangway you have Liberals, men who are members of the Fox Club, and who are inheritors of the traditions and policy of the Whigs of the days of that eminent statesman—men who are lovers of the Constitution and who wish to transmit it to posterity. Below the gangway you have advanced Liberals, men who, I think, can hardly be said to be in favour of the Constitution. [“ Oh, oh !”] I make that assertion because they constantly, in their speeches, endeavour to throw discredit on the Constitution. [“ No, no !”] You have a philosophic but not practical section, men whose views are represented by such writers as Mr. Goldwin Smith—who advocates pure Republicanism and who is Regius Professor of Modern History at Oxford, to which professorship he was appointed by Lord Derby—and Mr. Mill. The hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White) advocates within the House somewhat the same principles as Mr. Mill does out of doors ; but without those checks and counterpoises which Mr. Mill would apply. I think I may say that the philosophical Radical is not represented in this House, because I must admit that the philosophy propounded in this House is of a most practical character. Take the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) for instance. His philosophy consists principally in holding up the institutions of America in contrast with our own. In everything we see his wish is to assimilate the institutions of this country—I do not think they would go the whole length of republicanism—to the institutions which prevail in America. Now, Sir, I do not think there is any danger to this country from the speeches of those gentlemen, honest and conscientious as I believe them to be—able as I know them to be. Why ? On account of the very apathy on this question which I referred to in the commencement of my speech, and because the country knows too well the practical advantage of the Constitution which it enjoys. It knows that we shall do away with the force of representation if we give a vote to every man and woman in the country on the condition that he or she do a sum in the rule of three before they go up. Unpractical theories like these find no place in the thought of the people of this country, nor do they appeal to the sympathies of a practical people. On the other hand, persons of extreme radical views, seeing that such a measure as the present would give a stimulus to improvidence, and eventually lead to universal suffrage, and knowing that there was no wrong which could not now be remedied and redressed, recoil against the notion of going in the direction of American institutions. Therefore it is that no danger is to be apprehended from gentlemen holding these extreme views. Where the great danger lies is in the way in which this question is treated—namely, not as a great question of principle, but as a question of party—because it is undeniable that it is dealt with in this way. You hear two different languages on the subject ; you hear one outside, and the other inside these doors. I will go further, and say that even within these walls you hear one language, Sir, behind your chair and another in front of it ; and you have men voting for this measure who dislike it in their hearts. You also have Governments sanctioning a guerilla war on this question, and not having the pluck to come forward and stop it, though they, too, dislike the Bill quite as much in their hearts. Two reasons are assigned for this inconsistency. One, duty to party; the other, duty to self. I believe that the Government of this country must be carried on by party; but I believe, likewise, that there are great questions which ought to be taken out of the demesne of party; and that after you have got the Constitution fixed this question of the suffrage is one that ought to be settled by the two parties in this House, not in the interests of party but in the interests of the nation. It so happens that I cast my eye the other day on a page in Mr. Kaye's History of the Indian Mutiny—a book which contains writing as pleasant, effective, and exciting as anything in any of Mr. Wilkie Collins's or Miss Braddon's novels. In reference to this question of party Mr. Kaye says—

“In that country (India) public men are happily not exposed to the pernicious influences which in England shrivel them so fast into party leaders and Parliamentary chiefs. With perfect singleness of aim and pure sincerity of purpose they go with level eyes straight at the public good, never looking up in fear at the suspended sword of a Parliamentary majority, and never turned aside by that fear into devious paths of trickery and finesse.”

I do not believe that even the interests of party require that great questions of this kind, on which the very ground under us depends, on which the inheritance of our children may be said to rest, should be made party questions. They ought to be settled in a reasonable manner by both parties uniting to devise the means by which this can best be done. Neither do I believe that in the interest of individuals it is wise to use one language in public and another in private. I believe that a mistake we too often make is to listen to the noisy section of our constituents, and suppose they speak the opinion of those who send us to Parliament. Those who are inclined to act in this manner would do well to remember a beautiful passage in the writings of Mr. Burke, where he observes that listening to the hum of bees and the noise of insects you might imagine that they were the sole inhabitants of a field in which a herd of oxen were quietly browsing. I believe that the heart and the head of the country are sound on this question, and that the country is not in favour of those wild organic changes. In 1848, when an attempt was made by force to storm the Constitution the people of all classes uprose as one man and defended it. What we have to guard against now is not an attack upon the Constitution by visible forces, but an attack by sap and by mine; but I believe that if the Members of this House will stand by the Constitution the people—their constituents—will stand by them. I have, on these grounds, determined to move the Previous Question. There are other objections to the Bill, but they are self-evident—such as the fact that it is brought in at the end of a Session and of a Parliament, and the inconvenience of such a measure being taken up by a private Member—the fact of its being a Bill which its Mover and supporters know cannot, under any circumstances, become law this Session—for we are all aware that any Bill in the hands of a private Member, even though it may have been read a second time, stands very little chance of being passed this Session. But, as I have observed, these objections are self-evident, and therefore I have not argued them. I have endeavoured to argue on the broad question whether or not it is wise and for the interest of the country to lower the franchise. At the same time, I wish to guard myself against being one of those who believe in finality in human affairs. There is nothing final, except the close of human life. But I say that if changes are to be made, they ought not to be made in the direction of this Bill. It is a dangerous direction; while in any change of the franchise you should secure justice for all classes of the community, including the working man. By breaking through the £10 arrangement—by lowering the suffrage—you cut the string of the pendulum which regulates the working of the machinery. If you find extension necessary, you should try to secure it, not by cutting the string, but by extending the chord of the arc which the pendulum describes without lengthening the line. [An hon. MEMBER: How would you do that?] I am asked how would I do that. By giving more momentum to the machinery in the way pointed out by my friend the working man. I can hardly hope that what I have said will influence the votes of hon. Members on this occasion. But I have spoken of the faith that is in me; and as an humble instrument sometimes leads to considerable and notable ends, I hope that in endeavouring to change the current into another channel I may have done some good; and, as this Bill professes to be in the interest of the working man, I have thought it not inappropriate to quote the opinions of intelligent, thoughtful, and industrious persons of that body; and I hope I may be the humble means of effecting some good in connection with this question, if I have suggested to men of more ability than myself points which are worthy of being considered in the course of this discussion. With these remarks I beg to move the Previous Question.

MR. BLACK, in seconding the Amendment, said, that he considered the course proposed by this Bill to be exceedingly dangerous, that it was only the first step in a downward progress towards revolution. What is it that this Bill proposes to do? It is to confer the electoral franchise on every occupant of premises of the yearly value of £6—which premises, it is explained, must consist of a dwelling-house exclusive of land, and the house must be of the yearly value of not less than £3, or 1s. 3d. a week. It does not stimulate the working man who is anxious for a vote to increased industry, economy, and prudence, in order that he may obtain the object of his ambition, and, at the same time, provide himself and his family with a dwelling conducive to health and decency, but it in effect says, "You need not exert yourself to rise, for we will come down to you." No prudent man would step into a railway carriage without first ascertaining where it was to stop; it will be too late to inquire after the train has begun to move; so I consider it will be prudent, before we begin to move in this direction, to ascertain where we are to stop. There is obviously a want of agreement on this point: Some propose to stop at the £6 house, some at the £5, and some to go beyond the houses altogether; and if we are to go in this direction at all, it is with these last I am persuaded we shall be obliged to travel. If in the elective franchise we agree to a downward movement, we must be prepared for an accelerated descent, and that by geometrical progression, till we reach the bottom. To the arguments generally used by those who advocate Parliamentary Reform by merely lowering the franchise, certainly tend, they say, that those from whom it is withheld are unjustly deprived of their rights, that they are degraded by their exclusion, that they are worse treated than the serfs in Russia; but if it is injustice and degradation to be excluded from the franchise when you relieve the £6 tenants, you inflict, according to your own arguments, injustice and degradation on all below

£6. The first question they were called upon to decide was whether the franchise was an inherent and inviolable right, or a trust committed to those on whom it is conferred, for the benefit of the nations. If it is a right which the possessors are entitled to exercise for their personal benefit, then it must appertain to every individual in the kingdom, and its exercise ought not to be limited to persons inhabiting houses of a £6 rental. The hon. Gentleman who had brought forward the Bill, had laid before them most valuable statistics, showing the vast increase in the quantity of paper used in printing political and other works; and they would have strongly supported his argument as to the advances which the £6 householders had made in political and general knowledge, and consequently their fitness to exercise the franchise, if he could have shown that the whole of the works for which the paper was used had been purchased exclusively by persons inhabiting houses the rental of which was between £6 and £10. It was said that withholding the franchise from £6 householders was a degrading and insulting grievance. If that assertion were correct, did it not apply equally to those who inhabited houses of a less rent, and, in fact, to all persons from whom the franchise was withheld? Surely it was adding insult to injury to open the door to a portion of the community, and to tell those who were excluded that the fact of their not being admitted degraded them in the eyes of their fellow-countrymen. The Bill before the House proposed to admit only 240,000 out of 6,000,000 adult males. What was to become of the odd 5,750,000 who were to remain unrepresented? The Bill applied only to England and Wales. He could not understand why Scotland and Ireland should have been omitted, because if the franchise was to be given to those who occupied £6 houses, why should not the Scotch and Irish £6 householders also be entitled to a vote? If the hon. Gentleman's argument were correct, an enormous injustice was being done to every man from whom the franchise was being withheld. In fact, the logical and consistent deduction from the arguments of those who advocated the reduction of the franchise, in order to enfranchise particular sections of the community, was decidedly in favour of universal suffrage. It would be well on this point to look at the language of those who were demanding to be admitted into the franchise. He had taken notes of the different petitions in favour of

Parliamentary Reform which had come before the House in the course of the present Session. Of the ten which had been presented three were professedly in favour of this Bill; but when they were examined it would be found that they went considerably further in their demands than the terms of the Bill itself. In a petition from the inhabitants of Carlisle he found the words to be these—

Again, the inhabitants of Norwich said—

“We the undersigned loyal subjects of Her Majesty are industrious working men who pay our share of the taxes and help to maintain and increase the national wealth. We think it unjust that we and our brethren throughout England should as a rule be declared unworthy to enjoy the rights of citizens. We pray, therefore, that another Reform Bill may be passed to give to all honest, industrious, and loyal men their rights of election.”

The North London Political Union in their petition asked that every sane man over twenty-one years of age, not undergoing punishment for crime, and not having been arrested within six months prior to the time for registration, should be put upon the register and entitled to vote at the election of Members of Parliament; they also demanded vote by ballot. Several other petitions were couched in somewhat similar terms, and they proved one thing most clearly—namely, that those who were agitating for Reform would not be satisfied with the Bill which the hon. Gentleman had proposed. If there were any reason in the arguments of the hon. Gentleman, and of those who advocated this Bill, the persons who drew up those petitions were quite right in going as far as they did—because if the Bill were carried, there could be no escape from universal suffrage; and unless the advocates of the present measure gave the franchise to the whole of the people they would not be acting up to the logical deduction from their own arguments. Let hon. Members be assured that if they stood with their hand upon the half-opened door and, after admitting the 240,000, said to the others, “You are unworthy of being admitted and we shall leave you standing out in the cold,” there would then be that “ugly rush,” and the millions who were outside would press forward, and in the end, in the course of a longer or a shorter time, they would arrive at their object, namely, universal suffrage. The question, therefore, lay simply between universal suffrage and the preservation of the British Constitution—the destruction or the continuance of the system of Parliamentary representation which they possessed at present. He, for one, would lift his voice against any attempt to destroy or impair the Constitution, as he believed there was more freedom both of speech and of action and greater peace and prosperity in this country than in those where there was either universal suffrage or a much lower franchise than ours. He could not help, under these circumstances, regarding the Bill as being somewhat of a revolutionary character—not that he was opposed to a well balanced Parliamentary Reform, but because he considered that the tendency of this Bill was to bring into our representative system an overpowering number of one class which would swamp the others, and end in universal suffrage. The hon. Member (Mr. Baines) said the £6 householders ought to be admitted because they had made such great progress in political and other knowledge. But if that were to be admitted as an argument they had better at once send round Civil Service Commissioners to examine the entire bulk of the population, in order to ascertain who among them were entitled to be enfranchised. Earl Russell, in his introduction to his Essay on the English Constitution, gives an account of the manner in which the Reform of 1832 was prepared. When asked by Lord Grey to prepare a sketch of the plan he says—

“There were evidently two modes in which Reform might be approached. The one was to consider the right of voting as a personal privilege possessed by every man of sound mind and of years of discretion as an inherent inalienable right, belonging to him as a member of a free country. According to this theory the votes of the whole male adult population form the only basis of legitimate government. Other political writers and eminent statesmen while of opinion that a free and full representation of the people forms a necessary condition of free Government acknowledge no personal right of voting as inalienable and essential. They consider that the purpose to be attained is good Government, the freedom of the people within the State, and their security from without, and that the best mode of attaining these ends is the problem to be solved. It seemed to me that these last reasoners were in the right.”

I agree with the political writers and eminent statesmen to whom Lord John Russell referred, that the elective franchise is not a right but a trust, and the people are entitled to that system of Government which will confer upon them the greatest amount of happiness and prosperity.

Whereupon Previous Question proposed, "That that Question be now put."—(Lord Elcho.)

MR. LEATHAM: Sir, it is an admitted maxim that it is never too late to mend, and we may all further admit that it is never too late to learn. Now, if I recollect rightly, the hon. Member who has just sat down (Mr. Black) gave his constituents a few years ago a series of speeches in approval of the measure proposed by the noble Lord the then Member for the City of London. [Mr. BLACK: No, no.] Then I am misinformed. The hon. Gentleman is a fitting seconder of the Amendment which has been moved by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire, because the noble Lord the Member for the City of London stated that he withdrew his Bill in deference of the speeches of the hon. Gentleman and of another hon. Gentleman not now a Member of the House (Mr. Massey). I do not propose to reply to the arguments of the hon. Member, as both his arguments and his conclusions were quite inaudible where I sat. I should, however, like to say a few words with reference to the extremely able speech of the noble Lord who has moved the Previous Question. The arguments of the noble Lord naturally fall under two heads; first, those which are proper to his Motion, which is a Motion for time; and secondly, those arguments which are not proper to the present Motion, but to another Motion, which, whatever may have been the noble Lord's inclination as evidenced by his speech, yet, sitting upon this side of the House, he seemed hardly to have the courage to move—namely, that the Bill be read a second time upon this day six months. I will first dwell upon those arguments—or rather I ought to say assertions—which are proper to his Motion. The noble Lord said that this Bill ought not to be supported—in fact, that it ought never to have been introduced at all—because it has not been introduced by the Government. I might say, in reply, that when a similar proposal was introduced as part of the Bill of the noble Lord then Member for the City of London, as a Government measure, it did not receive the support of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire. But how does he suggest that this question should be kept alive in Parliament if, when the Government is too weak or too supine to deal with the subject, independent Members are to be equally precluded from doing so?

No doubt hon. Gentlemen who sit in this part of the House give what is called a general support to the Administration; but surely they are not expected to carry their allegiance quite so far as to refrain from the discussion of, or to be debarred from introducing measures which they believe to be of incomparable importance—measures which have received the deliberate sanction and approval of the existing Administration which have been recommended from the Throne, and which have only not been pressed on because of reasons best known to the Government themselves. Independent Members are not to be put to silence because the Government choose to run away from the opinions they have expressed and the pledges they have publicly given. And how are we to act for the future upon the Government if, when they choose to drop a great question to which they are distinctly pledged, our lips are to be sealed and there is to be no remonstrance and there is to be no appeal? How are we to clear ourselves from the charge of connivance in that shelving of the question? There is no doubt that the Government ought to have introduced this measure, and that they should have brought it forward with all the weight and authority of a responsible Administration. But how does the fact that the Administration have failed in their duty release us from the pledges we too have given, and from which we too are not disposed to run away? I do not think it helps the noble Lord to say that there is no chance of passing this measure unless it receive the active support of the Government, and that, therefore, it ought not to have been introduced. It was by debate in Parliament, and especially in that House, commented upon as they were by the press, and originating and maintaining as they did, discussion all over the country that public opinion was formed and confirmed; and though it is the province of a responsible Government to deal with great constitutional questions, it is also the province of every Englishman, and especially of every Member of this House, if he pleases, to take the initiative in all matters relating to public opinion. But the noble Lord said that the last year of an expiring Parliament is not the time to introduce a measure of this character—will he prescribe a given period in the life of a Parliament when he thinks such a question as this ought to be discussed? Is it when we are fresh from the country? There is no great inclination at that time to undertake the discussion and settlement of a question which involves an immediate revisit to our beloved constituents. How many years of that absence which "makes the heart grow fonder," are necessary before our yearning towards them reaches such a pitch that we should be inclined cheerfully to arrive at a decision which would involve an immediate return to the country? If it is not immediately after a general election, or immediately before a dissolution, when ought we to discuss Reform? When anything is asked to which the House has a repugnance it will be found that it is always asked too soon—except when it is asked too late. These are the arguments proper to the Motion of the noble Lord, at which he glanced very briefly. I will now pass to those which are not proper to the Motion, but which the noble Lord elaborated very carefully. And here I may say that it is no part of my intention to enter upon any sustained argument, or to give the House any laboured statistics on this question. I think we have reached a phase in the history of this question when candour is more wanted than statistics. It has been admitted by both sides of the House that there exists in the country a large number of persons who are wrongfully excluded from the franchise. Hon. Gentlemen opposite have admitted this by the fact of their having introduced a Bill, the object of which was, according to their own statements, to admit some hundreds of thousands of persons within the pale of the constitution. Both sides will admit, in the second place, that it is inexpedient to keep this question dangling for ever before the eyes of the people; and, in the third place, if we are to arrive at any settlement at all, that it ought to be a settlement broad and liberal—broad and liberal enough to last our time. Surely the noble Lord and his friends do not suppose that any less liberal settlement of this question than that proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds is likely to answer these conditions, or that by temporising you can defer the settlement of this question to a time when it may be settled more in accordance with the views of the noble Lord. Now, what is the real obstacle to the passing of this Bill? It seems to me that the attitude of the noble Lord and his friends resembles nothing so much as that of a patient about to undergo a painful operation. The patient knows that he must have it out, yet he begs for five minutes' grace, and this craving for grace takes the form of argument as inconclusive and incoherent—if I may be allowed to say so—as those to which the House has listened to day. The noble Lord argues against this Bill on the ground that no Reform is necessary. He says the State is well governed; therefore we have no need for Reform. ["Hear!"] Hon. Gentlemen opposite think we have not, and I am not surprised at their thinking so. This is a time-honoured argument of which we heard a good deal forty years ago. It is the "Vellum and Plumpkin" argument, which was so well ridiculed by Sydney Smith—

"Under Vellum and Plumpkin we have become a great nation. Under Vellum and Plumpkin our ships have covered the ocean. Under Vellum and Plumpkin our armies have triumphed over the strength of the hills. To turn out Vellum and Plumpkin would be, not Reform, but Revolution."

The Question before the House is not whether the country is well governed or not. We profess that in this country we live under free institutions; we do not regard the Government of this country as the noble Lord regards it, as an admirable mechanical contrivance, but as something with a soul in it—the intelligence of the country governing itself; and so long as there is admitted to be a large amount of intelligence outside of the Governing body, so long we contend is our ideal of Government not realized; and so long wherever it is practicable there is need of Reform. The noble Lord went on to say that if we conceded this Bill the probability would be we should have to concede something else. That is the old, old stumbling block over which hon. Gentlemen have fallen times out of mind—they refuse to concede something justifiable and unobjectionable, because they may afterwards be asked to concede something unjustifiable and objectionable. And what happened? When justice was at last extorted they had to fight their real battle, or what appeared to be their real battle, mortified, humbled, and prostrated by defeat, instead of being fortified by a graceful and timely concession. I now pass to the argument of the noble Lord that we are about to swamp the constituencies. I would ask the noble Lord, in the first place, where it is that the preponderance of the working classes would be so great as to swamp the constituencies? Is it in the large boroughs or the small boroughs? Unquestionably not in the small boroughs—but in the very places in which we have the authority of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Hertfordshire (Sir Bulwer Lytton) for saying, "that democracy may be said at present practically to prevail." It would seem, therefore, that all the mischief which can be done has already been accomplished. But have hon. Gentlemen opposite observed a remarkable fact in reference to some of these large boroughs, that now and then they return Conservatives? Why is that? Strong individuality of opinion is the forte, it may be also the foible, of Radicalism. Where the Radical element is very strong divisions take place, and of those divisions the Conservative readily avails himself and thus enters this House. Now, by this Bill hon. Gentlemen opposite tell you you are showing them the Radical element. Depend upon it then that these instances will be multiplied; and if that be so, that is nothing of which the hon. Gentlemen opposite need complain. I maintain that the whole argument about swamping the constituencies is based upon an entire fallacy—that the unit of a vote is the measure of the political power of the man to whom the vote belongs. This fallacy has been exposed by a right hon. Gentleman now in the House, whose words are always received with great attention, and with the consent of the House I will read them —

"We know very well what takes place at a Parliamentary election in this country. The man of princely fortune has, when he goes to the poll, no more votes than the humbler dweller in a £10 house, because we know very well that his wealth, his station, and his character will give him an influence which will adequately represent his property, and the Constitution shrinks from a plurality of votes in such a case."—[3 Hansard, clii. 975.]

These are the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire. Well, Sir, I maintain that, unless it can be shown that the Bill of my hon. Friend will enfranchise so large a number of persons that they will positively outnumber the persons in possession of the franchise, and not only outnumber them in the gross but in the majority of the constituencies, and that they will so far outnumber them as to outweigh the influence which belongs to wealth, station, and education, and which practically gives twenty or thirty or fifty-fold votes to individuals; and unless it can be shown that the opinions of the class to be enfranchised are absolutely and dangerously at variance with the opinions of those who are at present enfranchised, it is idle to come down to this House and in accents of apprehension deprecate this measure, as the noble Lord has done, as dangerous and revolutionary.

I did not rise solely with a view of replying to the arguments of the noble Lord, but I wish to say a few words upon the interpretation which he gave to the wishes and views of the working classes. I mean no disrespect to the noble Lord, but I cannot regard him as quite so sound and reliable an interpreter of the views of the working classes as, for instance, my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford and my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds. They have not derived their knowledge of the working classes through the post—their knowledge is personal—the growth of a lifetime; which the noble Lord would substitute for this Bill. They condemn them because they consider that the working classes would not receive their due share of political power under them, and because they would introduce into our electoral system a totally new principle, and that at a time the admission of a new class of voters, when it was most desirable to escape from the least suspicion of insincerity. Now, it is of incalculable importance in dealing with the working classes that you should convince them that you are dealing fairly and honestly with this question, and unhappily the course of procedure followed by this House tends rather to establish an opposite conclusion. Depend upon it that any attempt at filtration—for such I believe to be the nature of the franchises indicated by the noble Lord—will be regarded by them as an attempt at evasion. I would also say that the time is rapidly passing when this can be regarded as a question of what we are to give; it is rapidly becoming a question of what they will take. Reference has been made to the course of policy pursued by the Government, and I wish to call attention to the strange and anomalous position which the Government appear to occupy in reference to this subject. I had hoped, especially after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer last year—which was sufficiently pronounced—that the approach of an impending dissolution might have quickened the perceptions if it did not brace the consciences of the Whigs. Whatever excuse there might have been six years ago for postponing the solution of a question which involved, on the part of Members, an act of immediate self-immolation, surely it is quite impossible for a Parliament which is approaching the natural and inevitable termination of its existence still to postpone its engagements and still to retain its honour. Now the engagements of this Parliament with reference to the question of Reform are positive. The engagements which the Government made with the country—made to their constituents—and made especially to those of their supporters who sit in this part of the House—are if possible more positive still. They constitute a deliberate compact from which right hon. Gentlemen have never been released—and upon the faith of which, and on the faith of which alone, they were permitted to obtain that preponderance in the House which enabled them to displace the Government which preceded them. Do right hon. Gentlemen suppose that they can enjoy all the advantages of this bargain, and repudiate all its obligations? In the face of these obligations—for they are incontrovertible—how are we to explain the fact that the Government still refuse to proceed with this question? I think the explanation is sufficiently curious. It is curious on account of its originality and ingenuity; and it is still more curious when we consider the special Minister who was selected by his Friends to make the explanation to the country. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade—who of all men in the House it might have been supposed would not so soon have forgotten the compact which was made between his Friends who sit in this part of the House and his Friends who sit on the Treasury Bench—volunteered the other day a very elaborate apology for the policy of the Government. The gist of his apology seems to be that he thinks that there is a special code of morality for the use of Ministries, the principal postulate of which is that you may run away from your engagements with honour if you can only do so with impunity. The right hon. Gentleman endeavoured to shift the burden of blame from the Ministry to the people. What does he say? His words are, “He defied any Administration that had laid a Bill on the table of the House, however sincerely”—I suspect he meant insincerely—“to have receded from that position if the great body of the electors had been in earnest in keeping them to their promises.” I ask the right hon. Gentleman what is the use of a representative system—what is the use of a general election at all—if, when you have raised a great question at the elections, and have solemnly taken the verdict of the people upon it, and armed yourselves with that verdict for the discomfiture of your political opponents, you turn round, and because your tergiversation does not instantly provoke disorder, take it for granted that you are released from all your engagements, and with a coolness which is perfectly exquisite you say to the people to whom you have forfeited your word, “The fault is not ours but yours—yours because you were credulous enough to place confidence in the faith of public men—yours because you were weak enough to believe in such things as Queen’s Speeches, repeated manifestoes of Cabinet Ministers, express Resolutions of this House—yours, because believing in these noisy abstractions you did not come to the aid of our consciences with your menaces and to the rescue of our honour with your indignation.” Let us go a little further into this remarkable apology. How is it that the right hon. Gentleman deals with the measure which was laid on the table of the House by the Government? “By a curious combination of causes, which he was at a loss to unravel, that Bill was apparently smothered—smothered by speeches and all sorts of things—delaying and delaying—until at last the discovery seemed to break in on the minds of many in the House that there was no sincerity whatsoever as to the support which the Bill had received. They had all got uneasy consciences about this Reform question.” The House will doubtless agree with me that there is something very lucid and instructive in all this. “By some curious combination of causes, which he was at a loss to unravel,” “smothered by speeches and all sort of things,” “discovered that there was no sincerity whatever as to the support which the Bill had received,” “they had all got uneasy consciences;” and so the right hon. Gentleman salved his uneasy conscience by discovering that no one was in earnest about Reform. I confess I am at a loss how to describe in adequate, yet Parliamentary, terms this ingenious attempt to get rid of a distinct political pledge. When were the Government released from their pledge? They have not gone to the country yet, nor do they show any disposition whatever to go to it. If they were unable to meet their obligations, why did they not do what other people do under similarly distressing and embarrassing circumstances—call their creditors together and take the benefit of the Act? The right hon. Gentleman and his Friends showed no disposition to take the benefit of the Act; the noble Viscount appears to have a positive aversion to what is technically termed “whitewashing.” He has no inclination whatever to go to the country. He postpones the evil day till the latest possible moment. And no doubt he is right; because, depend upon it, it is altogether premature to assume that the people are prepared to make things so pleasant to those whose conduct with reference to the Reform question, if it reminds them of anything, reminds them of the fast-and-loose performances of the Davenport Brothers, which have ended so disastrously to those eminent performers, and in what some of the papers call "smashing the Cabinet." The right hon. Gentleman falls back upon the fact that the people are quiescent. No doubt they are quiescent — suspiciously quiescent—as quiescent as the right hon. Gentleman under the pangs of his uneasy conscience. But what is the meaning of this quiescence—I do not mean on the part of the right hon. Gentleman, but on the part of the people? Is it because they are waiting for a better Bill? There is nothing about this Bill—nothing about the Bill of the noble Lord (Earl Russell) which was likely to raise to a great pitch the enthusiasm of the working classes. Many of them regard it as very little more than an attempt to establish within their own class a privileged and conservative caste. The class which would be enfranchised by this Bill and by the Bill of the noble Lord is too limited in number, too cautious, too busy and responsible to indulge in vehement agitation. Even if they were not all this, what prospect would there have been of raising an agitation loud and turbulent enough to have alarmed this House and to have restored right hon. Gentlemen to the use of their uneasy unconsciences? Any such agitation must be based on an appeal to the great mass of the working classes, and when the object of that agitation is a measure the effect of which would be to erect a barrier of distinction, if not of jealousy, between the upper class artisan, who would be admitted to the franchise, and the lower class artisan who would be excluded, it is not surprising that the great bulk of the working classes refused to become the instruments and witnesses of the aggrandisement of their fellows. It is thus that you have no agitation, no monster meetings, no huge petitions, no interminable processions, no black flags, none of the paraphernalia, which the right hon. Gentleman seems to wish to see, but which, I hope, we shall never see again in this country, and which forty years ago scared out of their remaining senses all the old women in the country, whether in or out of breeches. The right hon. Gentleman argued, therefore, that the policy of the Government has been a justifiable policy. But let him observe what is actually occurring. Convinced that there is no hope of spontaneous justice from this House, and that he cannot achieve his own enfranchisement, the upper class artisan is making up his mind to cast in his lot with his humbler classmate, and the result is, that we are about to have the only combination which can contain any element of danger. The trades' unions, possessing in their secret machinery and endless ramifications that unseen and incalculable force, which, when applied to politics, has in less happy countries again and again precipitated the State into troubles, are tardily, I own, as though reluctant to bring into play their tremendous organization, embracing the cause of Reform. Radical though I am, I confess that when I regard this new movement side by side with the manifest disinclination of the House of Commons to deal justly and fairly with the question of Reform, I am not altogether free from apprehension. It would be better, no doubt, that Reform should be extorted even by an agitation of that character than that its concession should be postponed until one of those periods when the spirit of innovation, and perhaps of mischief may be abroad; but it would, I think, have been better still if disregarding at the outset the paltry suggestions of a hand-to-mouth expediency Parliament had achieved the incorporation into the body politic of a portion of the working classes, and with the manliness which belongs to us as English public men had carried out cost what it may—yes—even the horrors of a dissolution—the policy which, after mature deliberation and abundant information, the Liberal party had avowedly espoused. If that incorporation must after all take place under less favourable circumstances—if it must result from a combination which was originally formed for other objects, the special and—I use the word in no invidious sense—the selfish objects of a class, then we shall have taught the working classes their first great lesson in political isolation; and we shall have to thank for it those who, like the noble Lord, are postponing and postponing the settlement of this inevitable question in the almost puerile hope that hundreds of thousands of intelligent men, surrounded by everything which cannot fail to remind them that they are no longer ignorant and powerless, will be content to remain as long as you please to leave them under the brand and under the ban of your distrust.

MR. LOWE : Sir, in order that I may obtain and merit the indulgence of the House I shall endeavour to confine myself as much as possible to the exact question at issue in this debate, which is, as I apprehend it, whether it is desirable to extend the franchise in boroughs by lowering its pecuniary amount. That appears to me to be a sufficiently large question for a single speech, without touching any other part of the subject of Reform, because it involves the consideration whether it is or is not expedient, in the existing circumstances of this country, to make a further advance in the direction of democracy. I congratulate the hon. Member for Leeds on having to-day succeeded in enlisting the advocacy of the hon. Member for Huddersfield in favour of his one-barrelled Reform Bill, although I have no doubt that hon. Gentleman would have preferred to handle a revolver. I cannot, however, congratulate the hon. Member for Leeds on the arguments in support of his views which the hon. Member for Huddersfield has advanced. Let the House for a moment reflect upon what fell from him towards the close of his speech. He said that if this Bill were passed it would form an aristocracy among the working classes, which would be regarded by the remainder of those classes with jealousy and dislike. He reminded us of the agency which Trades' Unions afford ready to the hands of those who would be animated by this jealousy and dislike to enable them to extort from this House further reforms. Is the prospect he thus holds out to us satisfactory? Does he give us any hope that when this Bill has passed, we shall have settled anything, or does he not make it quite clear that we shall have unsettled everything? If I am to judge by this debate, no position is happier or easier than that of those Gentlemen who undertake to advocate the cause of democracy in the House of Commons. It is a task which seems to require the smallest amount of thought and least copious vocabulary of words. One hon. Gentleman says the working classes are "wrongfully" excluded from the exercise of the franchise; another describes their exclusion as "unjust;" a third looks upon them as being in consequence "degraded;" while a fourth speaks of them as being "slaves." So we go on until we have an accumulation of about a dozen such terms, by the use of which some hon. Gentlemen seem to think they have done sufficient to prove their case, and to throw the onus probandi—as it is now the fashion to say—upon those who differ from them in opinion. This extreme facility arises from the fact that the House permits on this subject arguments very different in their nature from those which we are accustomed to expect in dealing with other subjects. Mr. Mill, for instance—a great authority—tells us that his ideal of good government is that every citizen should have a share in it, while the Chancellor of the Exchequer, a still greater authority, says—

"Is it right, I ask, that in the face of such dispositions the present law of almost entire exclusion should prevail? Again, I call upon the adversary to show cause, and I venture to say that every man who is not presumably incapacitated by some consideration of personal unfitness or political danger is morally entitled to come within the pale of the Constitution."

Now, this kind of argument is the easiest in the world, and is widely different from that style of reasoning which the House is in the habit of demanding from its Members. Hon. Gentlemen will, I think, concur with me in thinking that the true view of the science of Government is that it is not an exact science, that it is not capable of à priori demonstration; that it rests upon experiment, and that its conclusions ought to be carefully scanned, modified, and altered so as to be adapted to different states of society, or to the same state of society at different times. If so, nothing can be more difficult than to meet such concise and sweeping arguments as those to which I have referred, because a man who is careful to weigh what he has to say on a subject like this cannot put the results of an intricate and exhaustive process in a single sentence. And to what do the arguments of those who, like the Chancellor of the Exchequer, advocate the right of the working classes to be admitted to the exercise of the franchise amount? To that assumption of the à priori rights of man which formed the terror and the ridicule of that grotesque tragedy the French Revolution. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the onus probandi lay with his adversary in this instance he must have meant that anterior to the existence of society there was vested in every man some personal à priori right which nobody had authority to touch. When Mr. Mill, in like manner, speaks of every citizen of a State having a perfect right to a share in its government, he appeals to some à priori considerations, in accordance with which every man would be entitled not only to be well governed, but to take part in governing himself. But where are those à priori rights to be found? The answer to that question would lead me into a metaphysical inquiry which I shall not now pursue, contenting myself with saying that I see no proof of their existence, and that the use of the term arises from a bungling metaphor, by which a term appropriate to the rights arising under civil society is transferred to moral considerations antecedent to it. Can those alleged rights form a ground on which a practical, deliberative Assembly like the House of Commons can arrive at a practical conclusion? If they do in reality exist, they are as much the property of the Australian savage and the Hottentot of the Cape as of the educated and refined Englishman. Those who uphold this doctrine must apply it to the lowest as well as to the highest grades of civilization, claiming for it the same universal, absolute, and unbending force as an axiom of pure mathematics. A man, according to the theory of which I am speaking, derives a right of this kind from God, and if society infringe it, he is entitled to resist that infraction. He is judge without appeal in a cause over which no human tribunal has jurisdiction; he is executioner as well as judge, and so this seemingly harmless dream puts the dagger into the hand of the assassin. Those abstract rights are constantly invoked for the destruction of society and the overthrow of Government, but they never can be successfully invoked as a foundation on which society and Government may securely rest. We heard little of these metaphysical subtleties in 1832, for that generation remembered the controversies which sprung out of the French Revolution; they had the Anti-Jacobin by heart, and were conversant with those arguments by which Bentham, the Arch-Radical, the advocate of universal suffrage, had effectually exploded them. I come to those arguments which may be described as sentimental. It is contended that it is our business to elevate the working classes, and there is not one of us, I am sure, who would not feel the utmost pleasure in effecting that object. But the way to elevate the working classes is not, it seems to me, to lower the suffrage, the very means of the proposed elevation, or to seek after that sort of elevation which has resulted in Australia in the franchise being so despised that people hardly care to pick it out of the gutter. In Victoria suffrage is universal. People are registered either in respect of property or person. This last registration must be every three years. In order to raise the franchise and so improve the Government, an Australian statesman hit upon the happy device of requiring a shilling fee for registration. The effect was magical. I am informed that it diminished the personal voters by one-half. A franchise which in the estimation of those who have it is literally not worth a shilling cannot be a very powerful lever for the elevation of the working classes. Another argument is, that we ought to reward the working classes. This, however, is not a question of patronage; it is a question of selecting the best agency on behalf of a great community to decide in the last resort who are the persons who shall sit in this House, and therefore indirectly what shall be the policy which the British House of Commons is to pursue. It is not a question of sentiment, of rewarding, or punishing, or elevating, but a practical matter of business and statecraft, with the view to rendering our form of Government as good as possible. It is said, however, that those who are deprived of the franchise are slaves and degraded. Now, on this point I should like to read to the House a few words which appear to me to be extremely apposite—

“Many persons do not inquire if a State be well administered if the laws protect property and persons, if the people are happy. What they require, without giving attention to anything else, is political liberty—that is, the most equal distribution of political power. Wherever they do not see the form of Government to which they are attached, they see nothing but slavery, and if these pretended slaves are well satisfied with their condition, if they do not desire to change it, they despise and insult them. In their fanaticism they are always ready to stake all the happiness of a nation upon a civil war for the sake of transferring power into the hands of those whom an invincible ignorance will not permit to use it except for their own destruction.”

Where do those words occur? In the Principles of Morals and Legislation of Jeremy Bentham, the advocate of universal suffrage. They seem to me to answer the question, whether in all countries the happiness of the people at large is not the end which ought to be sought in the establishment of a government; and that end being as far as possible secured, whether we ought to overthrow the fabric by which it has been accomplished on the grounds of sentiment or à priori right? I therefore take the liberty of putting aside the sentimental argument, simply observing that the single question is of good government, and not whether by making some change which does not tend to good government we may do some collateral good to the working or any other class. We should do one thing at a time, and think ourselves very lucky if we do that one thing well. We often hear persons speak of killing two birds with one stone, but I apprehend that the man who tries to do so would be more likely to miss both than to kill either.

There is another argument—the fatalistic argument—which has been put forward by the hon. Member for Huddersfield, who has unintentionally, I am sure, done me a great service, for I have constructed for myself a sort of chart or scale of fallacies used on this subject, and he has had the goodness in a single speech to illustrate every one of them. “You must have it out,” the hon. Gentleman says, felicitously comparing the constitution of this country to an unsound tooth; “sooner or later you will have to give way”—using a line of argument which is at once the foundation and the blemish of the great work of De Tocqueville. M. de Tocqueville assumed that democracy was inevitable, and that the question to be considered was not whether it was good or evil in itself, but how we could best adapt ourselves to it. This is ignava ratio, the coward’s argument, by which I hope this House will not be influenced. If this democracy be a good thing, let us clasp it to our bosoms; if not, there is, I am sure, spirit and feeling enough in this country to prevent us from allowing ourselves to be overawed by any vague presage of this kind, in the belief that the matter has been already decided upon by the fates and destinies in some dark tribunal in which they sit together to regulate the future of nations. The destiny of every Englishman is in his own heart, the destiny of England is in the great heart of England, and to that, and not to dreams and omens, I look as the arbiter of her fate.

I come next to the argument of necessity. We are told that the working classes are thundering at our gates, and that we shall be in the greatest danger if we do not accede to their demands. But when, in answer to this argument, it is suggested that they are not at our gates, and that they are making no noise, the reply is, “Oh, wait awhile and see what they will do.” Now I, for one, am disposed to take that advice and to wait awhile. If this which we are asked for be a good thing in itself to concede, let us grant it without any compulsion; but if it be bad, let us not be driven from our sense of manliness and duty to our country by any fear as to what may happen if we refuse it. I am inclined to think that democracy in the present state of things would be a great misfortune. If driven to it, we must, of course, submit, and it may, perhaps, be better to do so than to give rise to a great internal commotion or civil war; but it will take a very severe compulsion to induce me to counsel suicide. The advice to yield at once lest a worse thing befall us reminds me of the lines—

“He thought with a smile upon England the while,
And the trick that her statesmen had taught her.
Of saving herself from the storm above
By putting her head under water.”

I have now gone through a series of arguments to which, in my opinion, the House ought not to attach any weight. To what kind of arguments, then, do I think they ought to listen? I will not state them in my own language, but in the language of one, the poetical charm of whose mind and style have, perhaps, a little overclouded his reputation as a political philosopher. I allude to Lord Macaulay, and these are his words—

“How, then, are we to arrive at just conclusions on a subject so important to the happiness of mankind? Surely by that method which, in every experimental science in which it has been applied, has signally increased the power and knowledge of our species, by observing the present state of the world, by assiduously studying the history of past ages, by sifting the evidence of facts, by carefully combining and contrasting those which are authentic, by generalising with judgment and diffidence, by perpetually bringing the theory which we have constructed to the test of new facts, by correcting or altogether abandoning it, according as those new facts prove it to be partially or fundamentally unsound. Proceeding thus—patiently, diligently, candidly—we may hope to form a system as far inferior in pretension to that which we have been examining and as far superior to it in real utility as the prescriptions of a great physician, varying with every stage of every malady and with the constitution of every patient, to the pill of the advertising quack which is to cure all human beings, in all climates, of all diseases.”

That, I humbly submit, is the way in which you must look at this Question. You must deal with it as practical men, upon grounds and for reasons of which I have scarcely observed a vestige in this debate. What should be the nature of your previous inquiries into the subject I shall now venture to point out. To use the words of one whose name ought never to be mentioned in this House without respect, if not with a warmer feeling—the late Sir G. Lewis—I might say that what we have to do is to find out any practical evil in the working of our institutions, and then to suggest a remedy for it. We ought always to be ready to listen. The inductive method abhors dogmatism, and therefore excludes finality. Its ears are always open to new facts. It recognises knowledge as perpetually advancing. It rejects no new light. It leaves overweening confidence to à priori reasoners, sentimentalists, and fatalists. It is a safe, because a modest guide. No one has, however, in this instance, shown a single practical grievance under which the working classes are suffering which would be remedied by the proposed alteration. Mr. Holyoake, speaking on behalf of those classes, tells us that the Frenchman, who has voted away his own liberty, is far superior to the Englishman, who possesses his liberty, but does not possess the franchise. I think we have a right to ask for even a more tangible grievance from the working classes than the absence of the power to ruin themselves. Having thus shown what kind of arguments we ought and ought not to receive, I think I may confidently assert, in opposition to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the onus probandi, in this case, rests not with those who deny the existence of the à priori right for which he contends, but rather on those who, unable to point out the existence of any practical grievance, call upon us virtually to destroy our present form of Government, and to put something else in its place. It may be said, however, that a practical grievance does exist, and that the interests of the working classes are not consulted by the House of Commons; but in answer to that argument, I would simply refer to the admirable speech of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire, and remark that hon. Gentlemen frequently bring forward questions which really relate to rich bodies, as if they were connected with the poor, convinced that by such means they will secure for their applications a greater degree of sympathy. I entirely deny that the interests of the poor are neglected in this House. I maintain that legislation is not altogether a matter of good will, as in the small republics of Greece, the study of whose municipal squabbles is the occupation of our boyhood, but of intelligence and study, and that the abstruse problems which it involves cannot be satisfactorily dealt with by men at that time engaged in daily labour. In 1842 the late Mr. Duncombe presented a petition to this House signed by 3,000,000 persons. This petition may, therefore, I think, be looked upon as containing a fair expression of the views of the working classes, whose political views must be toned down to the comprehension of persons, and in it they say—

"Your petitioners complain that they are enormously taxed to pay the interest of what is called the National Debt, a debt amounting at present to £800,000,000, being only a portion of the enormous amount expended in cruel and expensive wars for the suppression of all liberty by men not authorised by the people, and who, consequently, had no right to tax posterity for the outrages committed by them upon mankind."

There goes the National Debt.

"Your petitioners deeply deplore the existence of any kind of monopoly in this nation; and while they unequivocally condemn the levying of any tax upon the necessities of life, and upon those articles principally required by the labouring classes, they are also sensible that the abolition of any one monopoly will never unshackle labour from its misery, until the people possess that power under which all monopoly and oppression must cease. And your petitioners respectfully mention the existing monopolies of the suffrage"—pointing, of course, to universal suffrage—"of paper money"—looking naturally to unlimited issues and greenbacks—"of machinery"—meaning property, because machinery is only one kind of property—"of land"—of course there could be no question about that—"of the public press"—such portion of it as was opposed to their views—"of religion, of the means of travelling and transit, and a host of other evils too numerous to mention, all arising from class legislation."

That was the working men's programme of the steps which Parliament ought to take for the regeneration of the country and the advancement of the class to which they belonged. The middle class Parliament, if I may call it so, did not adopt that programme. It took another course. It struck off the shackles from trade, meeting, while doing so, with every possible opposition from the working classes, who, organized by their leaders, did everything they could to break up the meetings of persons engaged in forwarding this beneficial policy. And it founded a system of education which, though no doubt, imperfect, has been an enormous boon to the working classes. If the working classes had had their way then, instead of the middle class having had theirs, by which course of action would the working classes most have benefited? Would it have been a gain to them to obtain control over the affairs of the country? I do not speak of monopolists like ourselves, who, of course, would have disappeared off the face of the earth, but of the working classes themselves—would they have gained by the attainment of their own wishes?

Di faciles."

I venture to think they would not have gained by it, and that the working classes, instead of being neglected by the existing Parliament, have been better cared for, and according to sounder and more carefully considered principles, than if they themselves had been charged with the administration. These are the reasons that appear to me to show that no satisfactory grounds have been laid which should induce the House to read this Bill a second time. And now I go a little further, and thanking the House for the patience with which they have listened to an abstract and distasteful discussion, I propose to take on myself the burden of showing that the Bill ought not to pass. The first thing that strikes me is that this Bill will give the franchise to very few of the working classes in whose power it is not to obtain it now. And on that point I beg leave to read a passage from the Report of the Factory Commissioners for the present year, which seems to me very interesting and suggestive. One of the Inspectors, Mr. Baker, speaking of a freehold land society that has been eminently prosperous, says—

“The simple fact of these savings being effected, and of these houses being erected by the will of working men is an immensely significant one. All these owners of houses are freeholders, and every man has earned his own freehold from a desire to possess it. While in the same locality, employed at the same work and the same wages, and without any extraordinary drawback, a vast number of those who possess no such properties, live on from day to day, regardless of every enjoyment which is not sensual, exhibiting no desire for an elevation of character among their fellow men, wasting their money in profitless pursuits, or in degrading pastimes, and being for ever unprepared for the commonest vicissitudes which bring such misery in their train.”

I ask the House upon which of the classes here described will the Bill of the hon. Member for Leeds operate? Not upon the provident, but mainly upon the improvident class. For the provident are not only in possession of the franchise—they have soared far above it, and have got into the region of freeholders. It will, therefore, apply to the men who waste their time in these profitless and degrading pursuits, in order that they may be elevated and fished out of the mire in which they delight to grovel, introduced to power, and intrusted with control over the Constitution of the country. Not to take an extreme case, the Chancellor of the Exchequer says that 600 quarts of beer is a fair average consumption for every adult male in the course of the year, and, taking beer at 4d. a pot, the consumption of 240 quarts represents an annual outlay of £4. If, therefore, persons who live in £8 houses would only forego 120 quarts annually, they might at once occupy a £10 house, and acquire the franchise. That is the exact measure of the sacrifice which is required on their part to obtain this much coveted right, to raise themselves from the position of slaves, to wipe off from their characters the mark of degradation and all the other horrors that have been so feelingly depicted. That is by no means all. I have no wish to demand from the working man any great amount of rigid self-denial. I am neither an ascetic in theory or practice. But I would point out that there is a certain amount of accommodation, especially of sleeping accommodation, which is absolutely necessary for the preservation of the commonest decency and morality, for the avoidance of the most frightful impurities and even crimes. The amount which it is necessary to expend in rent for these purposes, and the preservation of the health of the poor man, and his family will, with a very slight addition, infallibly obtain for him the franchise. And the question for you now to determine is whether you ought to bring down the franchise to the level of those persons who have no such sense of decency or morality, and of what is due to the health of themselves and their children—whether you will degrade the franchise into the dirt, and imperil your institutions—or whether you will make this franchise a vast instrument of good, a lever by which you may hope to elevate the working classes—not in the manner which a mawkish sentimentality contemplates, but by fixing the franchise at a reasonable level, requiring a little, and only a little, effort and self-denial on their part, a little security that they are able to conduct their own affairs before we intrust them with ours.

Another objection which I have to the Bill refers to its swamping aspect. I have made an analysis of the figures presented to us in 1860—for we have no later—and I find that the effect of this Bill, which is described as harmless and innocent, would be in five large towns to treble, and in twenty-eight large towns to double, the constituencies. Now I ask hon. Members when the present constituency is doubled or trebled by an Act of this House, what becomes of the present constituency? Quid superest de corporibus? You might as well abolish it altogether. Not only is it increased, it is diluted, and the additions being all of persons rated below £10, these have a sort of chemical affinity with persons of the same class a little above themselves, and the two united become masters of the situation. In these cases, therefore, the present constituency, including all the property and all the intelligence of the place, would be disfranchised without a prospect of escape; and this I venture to think would be a very great evil. The noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire has truly said that many people want something in the way of change; but that something is anything in the world but what this Bill proposes. They want universal suffrage they want an educational franchise; they want a provident franchise; but nobody wants a £6 franchise. I know not whether that was the intention, but it seemed to me that the speeches in support of the Bill, especially the speech of the hon. Member for Huddersfield, go direct to universal suffrage. Can you believe that this thing, which nobody wants, will be accepted as anything but a step to universal suffrage, or that it is likely to form in any way a permanent settlement of the question? It is assumed by every speaker in favour of the Bill that when it passes the matter will be settled for ever, and that we shall be freed from these terrible visions of pressure from without which are always conjured up and brought in aid of the argument. But is that so? If you cannot maintain a £10 franchise, how can you hope to make a stand at £6? Look at the prestige surrounding this £10 franchise, created when the country was in the highest state of discontent. I can remember the time myself when the House of Commons was regarded not as representing the wishes and forwarding the views of the bulk of the English people, but as the greatest obstacle in the way of carrying out improvements which were desired by them. And that was not merely the opinion of the working classes; it was an opinion shared to a great extent by the education and property of the country, and but for which conviction the Reform Bill never would have passed into law. Let me ask, have not the results fulfilled and exceeded the expectations of the most sanguine prophet of that time? Look at the noble work, the heroic work, which the House of Commons has performed within these thirty-five years. It has gone through and revised every institution of the country; it has scanned our trade, our colonies, our laws, and our municipal institutions; everything that was complained of, everything that had grown distasteful, has been touched with success and moderation by the amending hand. And to such a point have these amendments been carried that when Gentlemen come to argue this question and do all in their power to get up a practical grievance they fail in suggesting even one. The £10 franchise, if not the most venerable, is at any rate one of the most respectable institutions that any country ever possessed. The seven Houses of Commons that have sat since the Reform Bill have performed exploits unrivalled, not merely in the six centuries during which Parliament has existed, but in the whole history of representative Assemblies. With all this continued peace, contentment, happiness, and prosperity, if the £10 franchise cannot maintain itself against such speeches as we have heard to-day, what chance have we of maintaining any other franchise whatever? It is simply ridiculous to suppose that we can do so. The thing is fated from the moment that the House, abandoning a position which should never be yielded while hope remains, consents to take up another not one-hundredth part as strong, on the road to universal suffrage. It is trifling with the House to suggest that when you have passed this Bill you have settled anything; all that you do is to unsettle everything, perhaps to lay the foundation of a real agitation, because people, when they find that so much can be gained with such little trouble, will be encouraged to ask for a good deal more. Two answers have been suggested to this view. It is said that the working classes will not act together. Assertions are very cheap on such subjects, but look at the probabilities. If you have a large infusion of voters from the working classes, they will speedily become the most numerous class in every constituency. They, therefore, have in their hands the power, if they only know how to use it, of becoming masters of the situation, all the other classes being, of necessity, powerless in their hands. Is it possible to suppose that in the present state of society, with the widely-conducted operations of the press, and public discussions on every subject, the working classes can long remain in ignorance of their power? You cannot treat them like pigs or cattle, or like Curran's fleas, "which if they had been unanimous, would have pulled him out of bed." You know very well that they will soon possess the secret of their own power, and then what is to prevent them from using it? What are the restraints that you propose? I know that very pretty metaphors have been given us; we were told, for instance, that society is divided into vertical, instead of horizontal strata, but, nevertheless, when men have power conferred on them, infallibly they will employ it for their own purposes. Are we without information to guide us in the matter? Have we not examples before our eyes? Look at Australia. There universal suffrage was conceded suddenly, and the working classes immediately availing themselves of it, became masters of the situation. Nobody else has a shadow of power. Does anybody doubt that in America the working classes are the masters? Why, there is the greatest apathy among the upper classes, because, though not actually disfranchised, we know that virtually they are so by reason of the supremacy of numbers that weighs them down. And why should it be otherwise in England? It appears to me that nothing can be more manifest, looking to the peculiar nature of the working classes, than in passing a Bill such as is now proposed you take away the principal power from property and intellect, and give it to the multitude who live on weekly wages.

I am sure the House will agree with me that it is an observation, true of human nature as of other things, that aggregation and crystallization are strong just in proportion as the molecules are minute. It is the consciousness of individual weakness that makes persons aggregate together, and nowhere is that impulse so strong as in the lowest classes of society. Nothing is so remarkable among the working classes of England as their intense tendency to associate and organize themselves. They have done so for the purpose of establishing benefit clubs, and to make provision for sickness and old age. These associations once existing for praiseworthy objects, one might suppose that they would end there. But no. Once having established the principle of association, this has been used for very different purposes. The working classes select leaders—by no means the best or wisest among them—and to those men they submit with a docility which would be admirable were it not perpetuated and enforced by the reign of terror kept up among and by themselves. I shall not refer to the subject of strikes; but it is, I contend, impossible to believe that the same machinery which is at present brought into play in connection with strikes would not be applied by the working classes to political purposes. Once give the men votes, and the machinery is ready to launch those votes in one compact mass upon the institutions and property of this country. It is so in America. The wire-pullers and log-rollers there correspond exactly to the leaders whom the working classes follow in the matter of strikes at home. These leaders may be, probably are, men little known; apparently very retiring and insignificant, but nevertheless they wield the masses with the greatest ease. The elector, perhaps, does not know the name of the candidate for whom his vote is to be recorded. Papers for the election of every one, from a Governor down to a constable and up again to a member of Congress, are handed to him in a bundle, tied round with a dirty piece of string, and the elector votes in the sense required—I have often seen it done—because his Mr. Potter or his Mr. Odgers desires him to do so. It is said, "Oh, but though we are to have an increase of democratic power, we shall also have safeguards," and Mr. Mill and Lord Grey, the philosopher and the statesman, have busied themselves in inventing these safeguards. I can fancy no employment more worthy of the philosopher and statesman than the invention of safeguards against democracy, but I can fancy no employment less worthy of either statesman or philosopher than counselling us to give a loose rein to democracy in order that we may see whether we cannot get back what we have given in another way. It may be very wise to throw £100 out of the window to a mob, it may be very right to give largesse in that manner; but it is the height of folly to throw out the £100 in the hope and expectation that the mob will bring it back again to you in detail sovereign by sovereign. Besides, consider how this is trifling with a great question. If we make these concessions to the spirit of democracy, if we give facilities for getting rid of some of those monopolies to which I referred just now, are the gentlemen who lead the Democratic party, are the persons who make up the mass of that party, so silly as to allow themselves to be tricked out of the fruits of their victory by a few transparent dodges, so clear that they would not deceive a child? The question is, are we making such concessions as are required to meet any practical grievance? That we ought to do and no more; if we make more in the hope of getting them back again we shall be allowing the fish to run away with the line, which we shall never be able to wind up again. I think I have shown the House that it is neither wise nor safe to rely on the measure before us.

The only practical mode of dealing with this question, in a manner worthy at once the dignity of this House and the character of the English people, is to guide our course by the light of experience, gained from what has been done in former times—above all, in our own country, the great nurse of freedom and of the happiness of the whole human family. I have shown you that the Bill of the hon. Member for Leeds, while it satisfies nobody, will cast us loose from our only safe moorings in the £10 franchise, and set us adrift on the ocean of democracy without chart or compass; and I think I have also shown you that, as it is ridiculous to expect the working classes, once in possession of absolute power, would refrain from using that power, the British Constitution ought never to exist upon sufferance. I am not going to inflict on the House an essay on the British Constitution, but this I will say—that it is the most complicated probably that the world ever saw. The number and variety of interests, and the manner in which these are entwined with each other, serve to make up a most curious piece of mechanism, but, in practice, well confirm the precept which Aristotle laid down 2,000 years ago in the words, “Happy and well governed those States where the middle part is strong and the extremes weak.” That description well embodies the leading merit of our Constitution. Are we prepared to do away with a system of such tried and tested efficiency as no other country was ever happy enough to possess since the world was a world, and to substitute for it a form of Government of extreme simplicity, whose tendencies and peculiarities have been as carefully noted and recorded as those of any animal or vegetable, with whose real nature we have no excuse for not being well acquainted—pure democracy? I am no proscriber of democracy. In America it answers its purpose very well; in States like those of Greece it may have been desirable; but for England, in its present state of development and civilization, to make a step in the direction of democracy appears to me the strangest and wildest proposition that was ever broached by man. The good government which America enjoys under her democracy—whatever estimate hon. Gentlemen may be disposed to form of it—is absolutely unattainable by England under a democracy, and for this reason:—America, in her boundless and fertile lands, has a resource which removes and carries off all the peccant political humours of the body politic. Turbulent demagogues out there become contented cultivators of the land; there are no questions between landlord and tenant; every one can hold land in fee simple if he chooses and transmit to his children. The wealth which America possesses is of a kind which her people did not make, and which they cannot destroy; it is due to the boundless beneficence of the Giver beside whose works those undertaken and executed by the human race sink into insignificance. The valleys even of the Nile, the Tigris, and the Euphrates, seem ridiculously small when compared with the valley of the Mississippi, which it has been calculated would afford residence to 240,000,000 of people without overcrowding. No tumult, no sedition can ever destroy these natural advantages. But what is our property here? It is the fabric of the labour of generations, raised slowly and with infinite toil, and to continue it is indispensable that it should rest on secure foundations. Look at the land question alone. In America nobody covets land, because he can get as much as he likes there for less money than would represent the trouble of kicking anybody else out of his holding. But here the case is different; nothing is easier than to get up a cry about land, and at this moment it is believed all over the Continent that there is actually a law in existence under which the possession of the land of England is confined exclusively to the aristocracy. Our prosperity rests more than anything else in the world upon our credit. What sort of credit should we maintain had we a Government like that of America, where the rate of interest at which their National Debt has been raised is such that they will pay more for a debt of £500,000,000 than we do for a debt of £800,000,000. Once introduce the American system of government here, and the mighty fabric of English prosperity would, I am satisfied, vanish like an exhalation. And now I do solemnly ask the Liberal party to pass in review their own position with regard to this question. They have to make their choice not merely on the fate which shall befall this particular Bill, but with a full knowledge that a general election is to follow. And I ask whether it is to go forth that the party of liberality and progress in this country does or does not for the future cast in its lot and identify its fortunes with that particular form of government called democracy, which has never yet been the Government of this country? It is a momentous issue which we have to try; and nothing but a sense of its enormous importance induces me to do what the House will believe is not a pleasant duty, to make my present speech in the neighbourhood in which I stand. I view this, however, as a question between progress and retrogression. So far from believing that democracy would aid the progress of the State, I am satisfied it would impede it. Its political economy is not that of Adam Smith, and its theories widely differ from those which the intelligent and clear-headed working man would adopt, did his daily avocation give him leisure to instruct himself. It is always introducing an ungrateful subject to make personal references, but perhaps I may be allowed for a moment to quote myself. Gentlemen think it the height of illiberality on my part, and believe that I am abandoning the cause of progress, because on this occasion I refuse to follow their steps. Of course, I was quite prepared for that; but nevertheless I have been a Liberal all my life. I was a Liberal at a time and in places where it was not so easy to make professions of Liberalism as in the present day: I suffered for my Liberal principles, but I did so gladly, because I had confidence in them, and because I never had occasion to retract a single conviction which I had deliberately arrived at. I have had the great happiness to see almost everything done by the decisions of this House that I thought should be carried into effect, and I have full confidence in the progress of society to a degree incalculable to us; my mind is so constituted as to rely much on abstract principles, and I believe that by their application the happiness and prosperity of mankind may be enormously augmented. Not for the very reason that I look forward to and hope for the amendment—because I am a Liberal and know that by pure and clear free government can the cause of true progress be promoted. I regard as one of the greatest dangers with which the country can be threatened a proposal to subvert the existing order of things, and to transfer power from the hands of property and intelligence, and to place it in the hands of men whose whole life is necessarily occupied in daily struggles for existence.

I earnestly hope—and it is the object I have in view—that I may have done something to make men think on this question—to pick it out of the slough of despond in which it has wallowed. Sir, I have been weary and sickened at the way in which this question has been dealt with. The way in which the two parties have tossed this question from one to the other reminds me of nothing so much as a young lady and young gentleman playing at battledore and shuttlecock. After tossing the shuttlecock from one to the other a few times, they let it drop and begin to flirt. The great Liberal party may well be presumed to know its own business better than I do. I venture, however, to make this prediction, that if they do unite their fortunes with the fortunes of democracy, as it is proposed they should do in the case of this measure, they will not miss one of two things—if they fail in carrying this measure they will ruin their party, and if they succeed in carrying this measure they will ruin their country.

Mr. BERNAL OSBORNE and The Lord Advocate rose together; but the House appearing to desire to hear the former hon. Member.

Mr. BERNAL OSBORNE proceeded, and said: Mr. Speaker, I think it highly natural that, after five hours' debate on a question which was once reckoned great and important, some Member of the Government should rise to answer the great, extensive, and philosophical speech that has just been delivered to this House—a speech, than which, however I may differ from its conclusions, I will venture to say, none, even at the time of the great debates on the Reform Bill, was ever surpassed in force or energy by any gentleman opposed to reform of any kind. I could have wished that our great leader—I am speaking of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—would have risen, for he is probably the only man in the House who is equal to the work of answering such a speech—I say I could have wished that at its close he had sprung to his feet instead of putting the wax tapers of a Scotch official—far, unfortunately, in this debate the Liberal party have had little reason to regard the sons of Scotland either with hope or affection. My noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) opened the opposition to this Bill with a speech which, although he merely moved the Previous Question, was a speech directly against the Previous Question, and which, if it were worth anything at all, would justify the House in reading this Reform Bill—now, for the first time, called a revolutionary measure—a second time this day six months. The noble Lord was followed by another Scotch Reformer, an advanced Liberal of old days, and he fairly told the House that this was a revolutionary measure for which he could not vote. I say we have thus little to hope for from that great country of Scotland; and I should be sorry to interfere between the House and the learned Lord who represents the interests of Scotland on the Treasury Bench, because it is due to some Scotchman in an official position to let us know that he, at least, of Her Majesty's Government, is not of that opinion, that he still clings to the early love of his youth, and is not afraid of being charged with entertaining revolutionary sentiments. But, Sir, this question of Reform has been treated, not only by the Treasury Bench, but by the House at large, in an insincere spirit. All have pretended to be Reformers when it suited their purpose. While this Parliament was young and able we coquetted with a measure which we had no intention of passing into law. But now that Parliament is worn out and dying, we, as political invalids, come forward and seek to be canonized as reforming saints, when we know that we shall repeat the old game over again as elected convalescents, and shall discover that although the question of Reform is well suited as a cry for the hustings it is not adapted to the meridian of this House. Can we wonder that there is apathy without, when we see the way in which this question is treated by the representatives of the people? You have all heard the speech just delivered by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne—a speech which, if it proved anything at all, was launched against all change. I was the more surprised at a speech from that direction—the more surprised at the civil war that has broken out on this side the House, and which has been so artfully promoted by the silence of Gentlemen on the other side—I was, I say, the more surprised at the right hon. Gentleman's speech, because I could not help calling to mind that he sat in two Reform Administrations, and that he was present on one occasion and heard the following Amendment put from the Chair, and which hurled those Gentlemen opposite into outer darkness. At that time we declared—

“That no re-adjustment of the franchise will satisfy this House or the country which does not provide for a greater extension of the suffrage in cities and boroughs than is contemplated in the present measure.”

This, Sir, was the Amendment which we, the ardent and advanced Liberals—and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne was one of the devoted band—passed in 1859, but which it is now discovered was not only abhorrent and destructive of all property, but revolutionary and likely to overthrow the National Debt, the landed aristocracy, and the Crown itself. I cannot help for a moment affecting to impugn the motives and conduct of my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines), although no one could have heard him and come to the conclusion that he entertains revolutionary sentiments. At any rate, a more quiet revolutionist has never existed. I cannot help remarking upon the different aspect which this question has presented to our notice on former occasions. Who does not recollect that this revolutionary measure has been urged upon our notice by four successive Speeches from the Throne—that five Administrations have advocated this measure which is to upset the kingdom? The question has now rather fallen from its high estate. It may be said to be in the position described by the poet—

“Deserted in its utmost need
By those its former bounty fed,” and has become so shrunk and withered in its proportions that it is reserved for an hon. and independent Member at a morning sitting to present a stump as it were—a fragmentary stump—of the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill, to contemplative Reformers on the eve of an expiring Parliament. Something has been said by my noble Friend (Lord Elcho) about advanced Liberals throwing discredit on the Constitution. Now, I think that there is no more certain way of doing this than by both sides agreeing to play at battledore and shuttlecock with this question, as the right hon. Gentleman has just said. We have affirmed the justice of the claim for an extension of the franchise; and yet, when the moment arrives for satisfying those just demands, we declare that we have no intention of conceding them because the claimants do not knock loudly at our door. That is my idea of throwing discredit on representative institutions. Why, Sir, what do we owe our seats to? What were we sent here for but to vote for an amendment and extension of the franchise? What are the special grounds on which the present Government hold office? Why, the amendment of the franchise. What has become of the compact entered into at the Dancing Academy at Willis' Rooms five years ago? I had not the honour of being at that meeting because I was out of Parliament at that time, but I remember hearing of the Reformers holding that meeting at Willis' Rooms, and waving their hats and rushing about filled with enthusiasm at the idea that a Reform Bill was to be brought forward by Lord Palmerston as the head of the Liberals of England. What has become of that Reform Bill? We have many Reformers in the Cabinet. We have aristocratic Reformers in another place. The noble Lord the great progenitor of this measure sits in another place; and on the Woolsack is a noble Lord who when a Member of this House made the strongest speech in favour of the Ballot and Reform that I ever heard, but who has been silent on these subjects ever since. My right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Milner Gibson) is a Member of that Cabinet. He is a tried Reformer, who goes much further indeed than my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, and yet he now comes under the revolutionary category so forcibly depicted by the right hon. Member for Calne. Then there is my right hon. Friend the President of the Poor Law Board (Mr. Villiers). What has become of him? He confines his attention solely to the suffering poor, and he never thinks of the suffering working classes. ["Oh!"] Non meus hic sermo. But all this was when the Liberal party was in opposition, and before the hon. Gentlemen opposite had taken their seats on those Benches. I want to know what has become of the Government Reform Bill? There can be nothing so disheartening—nothing so calculated to open the eyes of the public out of doors, as the treatment which this question is receiving at the hands of the Government and in this House at the present time. We declared, when we passed that Amendment in 1859, that neither this House nor the country would, or ought to, be satisfied without an extension of the franchise. We know, however, that the House is not very much dissatisfied, and that a Reforming Ministry are quite resigned to the present position and situation of the question. The conduct of the House and of my right hon. Friend—who, if he did run away on one occasion, was, as I am in a position to know, excessively unwell at that time—our conduct, I say, on this question of Reform reminds me of those professional mourners at an Irish funeral who, while they are groaning and bemoaning the dead, have a very keen eye to the good-will of the incoming tenant. We have all a keen eye to the incoming Parliament, and I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds that there cannot possibly be a better time for "waking" the corpse of Reform than the eve of an expiring Parliament, when the Liberal party are rather hard up for a cry. This, however, is not a question with which the House can trifle with impunity. We cannot take it up and lay it down without subjecting ourselves to the charge of shuffling and insincerity. My right hon. Friend the Member for Calne says that no one has brought forward any blots in the Constitution. Let us test that assertion. He is well satisfied with things as they are, and probably he has reason to be satisfied. But I will give a few instances of the anomalies that exist in regard to the distribution of the franchise. In Aberdeen there are 3,586 registered electors who send one Member, while Honiton, with 269 electors, sends two Members to this House. Does the right hon. Gentleman think that a satisfactory state of things? Lambeth contains 25,000 registered electors. ["Question!"] I hear the Member for Marlborough (Mr. H. B. Baring) calling question! Marlborough has 256 electors, and also returns two Members. Then there is Calne. Calne has 173 registered electors, including six freemen, and it sends one Member to this House, the same as Salford, which has 5,100 electors. Let us now take the smallest borough—Portarlington. ["Question!"] Can it be said that Portarlington, with 99 registered electors, has a claim to one Member, while the Tower Hamlets, with 31,000 electors, only sends two representatives? ["Question!"] This is the Question. Why, one vote in Portarlington is equal to 290 votes in the Tower Hamlets. Gentlemen opposite appear to be satisfied with that; but do they suppose the country is satisfied? Will the country be satisfied to read the speech of the right hon. Gentleman declaring this Bill to be revolutionary, and God knows what, and at the same time to see these shocking anomalies? I think that the right hon. Gentleman might have reflected that the Bill of 1832 was a Bill that effected a transfer of power entirely to one particular class; it took away the power from the upper class to give it to the middle class; and he might have remembered that the working class on that occasion submitted to be deprived of an extended franchise in many towns, and gave their unflinching aid and co-operation in advancing the political power of the middle classes. I think, then, it would be a little hard of the middle classes to come forward now and, not openly, but covertly, to deny the extension of the franchise to the working classes. How many Bills have we had during the last fourteen years? We have had five Bills in this House. Look at the measure of 1852. That proposed a £5 rating. Look at the way in which we treated the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire. That might have been made a most excellent Bill. It gave a savings bank franchise, and diminished the expense of elections for counties. But what is our dog-in-the-manger policy? We will neither allow Gentlemen opposite to bring in a Reform Bill nor bring in a Reform Bill ourselves. Therefore, although I think the time for bringing in this measure is most inopportune, still no one who has ever given a vote for Reform can help giving his support to this fragmentary measure. I am aware that it is impossible for an independent Member to pass a measure of this kind, but still, until we get a Minister who will risk the continuance of his power in passing a Reform Bill, we must take what we can get and support a measure of Reform, however fragmentary and however incomplete.

MR. GREGORY moved the adjournment of the debate. [Cries of "No, no!" "Go on!"]

MR. AYRTON desired to observe that the debate must be adjourned, because the House had not heard the sentiments of the Government, and it was quite evident that a quarter of an hour (it was now half past five o'clock) would not suffice, as several Members of the Ministry might wish to speak on this question.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he quite agreed with his hon. Friend. The House could hardly do otherwise than adjourn the debate, and the Government could hardly do otherwise than to give every facility for its renewal. He thought that the question of Reform was not only involved in the measure before the House, but also the conduct of the Government as to the past, and the conduct of the Government as to the future. Up to the present time the House was left in utter darkness as to the future conduct of the Government in respect to this question. Reform was a Government question, yet no Member of the Cabinet had as yet attempted to speak upon this subject. He was sure that the Members of the Cabinet would see the necessity of not allowing the debate to rest without expressing their opinion upon the measure before them, and in giving every facility for the renewal of this discussion.

SIR GEORGE GREY: A Member of the Government, though not a Member of the Cabinet, did rise ["Oh, oh!"]; but seeing the indisposition of the House to listen to him, I advised my hon. and learned Friend not to throw away his speech by attempting to force it on a reluctant House. ["Oh, oh!"] I am aware that several Members wish to address the House, and at the hour we have arrived at there is no alternative but to adjourn the debate. As to the day on which the debate should be resumed, if my hon. Friend the Mover of the Question will consent to name Friday I think it may be resumed on that day. ["No, no!"] But, in the absence of my noble Friend at the head of the Government, I can give no pledge with regard to the time. ["Oh, oh!"]

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I think that the House, under the circumstances, has a right to require from Her Majesty's Government that they should give an early day for the renewal of this debate; and I am of that opinion for two reasons. In the first place, it is impossible for us to forget the circumstances connected with this question under which the present Government was formed. In the second place, I hold that it is the duty of the leader of this House to give the House an opportunity of continuing such a debate. Sir, the leader of the House is the trustee of the honour and interests of the House. He does not sit in his place for the mere purpose of transacting the business of the Government. He is, I repeat, the trustee of the interests and honour of the House ; and I say it will not be creditable to the House if this debate so ably commenced and conducted, and in which it is evident from the appearance of the Benches so great an interest is felt, should be allowed to drop without the prospect of a continuance of it at the earliest possible date. I trust, Sir, that the right hon. Baronet will take immediate steps to secure the renewal of this debate, so that we may be favoured with the distinct opinions of Her Majesty's Government upon this question. And I will say, with all respect to the learned Lord Advocate, who rose to address the House—with all respect to his station, character, and abilities, I do not think, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, that he was a competent and proper representative of the Government upon this question. Sir, I think it most undesirable to all parties concerned that a debate of this kind should be allowed to terminate without a clear expression of opinion on the part of Her Majesty's Government. Sir, I cannot but remember, that only very recently, upon a question avowedly of not much less importance — upon another question of great constitutional importance — the House was left, so far as Her Majesty's Government was concerned, in a very unsatisfactory state. I allude to the debate upon the Irish Church. To-day we have not been favoured with the opinion of any Member of the Cabinet upon the question before us. On the other occasion to which I have referred we were certainly more fortunate. Two Members of the Cabinet did address the House upon the question of the Irish Church, but they expressed opinions utterly at variance with each other. According to my view it is for the honour of this House and the interest of the existing Government, of whatever materials it may be formed, that some decision should be arrived at, and that the country should be put in possession distinctly of what are the opinions of the Government upon questions of Imperial policy. Had the debate upon the Irish Church been continued as it ought to have been continued we should probably have been favoured with the expression of opinion of other Members of Her Majesty's Government, and have had fresh light thrown upon the subject. But to-day, after a debate upon an important public question—a debate conducted with great ability, and in respect of which a large amount of interest is excited, as is evident from the number of Members that are in attendance—it would be most unsatisfactory, disappointing to the country, and discreditable to this Assembly, if some definite arrangement be not made for the immediate resumption of this debate and the bringing it to a conclusion. I trust, then, that Her Majesty's Government will confer with each other on the Treasury Bench, and that they will be enabled to assure the House, by the mouth of the right hon. Baronet opposite, that some arrangement will be made satisfactory to the House, and in compliance with what appears to be the universal feeling on both sides.

MR. BAINES: I beg to say that I understand that Friday is an evening on which this debate might be resumed. [Cries of "No, no!" "To-morrow!"] I think we have a right to ask the Government to help us to fix a day. It is quite evident it is the wish of the House to continue the debate. ["Hear!"]

SIR GEORGE GREY: I spoke of Friday, because there is every prospect that the Motion which stands previous to Supply will occupy but a short time ; and I told my hon. Friend if that were the case the Government would be willing to put this Question second. They could not put it first, because, according to the Standing Orders, Supply must stand first. ["To-morrow, to-morrow!"] The Government cannot give to-morrow, because that day has been fixed for the Resolutions on the Budget, and the public interest would suffer if they were postponed, therefore Friday is the earliest day. ["Monday!"] We shall now put it for Friday—["Monday!"—and if we shall be unable on Friday to bring it on at an early hour, I shall communicate with my noble Friend at the head of the Government with a view to make arrangements for bringing it on as early as possible.

LORD ROBERT CECIL: I beg to move that the debate be adjourned to Monday.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I think that this question ought not to be left in this undecided state. The House has a right to know on what day precisely the debate will be resumed. It certainly ought not to be left contingent upon the disposal at an early hour of desultory discussions and Motions that may or may not be brought forward. It appears to me that the best thing to do under present circumstances is to decide that the debate be adjourned to Monday, when it shall be positively resumed, and, if necessary, that it shall be continued de die in diem.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Gregory.)

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. GREGORY said, it was impossible that the debate could come on on Friday, as he himself had a Motion fixed for that evening which he was determined to proceed with. It was, therefore, impossible that he could enter upon the subject matter of his Motion and to continue this debate at the same time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be adjourned till Monday next."—(Mr. Gregory.)

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE reminded the House that there was a Standing Order under which the Government had the arrangement of all the Orders for every day except Wednesday. If this debate be fixed for Monday it would be placed at the end of all the other Orders, and, therefore, could not come on until at a very late hour. If the right hon. Baronet would consult with the noble Viscount the leader of the House no doubt some more convenient arrangement would be effected. Let the adjourned debate then be fixed for Friday, and if it could not then be resumed they could fix another day on which it could be taken without fail. ["No, no!"]

MR. DISRAELI: What the House can do is to come to an agreement that this question shall be taken on Monday; unquestionably the Government can arrange the business of the House as they think fit, but it does not follow that an Order of the Day, placed last upon the paper, must necessarily be delayed until all the previous Orders are disposed of. The right hon. Baronet will probably be enabled to-morrow to say whether the adjourned debate can be brought on first on Monday or at some other convenient time.

MR. ROEBUCK: Let the House determine and let the Government give notice to rescind the Standing Order on Monday, in order that this question may have precedence. They frequently do this in respect of matters of special interest to themselves—why should they not take the same course as respects the adjourned debate?

SIR GEORGE GREY: The Government have no intention whatever to avail themselves of their right under the Standing Order, in order to prevent the resumption of this debate. If my hon. Friend will name Friday for the resumption of the debate, and our expectations in respect to its coming on are disappointed, the Government will take care to give the earliest day possible for the purpose.

MR. BAINES: I think after the assurance given on the part of the Government, I ought to adhere to Friday. ["No, no!"]

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It is well that we should understand the position we occupy. The financial Resolutions stand for to-morrow, and we have no reason to suppose that there will be any opposition, or that the discussion upon them will occupy any very great length of time; still we are entirely in the hands of the House, and notice has already been given of one Motion relating to those Resolutions. Now, suppose we do not get those financial Resolutions through to-morrow night, I am by no means prepared to say it would be our duty to surrender Monday for the disposal of this question. ["Monday!" "Friday!"]

And, it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

The QUEEN'S Answer to the Address of Monday last reported by the Lord Chamberlain as follows:—

"I entirely participate in the sentiments which you have expressed in your address to me on the subject of the assassination of the President of the United States, and I have given directions to my Minister at Washington to make known to the Government of that country the feelings which you entertain in common with myself and my whole people with regard to that deplorable event."

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.—ASSASSINATION OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN.

DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS. EXPLANATION.

LORD RAVENSWORTH said, he desired to ask the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) a question relative to the expression which fell from the noble Earl on Monday night, when the House had under its consideration the Address to Her Majesty with reference to the assassination of President Lincoln—a most melancholy event which had thrown the whole world into consternation. The noble Earl was reported to have said—and, in fact, did say—that if the Confederates were in any way connected with or appeared to have justified directly or indirectly the commission of that dreadful act, they would have committed that which was worse than a crime—they would have committed a blunder. As that sentence had been misinterpreted, he wished to state his impression of its true meaning, and to ask the noble Earl whether or not he attributed to it its right meaning. The expression was first made use of, he believed, by M. de Talleyrand on the occasion of the fearful murder of the Duc d'Enghien by the First Consul of France—thereby meaning that, not that a blunder was worse, in a moral sense, than a crime, but that a person occupying the position of the First Consul in committing a grave political blunder had done that which was fraught with graver consequences than a crime. He attributed to the expression used by the noble Earl precisely the same interpretation he had put on the phrase used by Talleyrand. He understood his noble Friend to intend to convey that the sanctioning of such an Act by persons standing in the position of the Confederate Government, or the Confederate States, would be a grave political blunder, fraught with more serious consequences than even the commission of that crime by other hands. That was the construction he put upon the expression, and which he believed to be the true one; and therefore he took that opportunity of asking the noble Earl whether or not that was the correct one. The reason why he ventured to ask the question was that in his experience he had seen instances in which expressions had been attributed to political persons which they never used in the sense ascribed to them. It was imputed to the Duke of Wellington that he said county meetings were a farce, a phrase which he never used, although it had been frequently asserted against him. In the same way it was imputed to Lord Lyndhurst that he said the Irish people were "aliens in blood, aliens in religion, and aliens in race" to this country, but Lord Lyndhurst never said it in the sense in which it was imputed to him. He therefore thought it better that any expression exposed to misinterpretation should be made clear at once, rather than left to interpretation at a future day.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I cannot think that any Member of your Lordships' House could have entertained the slightest doubt as to the sense in which I used the words referred to, and upon which the noble Lord has put the right construction. What I did say was that if the Confederate authorities—which I do not believe from their former conduct and character possible—had given their sanction or approval to the act, they would have been guilty not only of a crime, but using the well-known political aphorism of Talleyrand, they would have committed worse than a crime—a blunder. They would not only have sanctioned that which is highly immoral in itself, but it would also be sanctioning that which could do nothing but add most serious injury to their political position. It was only in that sense that I used the words referred to, and I cannot understand how any one could have put a different construction upon it.

(No. 65.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that no measure had conferred greater benefit on the proprietors of land in Ireland than the Act of 1848, commonly called the Incumbered Estates Court Act. Under it immense sales of incumbered land had taken place—to the amount, it was computed, of £23,000,000. But the Act had this defect, that after the incumbered land was sold and a Parliamentary title given, the function of the Act ceased, and there was no provision for preventing the title to land becoming again involved in complications and embarrassments, similar to those from which it had just been cleared, arising out of subsequent transactions. This defect was pointed out by the Commission of 1857, in whose Report it was stated—

"Great as are the benefits which the Incumbered Estates Court has conferred upon titles in Ireland, it is a remarkable circumstance that there is no provision for perpetuating and continuing as to future transactions the Parliamentary title obtained upon a purchase from that Court. The title is unimpeachable as to all transactions prior to the time of purchase, but immediately after the purchase the transfer of the land becomes subject to the general law; and as to all transactions taking place after the purchase, the title is liable to become again involved in complications and embarrassments similar to those from which it was relieved by the sale under the Incumbered Estates Act. Permanent simplification of title and simplicity of transfer are not attained by the Act, and retrospective investigation of the title becomes again necessary. . . . The system, therefore, which we have recommended is required not less for Ireland than for this portion of the United Kingdom, while at the same time the facilities for its introduction there are much greater than in this country.

Unfortunately, in 1858, when the present Landed Estates Court was established, though many improvements were introduced, yet the particular improvement referred to was not allowed to find place, and there was no machinery by which the title and subsequent transactions might be recorded and kept in a simple state. The difficulty in this respect was removed in respect to England by the Act he (the Lord Chancellor) introduced in 1862, and the object of the present Bill was to adapt to Ireland the machinery and regulations of that Act so far as they related to the record of title. Before he proceeded to explain the manner in which this was to be done, it would not be unreasonable for him to refer to the operation of the Act of 1862, which, although it met with serious opposition at its introduction, was now working in an advantageous manner, and there was every reason to expect that those who availed themselves of it would become more numerous every year. From the 15th of October, 1862, to the 1st of March, 1864, the date of the last Return to the House of Lords, there were 66 applications. These applications comprised about 5,000 acres of land, consisting largely of very valuable building land, of an estimated value exceeding £1,500,000. From the 1st of March, 1864, to the 30th of April, 1865, the applications had been 216, making together 281. The number of acres comprised in the 216 applications exceeded 25,000, and he had no hesitation in saying that the value very considerably exceeded the value of the 65 cases, making the total value exceed £3,000,000. There was no difficulty in working the measure—one complaint only had been made; but, on inquiry, it was found that the delay was occasioned by the agent and not by the office. Their Lordships were aware that there was an Association in Dublin, presided over by a noble Duke, and entitled the Registration of Title Association. In an address presented to the late Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, that Association stated—

"We feel that the insecurity, delay, and expense incident to the present system of conveyancing are a hindrance in the transaction of our private affairs, seriously reducing the value of landed property in Ireland, and obstructing the free investment of capital in land and landed securities. We are of opinion that the Landed Estates Court, though affording some alleviation in the case of large estates, fails to provide an effectual remedy for many of the evils complained of. Titles which, at considerable expense and delay, have been cleared of complexities by being passed through that court, are left to be dealt with subsequently under the same system of conveyancing which induced those complexities, and consequently in a short period of time become embarrassed and deteriorated by similar accumulations. We, therefore, think that the Landed Estates Court Act requires to be supplemented by some measure which will enable future dealings with land to be conducted with security, expedition, and economy."

The Court had been conducted with so much wisdom, care, and prudence, that there had been hardly a single mistake in its proceedings. This Bill was simple as compared with the measure of 1862. The proceedings which were contemplated by this Bill commenced as soon as the Landed Estates Court made a conveyance or made a declaration of title. The Bill proceeded to direct that forthwith the title should be entered upon the record, and that every one of the subsequent transactions should be endorsed upon the minute. The Bill extended the powers of the Landed Estates Court so as to enable it to make a conveyance or declaration of title of every description of estate and interest, including partial estates and leaseholds; and their powers would be extended to leases and agreements for leases, but so that the declaration of title should not give any guarantee to the title of the lessor. The Court would gather in every instrument which created any description of interest, and there was machinery which would enable the officer of the Court to investigate, ascertain, and declare the result judicially, and thereby the title to every description of estate would be simplified, and it would be rendered capable of being transferred with the greatest ease and economy. The Bill further provided that all transfers should be brought into the Court, and completed in the Court, the transfer being made by the party himself either in the Court, or by conveyance in the country, and then reported to and recorded in the Court. Thus every interest in land when brought into the Landed Estates Court would be relieved from the necessity of registration in the Deeds Registration Office. The registration of deeds in Ireland had been productive of great inconvenience, and in this respect the introduction of this Bill would afford a great relief. The Bill further contained provisions respecting the registration of judgments, which would place the Irish registry in a superior position to that of England; and also respecting the transfer of charges and mortgages, which would be effected with much greater ease and facility than before. He anticipated that great advantage would result in Ireland from such a record of title as the Bill proposed, and to prove that the system was appreciated, he would only refer to the case of South Australia, where the number of voluntary applications for registering titles had increased from 184 in 1858 to 1,138 in 1864. When the mode of dealing with land, which he had described, became generally known, and the advantageous nature of the transactions within the Court was contrasted with the transactions which took place outside it, he predicted with the utmost confidence that the increase of business would be probably in a greater ratio than that to which he had already referred. He trusted, then, there would be no objection to the second reading of the Bill, but that the measure would be received as the necessary complement of that useful institution—the Landed Estates Court. He begged to move that the Bill be now read a second time.

(The Lord Chancellor.)*

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, the cases of Ireland and England with regard to the transfer of property were entirely different. In Ireland there was a Landed Estates Court, in which estates were sold by public auction, and an indefeasible title given to the purchaser. Besides that there was a General Registration Act, which had been long in operation, and which had been attended with very beneficial results. The Landed Estates Act in Ireland governed the whole country, so that either the Irish owner or his creditor might take the estate into the Court and there obtain an indefeasible title. In these respects England stood upon a very different footing. We had no general registration throughout this country. All that we had here as general measures was this—that all charges which were likely to be made, independently of the actual execution of deeds, were all, under different Acts of Parliament, brought into one office where, at an expense of only 1s., these charges could easily be ascertained, and it might be easily seen whether the title was clear. Lands passed by actual conveyance, and though there were means of acquiring an indefeasible title, it was not necessary for anybody to go into the Land Transfer Office unless he thought proper. Then there were means for receiving applications for registration of title in England; but the number of such applications was very small. Now, the nature of the Bill might be described in a very few words. It was a measure to destroy all conveyances and dealings with property and ownership in Ireland, as between the owner and his ordinary professional advisers; it was to put a stop to the whole transfer of property as it was now conducted in order to take it into a Court which had been constituted for other purposes, and had enough to occupy its time, and which would have this additional burden thrown upon it, and thus would become the great Conveyancing Court of the country. He (Lord St. Leonards) conceived nothing more injurious to Ireland than this measure. In Ireland at present a man might get a declaration of an indefeasible title; but having got it, if he wished to deal with it out of Court, he must employ a solicitor, and pay him in the regular way. What would their Lordships say to a measure striking at the entire profession of solicitors and attorneys throughout Ireland? This Bill placed both devisees and heirs at law in a position which would expose them to delay, expense, and litigation, to which they were not now subject, and it contained several highly objectionable provisions. No one had been more anxious than himself to further measures for the simplification of the law regulating the transfer of property in Ireland, but he did not think this Bill either a wise or well-considered step in that direction.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, he wished to remind his noble and learned Friend that the Bill was not a compulsory measure. It had been carefully considered, and was regarded as highly beneficial by the landed interest of Ireland.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that the Incumbered Estates Act had been of great use in regard to titles; but that in a few years, in consequence of the charges and incumbrances incident to landed estates, matters would fall into confusion without some such measure as the present. He should warmly support the Bill, as being calculated to render a great service to the proprietors of land.

THE EARL OF BELMORE: My Lords, before the question is put I wish to say a few words, and to join with my noble Friend who has just down (the Marquess of Clanricarde) and my noble Friend near me (the Earl of Donoughmore) in supporting this Bill. Some time ago an association was formed in Ireland, as the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has stated, for the purpose of promoting this measure. That association was composed of noblemen and gentlemen of every shade of political opinion, and I believe the greatest attention has been paid to the Bill, with a view of making it as perfect as possible. I therefore give it my most hearty support.

SHEEP AND CATTLE BILL—(No. 58.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD RAVENSWORTH moved the second reading of this Bill, which had already passed the Commons without opposition, and said, its importance might be gathered from the fact that in divers parishes in the county of Durham no less than 962 sheep were worried by dogs in the course of a single year. In not one of these cases was any compensation received. The object, therefore, of the Bill was to assimilate the law in this respect to that of Ireland and Scotland.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2<sup>a</sup>, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS BILL—(No. 82.) SELECT COMMITTEE NOMINATED.

On the Motion of The Earl of CLARENDON the Lords following were named of the Committee:—

His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales.	E. Carnarvon.
Ld. President.	E. Powis.
D. Marlborough.	E. Harrowby.
E. Derby.	V. Stratford de Redcliffe.
E. Devon.	V. Eversley.
E. Stanhope.	L. Bp. London.
E. Clarendon.	L. Lyttelton.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH moved that the several petitions of persons alleging that their interests will be injuriously affected by the Public Schools Bill be referred to the Select Committee, and that such petitioners be allowed to appear by their counsel and witnesses before the Committee.

LORD LYVEDEN said, he feared they would establish a mischievous precedent if they allowed counsel to be heard against this Bill. In the other House no counsel had been allowed to appear before the Committee which considered the expediency of that most important change of power the transfer of the East India Company's possessions to the Crown. If counsel were heard before the Select Committee, it was probable that the Bill would not come down to their Lordships much before the Whitsuntide recess. It would then have to go down to the House of Commons. Under such circumstances no one could entertain a hope that it would pass into law this Session. He had not known any Bill which received so little support as this one. Even the noble Lords who were members of the Public School Commission were not prepared to accept it in its present shape. Meanwhile, he should like to know out of what funds would the fees be procured which would retain counsel for appearing before this Committee? The trustees of the Schools would ask to appear, and he supposed that they were to pay counsel out of the funds of the foundation or the charity of which they held the trusts. But if there was no chance of the Bill passing this Session it was not fair to call upon the trustees to spend part of the funds of the charity to assist in defeating it. It would be better that the Bill should be withdrawn, and that time should be given the trustees to consider such measures as were recommended in the Report. Many of them might be adopted by the Public Schools of their own accord. Out of the thirty-two recommendations in the Report only two were proposed in this Bill; and one the least valuable of all was that which sought to change the governing body. It would be better to leave the present Governors the opportunity of exercising their discretion. But it was objectionable that counsel should appear before the Committee when there was almost a certainty that the Bill could not pass this Session.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he understood that the expenses attendant on the retaining of counsel would be borne by subscription, and that very considerable sums had already been raised for the purpose. There would, therefore, be no necessity for the trustees to use trust funds to retain counsel. The parties who wished to appear asked to be heard against such parts of the Bill as affected themselves. They represented valuable property which would be affected by the provisions of this Bill, and they came forward asking the same rights which were accorded to private persons who appeared before a Committee of their Lordships' House against such part of a Bill as affected their interests. If this were a general measure affecting the public at large they could not be heard by counsel, for the delay consequent thereon would make legislation impossible. He trusted that the noble Lord would not interpose any difficulty with respect to the adoption of the Motion. But if the measure were to be postponed, he (the Earl of Ellenborough) agreed with the noble Lord that it would be better to withdraw it for the Session.

LORD WROTTESLEY: My Lords, I understand there is some objection on the ground of form to the Motion of which I gave notice on Tuesday, that the petitioners, whose petition I presented, should be heard by counsel. I will, therefore, with the permission of your Lordships, withdraw it. I am the last person to wish to establish an inconvenient precedent; but then, in fairness, I trust your Lordships will allow me to state the views of the petitioners, both on the details of the Bill, so far as they affect science, and on the general question of the introduction of scientific instruction into schools, and that before this Bill goes into Committee. The petitioners, as your Lordships might anticipate, highly approve of the recommendation of the Public School Commissioners, that the study of physical science shall be introduced into these great schools; and they are grateful to the Government for their good intentions, but they cannot approve of the mode adopted by them for carrying out that recommendation of the Commissioners by the provisions of this Bill. Some there are who contend that there should be a specific enactment, making it imperative that physical science should form an integral part of the instruction given in these schools, but to that I own there may be some objections; but all believe that the cause of science might possibly be rather injured than promoted by the introduction into the governing bodies of these schools a small minority distinguished for their scientific attainments. These gentlemen would be placed in a very invidious position. They might be viewed by their Colleagues as imposed upon them by the Legislature for the express purpose of effecting a change, to which some of them might be on principle opposed, and those who were in favour of the change would still wish to have the sole credit of bringing about the reform. Again, they are afraid that the numerous restrictions imposed by way of qualification for these governorships will so narrow the field of selection, that many, who are the best qualified for the office, will be thereby excluded.

But, my Lords, on the general question of the introduction of scientific teaching into schools, I can with confidence state what are the opinions of our most distinguished men of science. I have had many opportunities, in several years, of ascertaining their views on that subject; I cordially concur in them, and wish to be allowed to explain them fully to your Lordships, the rather that I may have no other opportunity of so doing, and I think it very important that there should be no misunderstanding as to the extent to which we wish that this scientific teaching should be carried. It is very true, my Lords, that those of your Lordships who have read with attention the admirable evidence of Dr. Carpenter and Dr. Hooker, will be at no loss to form an adequate notion on this point, but these may be a small minority, and I am very sure that the readers of blue-books are a small minority of the nation. We wish then, we desire earnestly, that the study of physical science should be introduced into all schools, but if it is to be taught it must be taught really and effectively, not by second or third-rate lecturers, delivering lectures at long intervals unaccompanied by examinations or other tests of proficiency and attention in the hearers, but on a systematic plan, as recommended by the resolutions of the President and Council of the Royal Society of January, 1857. But, on the other hand, we do not wish that these boys should be harassed by abstruse mathematical formula for which their young minds may not be sufficiently developed, and for which they may not have the necessary time at their command; they should go through an elementary course of scientific teaching; the laws of nature should be expounded to them and illustrated by experiments, and the inspection of collections duly arranged, and there should be a tutor at hand to explain difficulties as they arise, and answer questions. I hope your Lordships will allow me to read a short extract from a letter which I have lately received from Professor Phillips, the Professor of Geology at Oxford in reference to this subject. I am sure that all to whom that learned Professor is known will agree with me that there is no one more competent to give an opinion, and no one on whose opinion more reliance may be placed. Professor Phillips, after lamenting that young men should come up to Oxford ignorant of the most ordinary facts of science, goes on to state that there are three things required to bring about the reform we are contemplating—ments in chemistry, and experimental philosophy; 3. Teaching, not in a deductive form, or even very didactic form, but explanations p. r. n., founded on the facts immediately observed, the flowers as they are gathered, the fossils as they are handled, the decompositions as they are witnessed, the levers, microscopes, or barometers as they are worked and used. . . . Again, the main difficulty is, perhaps, in the teaching. For I am much afraid that, to save trouble, and 'get rid' of the subject, some second or third-rate cultivator of science will be engaged to give formal instruction at stated hours, with no pleasant and frequent talk with the students, no help just when it is wanted. . . . Good masters in science (one or two) to each school, resident, in good position, of adequate classical and mathematical attainments, as well as possessed of special scientific knowledge—a museum of small bulk, a laboratory or workroom—this is the sum of my recommendations for making effective in public schools the not inconsiderable inducements now held out by Oxford and Cambridge for the cultivation of physical science."

But, my Lords, I greatly fear that whatever pains may be taken by learned Professors, or the noble Earl below me (The Earl of Clarendon) who has ably advocated scientific teaching, or by any one else to dispel alarm, and to alter preconceived opinions on this subject, some time will elapse before science will be, so to speak, naturalized in our schools, the rather that we have lost a powerful friend, that illustrious Prince, whose loss we all deplore and shall never cease to deplore, I am sure he would have given us his influential aid, for none regretted more than he the lamentable shortcomings of our English educational system in this matter of science. But then I shall be met by the argument that it is a positive benefit that each man shall have his specialty; that one shall be famous for science; another for classics; another for mathematics; that the intellectual capital of the nation is increased by this division of labour: but this argument is founded on the fallacy of assuming that what is good for the mature man is good for the child and boy, that what is good at the commencement of education is good throughout its whole course. It may be quite true that, if any one wishes to excel, he must select some study or pursuit for which he has a strong natural bias and taste, and devote to it a very considerable amount of concentrated, undivided attention. I am not now alluding to success in professions; I believe that may be attained without ambition or taste when a strong sense of duty co-exists with an empty purse; but where taste and inclination are required, how are they to be developed? Is it not quite certain they will not be developed if, whenever they show themselves in the child or boy, they are nipped in the bud by the cold frost of neglect and perhaps ridicule, and the child or boy is left in respect to that pursuit which he loves the best in no better condition as to knowledge than those of whom the poet says—

Rich with the spoils of time, did ne'er unroll.

My Lords, I believe the true theory of education to be, that every mental faculty, especially the faculties of observation, every taste, tendency, and inclination as they spring up like young shoots above the tender soil of infancy, should be fostered, cultivated, watered, even from the earliest dawn of reason; and perhaps it would be well for us, if all our nurses were like the nurses mentioned by Dr. Hooker in his evidence, who, having been taught botany in Professor Henslow's village school, did not drag the child under their charge along when it stopped to examine plant, herb, or flower, but stopped with it to explain such of their properties as could be made intelligible to the infant mind. Unless these tastes and inclinations are thus developed, we incur a perpetual risk of having the wrong man in the wrong place. One who might have been a Newton, a Laplace, or a Faraday, might strive in vain to take an ordinary degree in classics at Oxford; and one who was born to be a Porson or a Gainsford, and, I might add, a Derby or a Lyttelton, one, in short, who was born to be a scholar, might, after struggling painfully over the Pons Asinorum, spend his life and fortune in fruitless attempts to rival a Canning or a Gladstone in the other House of Parliament. But what if one result of this neglect of science in youth should be that men occupying high positions in the State should have no true sense of the value of scientific research? I do not say that it is so, but what if it were so, or should be so hereafter. What chance is there, then, that, when new scientific expeditions are proposed, new scientific investigations propounded, that they will be promoted and encouraged? Will they not be met by some chilling response, such as that of cui bono, an answer which would never be given by one who was familiar with the history of the inductive sciences—which would never be given by one who knew what magnificent results have arisen from the most insignificant experiments—by one who knew the history of the steam engine and the electric telegraph. I do not mean that no discretion is to be exercised, that any one making a proposal to the Government is to be allowed to spend the public money in the forlorn hope that some good may accrue thereby; I am speaking of propositions by the recognized heads of science, in which all, or almost all concur; if these are rejected—if their attempts to benefit the nation and mankind are foiled—they would have a right to say, as they do say, "A thousand examples prove, that no human foresight can foresee a tithe of the benefit, which may flow from the investigations of abstract science, the knowledge thus obtained is in itself a good—in itself a power—seek it therefore where it is to be had, and never faint or halt in its pursuit, and depend upon it that at some time or other you will reap a glorious harvest."

EXECUTIONS AT NEWGATE.

QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, if he has received a Memorial from the Court of Common Council of the City, requesting his sanction to the removal of Executions from Newgate to within the walls of the City Prison in Camden Road?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, in reply, that no such memorial had been received, nor was it likely that it should, as it was not in the power of the Secretary of State under the existing law to comply with any such requests.

EDUCATION—SCHOOL GRANTS.

QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether an Inspector is justified in threatening to recommend that one-tenth of the Grant earned by a School in respect of the proficiency of the Children in reading, writing, and arithmetic should be withheld in case grammar, history, or geography are not taught therein?

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, that he was glad that the Question of his hon. Friend gave him an opportunity of removing a misconception which was very wide-spread, and which had worked and was working much mischief in elementary schools. Although the payments on examination under the Revised Code were made on reading, writing, and arithmetic, it was not the object or the policy of that Code to interfere with the teaching of other elementary subjects, such as history, geography, or grammar, heretofore taught in the National schools. So far was this from being the case, that Instructions to Her Majesty's Inspectors were issued in September, 1862, very soon after the Code came into operation, in which this subject was thus noticed:—

"The grant to be made to each school depends, as it has ever done, upon the school's whole character and work. The grant is offered for attendance in a school with which the Inspector is satisfied. If he is wholly dissatisfied (Article 50), and if the reasons of such dissatisfaction are confirmed (Article 51c) no grant is made. You will judge every school by the same standard that you have hitherto used, as regards its religious, moral, and intellectual merits. The examination under Article 48 does not supersede this judgment, but presupposes it. That article does not prescribe that, if thus much is done, a grant shall be paid, but, unless thus much is done, no grant shall be paid. It does not exclude the inspection of each school by a highly educated public officer, but it fortifies this general test by individual examination. If you keep these distinctions steadily in view you will see how little the scope of your duties is changed."

Again, under Article 52a of the Revised Code, not only could the grant be reduced "by not less than one-tenth nor more than one-half in the whole, upon the Inspector's Report, for faults of instruction or discipline," but also "for failure (after one year's notice) of the managers to provide," among other things, "maps." Maps could, of course, only be required for the purpose of teaching geography. He was therefore of opinion that the Inspector had been fully justified in giving the warning to which the question referred. It might be convenient to the House if he took that opportunity of stating that he proposed, when the House met to-morrow, to lay on the table a minute upon the subject of the Endowment of Schools, and make a statement thereon.

THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH: I wish, Sir, to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it has come under his observation that one particular morning paper was enabled to publish the substance of his intended Budget on the morning before its communication to this House, and whether it is in accordance with his intention that such anticipation of his Financial Statement should take place?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, before I answer the Question of the hon. Member perhaps he will allow me to apologise to him for not having been in my place on Tuesday evening to give him a reply. But the fact is, I was otherwise closely engaged. I was occupied with an army of deputations, headed by Members of Parliament, from which I could not escape. With regard to the first part of the Question of the hon. Member, it did come under my observation that one particular morning paper was enabled to publish the substance of undesirable that the music of Mozart and Handel should be mingled with "Garry Owen" and "Boyne Water."

MR. HENNESSY said, he would repeat one part of his Question—whether the programme had been submitted to Lord Wodehouse for approval. He also desired to know whether the right hon. Baronet had ever heard that Handel himself had said that he would rather be the composer of a certain Irish melody than of any of his own works?

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he believed that the programme was submitted to the Lord Lieutenant, but of course he had no voice in the matter. He believed that it was also submitted to the Prince of Wales.

ASSASSINATION OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

ANSWER TO ADDRESS.

LORD PROBY, the Controller of the Household, brought up the Queen's answer to the Address voted by the House—

Answer to Address [1st May] reported as follows:—

"I entirely participate in the sentiments which you have expressed to Me in the Address which I have received from you, on the Assassination of the President of the United States; and I have given directions that My Minister at Washington shall make known to the Government of that Country the feelings which you entertain in common with Myself and My whole People, with regard to this deplorable Event."

WAYS AND MEANS.

WAYS AND MEANS — Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Question again proposed.

"That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, in lieu of the Duties of Customs now charged on Tea the following Duties of Customs shall, on and after the 6th day of May 1865 until the 1st day of August 1866, be charged thereon on importation into Great Britain and Ireland: viz.

MR. MOFFATT said, that he had been selected by the great and important branch of commerce which was affected by the alteration in the tea duty, to bring its grievance under the notice of the House, partly because he had for the last twenty-five years been largely and intimately connected with the trade, and partly because he had now no personal interest in the question. He was, however, sensible of the injustice which would accrue to those engaged in the trade from the very sudden and abrupt notice given by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The dealers in tea alleged that it was necessary for them to keep large stocks of duty-paid tea for the supply of their customers. Upon the faith of a distinct promise from the Chancellor of the Exchequer the dealers now held a large stock of tea, upon which they had paid a duty of 1s. per lb.; and now they were suddenly called upon to dispose of it as having paid only 6d. The dealers alleged that they had been acting upon the right hon. Gentleman's own assurance on the 16th of April, 1863, when the Budget was settled, and he said—

"The Committee will understand that if the proposal to reduce the duty on tea to 1s. per lb. is adopted, it will be a final measure, so far as we can presume to look forward to the future."

Acting upon the faith of that assurance, duty had been paid during the last month upon 7,900,000 lb., and the bulk of that stock was now in the hands of the dealers. They cheerfully acquiesced in the policy of the reduction; but while they admitted the right of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to make any remissions of taxation, they contended that he had no right to remit the tax already paid upon goods which had not yet been distributed to the public. The grievance of these dealers was that a heavy loss would be sustained by them, for which no compensation was made, and that they had incurred that loss mainly in consequence of the pledge that had been given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. They also stated that their case was without precedent, that it had always been the custom to give due notice of any alteration to be made in the duty on tea. These gentlemen sought an interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, with his usual courtesy and kindness, consented to receive them. There were upon that deputation representatives from seventy or eighty towns, but, in reply to their remonstrances, the right hon. Gentleman said he could not consent to a measure which would be contrary to the principle of the Budget, and would produce a paralysis in the tea trade. The right hon. Gentleman said he could not consent to a measure which would produce a paralysis in the tea trade. The right hon. Gentleman said he could not consent to a measure which would produce a paralysis in the tea trade.

range his financial arrangements, but he did say that there was a want of unanimity among the trade. Upon this latter point he (Mr. Moffatt), speaking from an intimate personal knowledge, could only say that although there were perhaps twenty or thirty dealers in tea who would be glad to have the reduced duty come at once into operation, yet there were 165,368 dealers in the United Kingdom whose wishes were of a different character. It was rather hard, when all these gentlemen were voters, that on the eve of an election the Liberal candidates should be asked to support the right hon. Gentleman's dictum against all opposition. The Chancellor of the Exchequer also said something about the cost of allowing a drawback upon tea being equivalent to a penny in the income tax. The dealers, however, did not ask for any drawback, but simply that the reduction of duty might be postponed for a brief period to give them an opportunity of disposing of the stocks upon which they had paid the 1s. duty. It was not difficult to ascertain what the effect of a postponement would be, for a nearly similar state of things occurred in 1863. At that time it was generally very well understood that the duty on tea was to be altered, and in the twenty-five days preceding the Financial Statement of 1863 duty was paid in the port of London upon 1,159,000 lb., and in the twenty-five days after duty was paid upon 8,146,000 lb., making up in the clearances fifty days nearly ten millions of pounds of tea. The only practical result of the delay asked for would be that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would get rather more of the duty at 1s., and that at 6d. would not be in operation quite so soon. The most serious objection of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was that the request of the dealers was opposed to all precedent, and that it was the usual practice to give effect to all alterations of duty as speedily as possible. He was sorry to differ from the right hon. Gentleman upon that point. There had been of late years three great alterations of the duty upon tea. The first was in 1853, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave notice on the 16th of April to reduce the duty on tea from 2s. 2½d. to 1s. 9d., to become law on the 1st of June. The next alteration was in 1856 when Sir George Lewis proposed on the 6th of March that the duty should be reduced from 1s. 9d. to 1s. 3d. on April 6. The only other alteration until now was made on the 16th of April, 1863, and he appealed to every one whether it was not perfectly well understood by the public that an alteration in the tea duties would take place. No formal notice was necessary, therefore, as to that. That was clearly proved by what he had already stated as to the clearances at that period. He thought the House would perceive from what he had stated that the course which he now proposed was in accordance with precedent. That was the case of the teadealers. On their behalf he would only call one further witness, but that was a high authority—no less a person than Mr. Gladstone. In 1857 the right hon. Gentleman was not Chancellor of the Exchequer, but he then made a Motion of his own accord, and proposed that the duty on tea should be reduced from 1s. 9d. to 1s. 3d. per lb., and he specially proposed on March 6 that the reduction should take place from April 5. The right hon. Gentleman then complained of the unfairness to the trade in not making them aware of the intended alteration in the duty. In the same speech the right hon. Gentleman said—

“What is the consequence of the course that has been taken with respect to the tea duty? Why, in the first place, a distinct promise was given to the parties engaged in the trade, and I confess that I think it a most serious evil that that promise should be broken. It is all very well to come down to the House and say that, whether you grant a remission of the duty on tea or not, no loss will fall on the dealer. I think nothing could be more harsh—I will not say dishonest—than such a statement.”—[3 Hansard, clxiv. 1983.]

Those are hard words, but they are not mine. They are the words of the right hon. Gentleman when he was making a friendly criticism upon the Budget of Sir George Lewis. The right hon. Gentleman, on that occasion, went on to say—

“It is most unjust and impolitic to break faith with the dealer, and to defend the non-performance of your promise to him by the allegation that the loss will fall on the consumer and not on him.”

And subsequently the right hon. Gentleman expressed the hope—

“That the House will not be led by any such narrow policy, to exult in the gains that are to be got out of the dealers by a disappointment of the expectations they have been led to entertain.”

It was impossible to adduce higher testimony in favour of the Motion which he was about to submit; but he might refer to another high authority, Sir George Lewis, who, on the 12th of August, 1857, said—

"It is expedient to give as long a notice in regard to these duties as is possible, because a short notice is always embarrassing and disadvantageous to merchants and dealers."

That was especially applicable to these duties on tea. That was the case he had to submit. He had not much hope of convincing the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and those who had intrusted their interests to his care had also little hope; but they did confide in the justice of the House, to which they appealed against the unwarrantable and unjust decision of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He therefore begged to move to amend the Resolution by substituting the date of the 1st of June for that of the 6th of May.

MR. CAVE, in seconding the Amendment, did not go quite so far as the hon. Member for Honiton. He thought that as a general rule all trades must be liable to the chances of a change of duties. When duties were suddenly raised those who possessed large stocks in bond complained, and when they were lowered the complaint came from those who had large stocks duty paid. When the tea duty was last lowered, in 1863, the same number of days only elapsed before the law took effect as on this occasion, and he thought the Chancellor's answer to the hon. Baronet the Member for Stamford on that occasion was conclusive. He had, therefore, declined accompanying the deputation the other day; but on looking more carefully into the question, in consequence of the Motion of the hon. Member for Honiton, he had been surprised to see how much ground had been given to the objectors by the Chancellor himself, and it was upon this ground alone that he supported the Amendment. The hon. Member had gone fully into the question; but he would take the liberty of reading again the exact words of the Chancellor in the debate on the Budget on the 16th of April, 1863—

"The Committee need not apprehend that the proposal thus to fix the duty upon tea only for a limited period (that was for a year only) will have any disturbing or unsettling effect, for it is thoroughly understood by the trade and by the country that when the tea duty shall be reduced to 1s. per pound the reduction will be, so far as we may presume to look forward into the future, a final measure."—[3 Hansard, clxx. 229.]

Then, again, on the 23rd, when the Resolution was in Committee, the right hon. Gentleman said, in answer to the Member for Devizes—

Mr. Moffatt

Those words might have some meaning which was not apparent on the surface, but he (Mr. Cave) asked the House what interpretation the trade was likely to place upon them other than that the right hon. Gentleman, at least, was not going to deal with those duties again. Again, in the following year, on the reduction of the licence to sell tea in country districts, the right hon. Gentleman used these words—

"I think it would be good policy, even if we are to put it on no other ground than the furtherance of the great change adopted last year, to make a reduction upon that (namely, the licence) duty."

These words might surely have been expected to strengthen the previous impression, and, having led the trade, at any rate, to believe that the reduction of 1863 was, as far as the Chancellor was concerned, a final one, the dealers told us that they had been induced by them to hold larger stocks of duty-paid goods than they otherwise should have done, and wanted time to reduce them. He confessed he doubted the great advantage to themselves of the concession they asked. He thought the result would be, in places where there was little competition, that people would leave off buying tea till the duty was lowered, and in those places in which there were many competitors they would soon have some one giving notice that he allowed the whole reduction of duty to immediate purchasers, which would, of course, compel the rest to follow. Still, the extension asked for by the hon. Member was a very moderate one, and only placed tea in length of interval on the same footing as that on which sugar was placed last year; and as he thought the trade might be supposed to know their own business, and certainly had a just and reasonable ground for their demand, he should support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Honiton.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "6th day of May," and insert the words "1st day of June."—(Mr. Moffatt.)

Question proposed, "That the words '6th day of May' stand part of the proposed Resolution."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have nothing to complain of in the speech of my hon. Friend (Mr. Moffatt) except to say that the extracts which he has quoted from my speech in 1856 are entirely irrelevant to the matter in hand. The words are perhaps stronger than I could wish now that I had used, but I do not at all recede from the substance of them. I simply say now that they have no reference to any point raised in this debate. That speech had reference to an interference with arrangements definitely fixed by Parliament, and the object was not at all to take care of the interests of retail dealers, but to encourage merchants to make arrangements in China, which necessarily from the distance require a long time for their execution. My hon. Friend (Mr. Moffatt) takes the ground that on all occasions in which a trade is dealt with time should be given to those who vend the articles on which the duty is reduced to get rid of their stocks. But he does not attempt to draw a distinction between the tea trade and other trades in this respect, for how is it possible to allow this right to the tea trade and to deny it to others? No distinction can be drawn, and no distinction ever has been drawn. As far as my own experience and that of the Departments go, there is no case during the last twenty years in which, in regard to any article not about to undergo a process of manufacture, but simply to be distributed to the consumers, time has been given to get rid of the stocks of the retailers. It was not given in 1863; and, with his means of knowledge, my hon. Friend must be aware that it was not given in 1853. The Resolution in Committee was brought forward at the very first moment possible, and the moment the Resolution was passed and reported the new duty took effect. [Mr. MOFFATT: When was it announced?] On the 18th of April; but when the Budget was proposed there was a gap in the revenue which had to be filled up by the authority of Parliament from the lapse of the income tax, and until Parliament had given its assent to the renewal of the income tax we had not the funds to make the reduction. I said myself then that we had been prevented bringing the tea duties forward sooner by the debates on the income tax. The precedents, therefore, on which my hon. Friend has founded himself have really no relation to the case. What my hon. Friend's proposal amounts to is this: that hereafter Parliament is never to reduce any Customs duties without giving notice to the dealers. To such a proposal I must decline to be a party. I have even less occasion to complain of the speech of the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Cave). There is very little in his speech from which I differ. The hon. and learned Gentleman quite agrees with me in what I regard as the main point at issue, and the grounds taken by him is totally different from that taken by my hon. Friend behind me. The hon. and learned Gentleman has narrowed the nature of the case so much that I shall refrain from arguing the larger and more general question raised in the speech of my hon. Friend behind me, and will look in the first instance only at the narrow question raised by the hon. and learned Gentleman. He says that in a former year he was opposed to a demand of this sort, but he thinks that words were used by me in 1863 which had the effect of placing the tea duties pro hac vice on a special ground. I certainly cannot agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman as to the effect of these words. I cannot agree that whoever subsequently proposed the reduction of the tea duty would be bound to have due regard to the effect of those words. I have been frequently told in this House that I have a disposition to deny to it any share in the Government of the country; but I admit without hesitation that this being a matter of taxation, the House may do what it pleases, and my duty and the duty of Her Majesty's Government is to place the House in full possession of all the facts, and the view which is entertained by the Executive upon them. In 1863 I used the words which have been quoted, and I am not now going to argue the question against these allowances in general. If this question can be settled on the narrow ground of a special claim on the part of the tea trade, it will be as well not to enter on the broad ground of general policy. But I may observe that on this latter ground nothing can be more mischievous to the dealer, to the consumer, and to the revenue, than that any particular interest should be allowed to interfere with the arrangements of Parliament, in respect of the time at which reductions of duty are to take effect. By a proposition such as that of my hon. Friend very little is acquired for the retailer, and that little is obtained at a tenfold inconvenience to the public. Looking at my hon. Friend as a man in the foremost rank of the commerce of this country, I am sorry to see him advocating such a proposition. He, however, brings the question forward as a breach of good faith. I am glad it is brought forward on that ground. I have not the slightest intention or desire to blink that question. I am of opinion that there is no breach of faith in the arrangement proposed by the Government, but if it be the opinion of the House that there is, as far as I am concerned, the case is not one in which I feel it necessary to offer any determined opposition. Before 1863 the subject of the tea duty was one on which there had been continual battle in this House, and consequently very considerable uncertainty continued to prevail. Accordingly, in 1863, when we proposed to settle the duty by reducing it to 1s., our object was to get rid of that uncertainty and bring tea again into precisely the same position as that of the rest of the articles on which Customs' duties were levied. It was not our intention to give to tea any special privilege not granted to wine, or spirits, or any other commodity, but to place it as near as we could in the condition of other articles; and we did wish to give the trade clearly to understand that no special cause of agitation would thenceforward exist in respect of tea. Now, that would be a very simple matter if it stood alone, but neither my hon. Friend nor the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Cave) has explained the circumstances under which I used the words which have been quoted this evening. We proposed to make the tea duty the subject of an annual Act; and, prima facie, by such a proposal, we seemed to be putting tea in a position of less security than that of other articles liable to duty. Therefore, it was the duty of the Government to make the trade understand that the article of tea was not to stand in greater uncertainty than any other customable article. My words grew out, not of reducing the duty to a shilling a pound, but of making that duty the subject of an annual Act, and their intention and meaning was that we did not intend thereby to make them a subject of annual agitation and debate. Now, however, my hon. Friend ingeniously, I will not say artfully, makes use of them as conveying another kind of promise, and so founding a special claim. We are of opinion that no special claim exists. I admit that the expressions I used on the occasion were not the most happy that could have been chosen having regard to a change occurring in 1865. The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite thinks that they give to those parties something in the shape of a moral claim. I must confess that his conduct on former occasions, in setting himself against those claims on general grounds, gives his opinion on this matter considerable authority and weight, and makes me entertain a confident hope that on future occasions we shall be found together doing battle, and doing it resolutely, against what I believe to be a vicious principle. With respect to the magnitude of the question there is no doubt about it. When my hon. Friend (Mr. Moffatt) marshalled that army of his in Downing Street, it was utterly impossible for me to meet it with an effectual resistance. Some of the teadealers stated to me in his presence that the moment this Resolution was reported and the officers in the Custom House were directed to act upon it every dealer in the country would reduce his tea 6d. a pound. This assertion was made with very considerable boldness. I confess that my objection to my hon. Friend's proposal would be very much mitigated if it operated as an inducement to the 165,000 gentlemen who are flourishing the lash over the heads of their recalcitrant Members to sign a document saying, "I, A B, C D, and E F, hereby declare that I will reduce the price 6d. a pound on my tea the day the duty takes effect." The hon. Member says the teadealers are unanimous, and I agree with him that they are usually found to act as one man; there may be a few outsiders, but they, as my hon. Friend says, may safely be disregarded. But my hon. Friend's doctrine is contrary to all experience. [Mr. MOFFATT: It was not mine.] Not my hon. Friend's, but the doctrine of the friends whom he has led on, marshalled, encouraged, sustained, and countenanced. Their doctrine that there would be an immediate reduction of sixpence a pound in price when the duty came in force was all moonshine, contrary to experience. The business of these gentlemen is to get the best price for their tea, and allow me to pay them the compliment of saying that they perfectly well understand the way to do it. Now, while I do not admit that the words which I used in 1863 bear the interpretation which is sought to be put upon them, yet if the House be of a different opinion a sum of £100,000—which perhaps is about the sum involved in this question—though it is not convenient to part with it at present, is not a thing to stand at any time between this House and what it considers to be an act of justice. To a general recognition of a right on the part of retail dealers to interpose between Parliament and a reduction of a Customs' duty on a particular day I am entirely opposed. I do not deny that in those cases some of them may suffer inconvenience in respect of stocks on hand; but every one of these reductions tends immensely to their benefit, and the amount which they may have to pay at any time in respect of stocks on hand is perfectly insignificant as compared with the advantage which they derive from those changes. I do not by any means call the reduction of the tea duty class legislation; yet, undoubtedly, a special benefit does accrue from it to the parties engaged in distributing tea to the consumers throughout the country after it has left the bonded warehouse. I thought it right to avail myself of the opportunity my hon. Friend opposite gave me of drawing broadly the distinction between the attack upon a principle founded on the practice of twenty years, of denying the intervention of time before Customs' duties are reduced to enable dealers to get rid of their retail stocks and the favourable construction—unfavourable to the Exchequer, but favourable to the trade—which the Committee may be disposed to put upon the words I used in 1863. The words I used were—

"It will be most convenient to renew the tea duty only until August, 1864. The Committee need not apprehend that the proposal thus to fix the duty upon tea only for a limited period will have any disturbing or unsettling effect; for it is thoroughly understood by the trade and by the country that when the tea duty shall be reduced to 1s. per lb. the reduction will be, so far as we may presume to look forward into the future, a final measure."—[3 Hansard, clxx. 229.]

The appeal made on the present occasion stands on special grounds, leaving intact the general principle that the time at which a reduction of a duty shall come into operation shall be regulated by large considerations of public policy, and not by the convenience of retail dealers, or the pressure which particular constituencies may bring to bear upon the Members who represent them in Parliament. If it be the opinion of the Committee that out of these words arose a claim special to the present occasion, leaving intact the general principle, it is a matter on which I should not feel justified in placing myself and the Government in conflict with what may be the general wish of Members. I would suggest to my hon. Friend that the most convenient proceeding would be this—that we should strike out all date from the Resolution as it stands, as has often been done before, and then that he should propose another Resolution, which should record the ground upon which the House thinks fit to grant the delay asked for, so as not to interfere with the general principle. The Resolution I would suggest would run in these terms—

"In consideration of the expectation specially founded upon the declaration of Her Majesty's Government in 1863, in respect of the tea duty, the said reduction shall be postponed till the 1st day of June, 1865."

If I have shown tenacity in resisting what I call a broad and dangerous proposition, I shall have no fear of ulterior consequences if the Resolution is passed in these terms.

MR. CRAWFORD said, that he had to express his thanks to the right hon. Gentleman for having given way upon that point. He could state that certain dealers not far from St. Paul's Churchyard had expended large sums in erecting warehouses and laying in considerable stocks of tea, and if the duty had been at once reduced they would probably have lost not less than £1,000. He thanked the right hon. Gentleman for the course he had taken, and complimented him upon the very ingenious manner in which he had escaped defeat.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the rigid rules of action adopted in the case of the French Treaty had inflicted the severest loss upon both his constituents and those of the hon. Member for Coventry. He expressed his thanks to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for not having opposed the House in the expression of its opinion, and for adopting a plan which would relieve a very large class of dealers from severe loss. The money they would have been deprived of would merely have been put into the pockets of the large holders of tea in bond. He was glad to see that the House had resumed its proper place in this matter, as, without its sanction, the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not have done that which he believed to be an act of justice.

MR. HENLEY said, the question in reference to the tea duty was now happily settled, although upon somewhat peculiar grounds. He agreed with the general principle which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had laid down as to the inconvenience of and want of precedent for postponing the reduction of the duty, but the House could hardly have taken a different course, considering the special grounds laid before it. He seized the opportunity, which might not occur again, to notice some very curious statements made by the right hon. Gentleman the other night in his financial statement. He was the more disposed to call attention to the matter because, as the right hon. Gentleman had agreed to violate a general principle in deference to the statements he made upon another occasion, he (Mr. Henley) might consider himself entitled to take the converse of the proposition if the statements made by the right hon. Gentleman the other night were to be persisted in. On the occasion of making his financial statement the Chancellor of the Exchequer endeavoured to exhaust, or, if he might so term it, discount the possibility of dealing with the malt duties, and he ventured to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he was correctly understood when he was reported in the newspapers to have said—

“If the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade was just in stating the malt duty to be  $12\frac{1}{2}$  per cent upon beer for the purpose of comparison, for the sake of argument,”—a very curious distinction—“he would take it at 20 per cent upon the barrel less probably 1 or 2 per cent for the licences, and that to reduce beer, ‘that was porter,’ one farthing per pot, it would be necessary to reduce the duty on malt to  $1s. 2d.$ ” He did not know whether he was correct in thus stating the figures, or whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer was misrepresented.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I said it would be necessary to reduce the duty on malt to  $1s. 2d.$  to reduce the price of beer one farthing a pot.

MR. HENLEY: That was to say of the duty of  $2s. 8\frac{1}{2}d.$  now placed on malt,  $1s. 6\frac{1}{2}d.$  must be taken off. Now, those figures did not appear to him to be accurate, and he was sure the right hon. Gentleman would, if wrong, be glad of an opportunity of setting himself right upon the point. Let them, for “the sake of argument,” take two bushels of malt for each barrel of beer, which was the quantity which it had been assumed throughout the discussion would be required. Taking 20 per cent, as assumed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to be the duty upon a barrel of beer, that would be exactly one-fifth of its total value which, as sold by the brewers, was  $36s.$  The one-fifth of  $36s.$  was about  $7s. 2d.$  as the duty on the barrel arrived at—thus, five into thirty-six went seven times and one over. But the barrel of beer contained 144 pots or quarts, and 144 farthings would make but  $3s.$  It did not take much arithmetic to arrive at that. And if the duty at one-fifth on  $36s.$  came to  $7s. 2d.$ , he could not conceive how a farthing a pot could amount to that sum. He had tried it and turned it about in every conceivable way, but he could not make it come to anything different than the figures he had given. He therefore thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer must have fallen into some error when he said it would be necessary to reduce the duty more than one-half in order to reduce the price of a pot of porter one farthing a pot. Of course, if the price of beer as sold by the pot were taken the error would be still greater. He had been casting about in order to find how the mistake arose, and he found that if  $1s. 2d.$  were taken off the duty, in place of reducing the duty to  $1s. 2d.$ , the figures of the right hon. Gentleman would come out right. There must have been some modification in the figures of the right hon. Gentleman, and he thought it his duty to call the attention of the House to the subject. He protested against the statement. The figures appeared to have been twisted round. The right hon. Gentleman dissented, and he should be very glad if he could set the matter right.

MR. BRISCOE said, he could not help taking that opportunity of expressing his cordial thanks to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the concession he had made on behalf of the people. He felt it would be most gratefully received by the tea dealers throughout the country.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that he begged to be allowed to make a very few observations in addition to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley) to which he must call the serious attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He had not felt the other night at liberty to controvert the statements of the right hon. Gentleman himself, or question the authority of the Department of Inland Revenue—at least, without further information on the subject. It seemed now that “finality” must no longer be attributed to the right hon. Gentleman’s proposals, and he must say he heard that admission with great satisfaction, when he remembered that on the occasion to which he referred the right hon. Gentleman, in clear and explicit terms, declared that the extinction of the malt duty would be the death warrant of indirect taxation. He understood that declaration to import neither more nor less than an avowed determination that the extinction of the malt tax could never be the act of the present Government; but after what had occurred to-night they must not always take it for granted that the right hon. Gentleman meant literally what he said. The right hon. Gentleman had not hesitated, in explicit terms, to contradict the statement he (Sir FitzRoy Kelly) had made, to the effect that of the price paid for beer by the consumers throughout the United Kingdom, taking it in the aggregate to be £60,000,000 per annum, one-third of that amount must be attributed to the malt tax. He now repeated that statement, and if the right hon. Gentleman would give him a Select Committee he would pledge himself to substantiate it in every particular and to the fullest extent. Whether the amount paid by the consumers of beer was £40,000,000, as stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, (perhaps limiting his computation to England), or £50,000,000 or £60,000,000, he undertook to satisfy the Committee that one-third of that sum was to be attributed entirely to the tax on malt, of which only £6,000,000, deducting charges, passed into the Exchequer, the difference being entirely lost by the public, the consumers of beer. The President of the Board of Trade had stated that 12½ per cent was the amount of the duty paid on malt. [Mr. MILNER GIBSON: On beer.] The right hon. Gentleman, when it suited his argument, used the term "beer," and at another time "malt." It is necessary to distinguish between the tax on the raw material and the tax on the manufactured article. He did not think the Chancellor of the Exchequer would hesitate to agree that 70 per cent was the duty on malt. If we allowed 28s. for the price of barley and 4s. for the process of malting, then we had 32s. Upon that 23s. duty, or, perhaps, a little less was paid. That was 72 per cent. He did not wish to put the increase in the process of malt at too high a figure, but supposing they put the duty at 22s. 6d., that would not be too high, and the percentage would vary from 66 to 74. He thought he had fairly stated the point when he said the duty payable by the maltster, when the malt was prepared as a saleable article, was 70 per cent; and this became 33 per cent upon beer to the consumer. And when they came to compare the two articles they would find that there was more duty payable upon malt and upon beer than upon tea. He was not about to complain of the duty upon tea. It would be an invidious task to set one commodity against another, or endeavour by any Amendment to intercept the liberality of the Government in taking a certain amount of duty off that article; but if Members of the Government chose to compare one commodity with another, and say to those who had advocated a reduction of the malt tax that their complaints and statements had been unfounded, and that the tea duty had greater claims than the duty upon malt, it became him at all events to call their attention to the particular subjects with which they were dealing. If the House looked for a moment at both duties as they stood at present, they would find that the tax upon malt was the higher. The right hon. Gentlemen the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the President of the Board of Trade had very openly and explicitly addressed the House upon this subject, but the difference between the tax upon malt and that upon tea was this—that the tax upon malt being imposed upon the article in its raw or original state, or in the very first stage of its manufacture, it became increased and multiplied as it passed through the various stages to the consumer. The maltster had his profits from the brewer, the brewer from the publican or innkeeper, and the publican from the consumer, and before the beer reached the consumer the tax upon malt was trebled or quadrupled. That which would be nominally 12½ per cent, as compared with the ultimate price of beer when sold, had become, at least, 33 per cent, by the accumulation of profit upon profit on the original amount of duty. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had passed rapidly from 12½ to 20 per cent, which he seemed to allow was the proportion charged upon beer when sold in the barrel. If the duty were only 20 per cent when sold in the barrel, he would undertake to prove to demonstration that it became 33 per cent or more at the time it was sold in the public-house by the quart, pint, and glass to the retail purchaser. If the right hon. Gentleman had examined the terms of his own argument, it must have struck him as fallacious when he stated that a large proportion of the whole of the beer sold in this kingdom was by the barrel. Three-fourths of it was sold by the pot and pint in the public-house. This matter must rest very much upon statements, because he could not call brewers before that House to give evidence. There had, however, been letters in the newspapers written by brewers who did not make the same statements in that House, and he only wished that he had had an opportunity of cross-examining them in a witness-box, upon the statements put forth, and he would have shown that the great portion of the beer consumed was sold in quarts and small quantities in the public-houses. He offered once more to prove before any Committee that the 70 per cent duty paid upon malt became, at least, 33 per cent, or one-third, paid upon beer by the consumer. The right hon. Gentleman had also said that in 1722, when the duty upon malt was only 4s., or thereabouts, the consumption was as great as in 1864. When he (Sir FitzRoy Kelly) had the opportunity of addressing the House previously, he quoted from actual Returns to show that during some forty or fifty years in the last century, when the duty upon malt was about 4s. per quarter, the consumption was as much as two or three bushels for each person; and he also showed that within the last twenty years, when the duty per quarter upon malt was 21s. 8½d., the amount consumed by each individual according to the population was not in some years one-half that quantity, and for five or ten years it was not more than two thirds that quantity. He would, therefore, be glad to see the Returns from which the right hon. Gentleman took upon himself to inform the House that the consumption of beer was proportionately what he had stated, taking an average of ten or fifteen years. There was another point, with regard to the duty upon wine, to which he wished to speak on behalf of those who complained of the malt tax. It was an injustice to important interests in this country and a reproach to the Government that while they had taken duty to an immense amount off foreign wine during the last forty or fifty years; while they had relieved the rich and well-to-do in the world from a considerable portion of the taxation which fell upon their luxuries, one of which was foreign wines, yet, from 1815 up to the present time, the malt tax remained untouched and undiminished. This was a grievous wrong, especially to the labouring classes of the community throughout Great Britain. Foreign wine

to the benefit of foreign traders had been reduced 200 per cent within our own recollection. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the duty on malt was 20 per cent. The duty upon foreign wine was said to be still 27 per cent, but, in fact, it is but 7 per cent. How, then, was that 27 per cent made out? He cared not whether they took an account of the duty on wine at 1s. or 2s. per gallon or according to the value of the wine; he could not accept the figures given by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. They ought to look upon the question in a reasonable and common-sense point of view. They ought, in comparing wine with beer, to take that quality of the former article which was generally consumed. What was the amount of duty upon wine costing between 3s. and 6s. a bottle? As he stated on a former occasion, a duty of 1s. a gallon, containing six bottles, would produce a duty of 2d. a bottle, and even if 2s. per gallon it would be but 4d. a bottle. Taking the average of 3s. to 4s. a bottle, and the duty from 2d. to 4d. a bottle, it makes the duty to the consumer of wine about 7 per cent. He would also now take the opportunity of asking the right hon. Gentleman when it was likely that he would bring forward his measure for allowing the duty upon malt to be determined by weight instead of measure. If they were to understand in its literal as well as its substantial interpretation the declaration of the right hon. Gentleman that the repeal of the malt tax would be the death-warrant of indirect taxation, and that Her Majesty's Government (in which he concurred) were opposed to the total extinction of indirect taxation, they must also understand it as an express declaration that the malt tax must continue unmitigated and unalleviated in any way as long as the present Government remained in power. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would express himself clearly upon the subject, so that they might know what they were to hope and of what they were to despair.

COLONEL NORTH said, he did not share in the astonishment which some Members had expressed that the agricultural body should have been ignored completely in the present Budget. The reception which the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave to the deputation of agriculturists a short time ago showed him that they had no chance of redress. Last year a deputation of farmers waited upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who cast it in their teeth that there was no agitation on the subject, and he also fired a shell into their ranks which was intended to explode to the detriment of their representatives. He (Colonel North) then told the right hon. Gentleman that the absence of agitation on the part of the farmers of this country did not show that they were not suffering a grievous injustice, though they were quiet, orderly men entirely free from agitation; but when they found that some taxes, like the paper duty, were entirely repealed, and others, such as wine, were partially repealed, they thought it was high time to move in their own matter. The consequence was that early this year, a meeting of agriculturists from all parts of the country, numbering between 2,000 and 3,000 gentlemen, was held in London, and a deputation was appointed to wait upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He (Colonel North) must say that, although he had attended many deputations, he never saw one more ungraciously received. The right hon. Gentleman did not even vouchsafe a reply, but merely told them that they had representatives who would be able to fight their battle in the House. The right hon. Gentleman knew that the representatives of the agriculturists would not flinch from their duty; but he also knew that, from their numbers, they had no chance of success. However, as an election was approaching he would find that the agriculturists would appeal from the free trade Ministry now in power to the honest feelings of the constituencies of the country, and, in all probability, they would appeal with success. The right hon. Gentleman, however, might be certain that for the future he would not be able to complain of the absence of agitation. They would continue to agitate until this grievance was fully redressed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER would refer to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Suffolk (Sir FitzRoy Kelly), which were of a practical character, rather than to the vague and somewhat harsh imputation of the gallant Colonel who had just sat down. The hon. and learned Gentleman had quoted from his speech his statement that as he understood the proposal for the reduction of the malt duty that reduction would be the death-warrant to indirect taxation. His hon. and learned Friend, in proposing the immediate reduction of that duty with a view to its ultimate repeal, accompanied that proposal by no suggestion as to any other manner in which beer could be taxed. He was bound to repeat that the repeal so understood would be the death-warrant of indirect taxation. Time would decide whether his words possessed any weight or not. His hon. and learned Friend had used that it was the intention of the Government at no time to do anything with the malt duty, but he had most carefully limited his remarks upon the subject to the present year. What he had said as to the future was that beer would have to take its chance when put into competition with tea, sugar, and coffee on the one side; and with wine and spirits on the other. He deprecated, therefore, any attempt to advocate the repeal of the malt tax upon some exceptional grounds, or the establishment of any claim on the part of the agriculturists to an exclusive enjoyment in the reduction of taxes. He did not at all pledge himself, nor ask the House to assent to the proposition, that any alteration or reduction of the malt tax would necessarily be class legislation. What he said was—let the malt tax take its chance in competition with other taxes. With regard to the future, he had endeavoured to point out that the difficulty of operating with regard to indirect taxation was in a great degree to be measured by our obligations in regard to the income tax, and the policy which the House might think fit to adopt with reference to that impost. For three years it had been his good fortune to propose certain remissions of taxation, and he was not aware that anything had occurred to prevent the agriculturists from participating in the benefits which these remissions had conferred upon the public generally. The matter, however, depended upon the House. The malt duty might undoubtedly be reduced if they retained the income tax at 6*d.*; and, as the Resolutions with reference to the latter duty had not yet passed the House, his hon. and learned Friend and the hon. Gentlemen who supported him might, if they were in earnest, propose the reduction of the malt duty instead of the income tax. If they were unanimous upon that (the Opposition) side of the House, then, joined probably with a minority of those who sat on this (the Ministerial) side, they would be able to beat the Government. It was the income tax that stood in sharp make the 1s. 2d. per bushel cover the reduction of  $\frac{1}{4}$ d. per quart of beer, which was the reduction to which he had referred.

MR. HENLEY said, he should be glad to know from the right hon. Gentleman, how two bushels of malt, at 2s. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. each, which amounted to 5s. 5d., was 20 per cent, or one-sixth of 36s. The statement which the right hon. Gentleman had made was upon a barrel of beer, and he stated that the duty was 20 per cent. A barrel of beer was produced from two bushels of malt, and the duty upon that was 5s. 5d., and therefore it could not be 20 per cent. The right hon. Gentleman stated that the charge, descending through to the brewer, was 20 per cent on the barrel, less 2 per cent for the brewer's licence and hops. The fifth of 36s. was 7s. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., and by a rule-of-three sum, if 65d. produced 7s. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., 28d., which was the double of 1s. 2d. per barrel, would produce 3s. He had not gone down to the price at which beer was produced at the public-house; but he had taken the Chancellor of the Exchequer's figures as being correct, for the sake of argument; and if he were correct, 1s. 2d. taken off barley would give a reduction of  $\frac{1}{4}$ d. a quart. He could not see in what other way the right hon. Gentleman could make the calculation.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he proceeded on two different principles, according to the operation he had in hand. When he was calculating the loss to the revenue from any given measure, he proceeded on the strictest possible considerations; but when he spoke of 20 per cent he did not proceed with the same rigour. He stated that the 12 $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent spoken of by the President of the Board of Trade was perfectly just for his purpose, if not, indeed, absolutely just; but taking a liberal view of all the elements, and putting everything in the position most favourable to his opponents, he would put the tax at 20 per cent. The 20 per cent, however, was made up of the tax on malt, together with the addition of the tax on hops and the brewer's licence. The figure of 1s. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. he believed to be perfectly accurate, and he was not aware of any ground on which it could be impugned. In dealing with the subject on that footing, he had the highest authority, from which he could not depart, and he believed it to be the only sound basis of calculation.

MR. HENLEY said, the right hon. Gentleman's statement amounted now to this—that to produce a reduction of a certain amount in the price of an article it was not only necessary to take off that amount of duty, but something more. In mentioning 20 per cent, he had always taken into consideration the 2 per cent for licences, &c.

MR. BENTINCK said, he was afraid that he must be added to the number of those who took exception to the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman proposed the other day to relieve the heavy barley lands by levying the duty by weight instead of by measure. The Chancellor of the Exchequer laboured under a complete misconception as to the result of this proposal. The barleys obtained from the heavy soils were heavier than those obtained from the barley, generally used for malting, by two or three pounds a bushel, and were of less value by 2s. or 3s. a quarter. Another inconvenience would arise, he was told—namely, that it would be necessary in case of suspected fraud on the revenue to weigh a quantity of malt, and this process would be most injurious to it. He hoped that inquiry would be made on this subject. The right hon. Gentleman said that in 1722 the consumption of malt was five bushels per head, and that the consumption had now arrived at the same point. He was informed, however, that the actual consumption per head of the population was now little more than one-half what it was at the period referred to, although the consumption of beer was the same. This was to be accounted for in two ways. First, the beer now consumed had not half the strength it had in the good old times, and next there were other materials used in the manufacture of the beer, of which one was sugar. Now, the right hon. Gentleman not only refused to take off the duty on malt but he took off the duty on sugar, to enable it to enter into competition with malt. The right hon. Gentleman also dilated on the question of wine and beer, and denied that there was justification for any comparison between the duty on beer and that on the more expensive sorts of wine. That he (Mr. Bentinck) admitted; but the only result of the right hon. Gentleman's policy was to tax the sound, good, wholesome home-made beverage, in favour of that abominable foreign mixture which unfortunately went by the name of the right hon. Gentleman. The one duty was a direct and the other an indirect tax. The right hon. Gentleman stated in his speech the other night that the repeal of the malt lished, addressed to Mrs. Gladstone, declaring tea to be a dreadful thing, that it was mischievous to the human frame, and that the doctors had pronounced tea, of all things in the world, unless of the weakest character, to be totally unfit for use. But the ladies of our country went still further, for when they looked down from the boxes of the opera, and saw in the stalls so many young gentlemen hairless at an early age, they declared that their premature baldness was attributable to that dreadfully bad mixture known as tea, that worse concoction called Gladstone's claret, and cigars made of cabbage.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, he considered that the agriculturists had been very hardly treated. The present Government owed their accession to power a good deal to the assistance given by agriculturists, which would perhaps be remembered when their assistance was again required. He did not think that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had acted rightly in respect of the malt tax. While the duties on every other species of industry had been either diminished or altogether removed, nothing whatever had been done in respect of the manufacture of malt. The right hon. Gentleman had gone into calculations to show how little the reduction of the duty would do in lowering the price of beer, but he did not seem to have taken into account the additional profit which the dealers in beer put on that article in consequence of the existence of the malt duty. The right hon. Gentleman said it would be something like an injustice to Scotland and Ireland to reduce that duty; but, he had often when in Germany thought how preferable it would be to see the people of Ireland and Scotland in fairs consuming the foaming tankards of pure beer, such as they had in Munich and Vienna, rather than the raw spirits now consumed in such quantities by the people of Ireland and Scotland at such festivities. The slovenliness of agriculture had been often complained of, and the Irish had been told to contrast the neat farming of Belgium with theirs; but it was the general custom of the larger farms in Belgium to have their own malting kiln, and where they were not large enough to support one, two or three farms joined together for that purpose. He believed that if the malt tax were repealed something of the same kind would take place in England, and he, for one, would rejoice to see it.

MR. DUTTON said, that so far from there being the diversity of opinion referred to by the hon. Baronet the Member for Westminster (Sir John Shelley), there never was a question on which the farmers were so united as their opposition to the malt tax. He should support such repeal on the pure principles of free trade whenever the question came before them. The consumption of beer had proved to be stationary as compared with the progress of the population, and he asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if such a state of things was satisfactory to him. He believed that a remission of a portion of the duty would be a great advantage to the Exchequer and to the community at large, and especially to agricultural labourers, who it was notorious could scarcely ever, except on high days and holidays, obtain beer from one end of the year to the other.

MR. LAWSON said, he wished to say a word in favour of tea as against beer. They were not to argue the question as to what was beneficial to a particular class, but what would be the most beneficial to all. The grain of the debate had been pretty well thrashed out. He was not going to discuss the question whether it was desirable to reduce the duty on account of the food of cattle, but whether a reduction of the duty would conduce to the good of man. One of the arguments of the repealers was that by reducing the duty we should promote public sobriety by enabling men to drink their beer at home with their families instead of in the beer shop; but he could not understand how cheapening the material of the beer could have that effect. The beer-seller would increase his trade, or sell stronger beer; and he did not see how stronger beer was likely to produce sobriety. The fact was, that a reduction of the duty would be mischievous. It would enable the beer-sellers to offer greater temptations to the people at a cheaper cost. He believed that there was a desire on both sides of the House to do what they believed to be in the interest of the working man; but what he wished to point out was, that they sometimes, with the best intentions, made great mistakes. The working man was not allowed in that House any means of expressing his opinion, his wants, or his wishes. There was a very striking instance of the mistake they made in their well-meant endeavours to benefit the working classes. He alluded to the Beer Bill, which had for its object to make beer cheap, and that he understood to be the object of hon. Gentlemen who advocated the repeal of the malt tax. It was intended by that Bill to wean the working man from the public-house, which was stated to be the great cause of his misery, and to induce him to consume beer at home. But what was the result of that well-meant effort? It was not only his opinion, but the opinion of all persons entitled from their acquaintance with the habits of the working classes to be heard on this subject, that the Beer Act was the greatest curse that was ever inflicted by legislation upon the working people of this country. The House would remember that Sidney Smith was in favour of that Act on the ground that it would prove a boon to the people; but what did he say shortly afterwards in writing to a friend? "The Beer Bill has begun to act; everybody is drunk; those who are not singing are sprawling—the sovereign people are in a beastly state." It had become an acknowledged fact, as stated by the hon. Member for North Essex, that nine-tenths of the crime of this country originated in the visits of the people to the beer shops. The fact was that where they had a large population, as in this country, with an uncontrolled appetite for strong liquors, the consumption of which had been proved to be the great cause of their misery, they would indulge that appetite the more the greater the facility that was given them for its indulgence. He wanted to know, if the repeal of the malt tax would be such a great boon to the working men, how was it that there was so little demand on their part for that boon? While no petitions had been presented from the working classes in favour of the repeal of the malt tax, innumerable petitions had been presented from them to that House praying that a restriction might be placed upon the sale of intoxicating liquors, which was the cause of much of their misery. The advocates of the measure said that drunkenness arose not so much from the beer as from its adulterations; and an hon. Member last year read a list of the ingredients used in the adulterations. They were foots, liquorice, gentian, quassia, shumac, terra japonica, linseed, cocculus indicus, common salt, and Dantzic spruce. The advocates for the beer shops, in 1830, said, "Make the beer-houses, and adulterations will cease." The real results he (Mr. Lawson) had just stated. He could not see the force of this argument. All the legislation which had tended to cheapen intoxicating liquors and give increased facilities for their consumption was a failure, and worse than failure—it was mischievous. Some few years ago the Chancellor of the Exchequer introduced a measure for cheapening wine. He did it, doubtless, with the best intentions, and in the interest, as he said, of public morality. Did he believe that he had succeeded in this object? He (Mr. Lawson) had no faith in this weaning system. The Beer Act was an effort, and it failed, Cheap wine was tried, and this had failed also. The petitions in favour of the repeal of the malt tax had come from the agricultural districts. If the working men wished to get strong, cheap, unadulterated beer they could obtain it through the instrumentality of their co-operative stores. Of these there were not less than 500 in the north, but only one of these was devoted to the sale of beer. To propose the repeal of the malt tax as a benefit to the working classes was little better than mocking them. He thanked the Chancellor of the Exchequer for devoting his surplus to reductions beneficial to the whole of the people instead of to a reduction of the malt tax, which he sincerely believed would be a source of great mischief.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Another Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "on and after the 6th day of May, 1865."—(Mr. Moffatt.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Resolution," put, and negatived.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER then proposed to amend the Resolution by omitting the words "on and after the 6th of May, 1865," and adding the words, "provided that on special grounds the said reduction shall not take effect until the 1st day of June, 1865."

Another Amendment proposed,

To add at the end of the proposed Resolution the words "Provided, That, on special grounds, the said reduction shall not take effect until the 1st day of June 1865."—(Mr. Moffatt.)

Question, "That those words be added to the proposed Resolution," put, and agreed to.

1. Resolved, That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, in lieu of the Duties of Customs now charged on Tea the following Duties of Customs shall, until the 1st day of August 1866, be charged thereon on importation into Great Britain and Ireland: viz.—

Provided, That, on special grounds, the said reduction shall not take effect until the 1st day of June 1866.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved the following Resolution:—

“That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, there shall be charged, collected, and paid for one year, commencing on the sixth day of April, 1865, for and in respect of all Property, Profits, and Gains mentioned or described as chargeable in the Act passed in the 16th and 17th years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter 34, for granting to Her Majesty Duties on Profits arising from Property, Professions, Trades, and Offices, the following Rates and Duties (that is to say)—For every 20*s.* of the annual value or amount of all such Property, Profits, and Gains (except those chargeable under Schedule (B) of the said Act), the Rate or Duty of 4*d.* And for and in respect of the occupation of Lands, Tenements, Hereditaments, and Heritages chargeable under Schedule (B) of the said Act for every 20*s.* of the annual value thereof:—In England, the Rate or Duty of 2*d.*; and in Scotland and Ireland respectively, the Rate or Duty of 1½*d.*—subject to the provisions contained in section 3 of the Act 26th of Victoria, chapter 22, for the exemption of Persons whose whole Income from every source is under £100 a year, and relief to those whose Income is under £200 a year.”

MR. HUBBARD said, he wished to draw the attention of the Committee to the position in which the income tax now stood. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in proposing the reduction of 2*d.* in the pound on that tax, informed the House that the tax appeared to be entering into a new phase. Instead of having continued for three years, as originally intended, it had endured for twenty-three years, during which period it had passed through a variety of changes, sometimes being reduced and sometimes being increased. It had now reached a stage in which it could be either entirely removed or retained as a part of the permanent financial system of the country. It was almost impossible to decide that question without taking into consideration the relative magnitude of the whole direct and indirect taxation. On comparing those two classes of taxation they would find that the direct was remarkably small contrasted with the indirect taxation, and it would be for the House to determine how far direct taxation ought to be diminished, and whether they were prepared to relinquish an important medium for raising the constant revenue of the country. The wealth of the nation was increasing at a rate variously estimated, some placing it as high as £120,000,000 per annum, but he would take it at £100,000,000, of which increase the larger portion by far must be placed under the head of personal and not real property. Under these circumstances it became of great importance to inquire how this vast increase in personal property could be reached by taxation. The only way in which personal property was reached at present was by the probate and legacy duties at a man's death, and by the income tax during his life. Was it intended, then, altogether to relinquish a tax by which alone they could touch the property of an immensely wealthy class, many of whom, by living abroad, or by spending penuriously preserved all but a small portion of their income from being reached by in direct taxation? So far, he thought, the inducement to continue a tax on income was very strong, but then came the consideration which had been always uppermost in their minds—namely the exceedingly unequal and unjust character of the system by which it was now collected, whereby arose a great provocation to fraud, and a consequent demoralization of the community. Could then the tax be re-constructed so as to avoid these evils? The Chancellor of the Exchequer had frequently expressed his opinion that the re-construction of the income tax was a task beyond the capabilities of any Government; but if the right hon. Gentleman would apply himself to the matter with an earnest desire to construct with the materials at his command a tax which should be just in its principle and in all its essential points, he felt satisfied that he would be able to solve the difficulty. It was true that the tax now produced £1,300,000 for each penny in the pound, instead of £1,000,000 as formerly, but he referred that improvement in the productiveness of the tax to the increased diligence, science, and zeal of the surveyors, even more than to the increased wealth of the country. But here another subject of inquiry arose. In many cases the surveyors had gone beyond their duty in surcharging numbers of persons, who were thereby put to much inconvenience and expense. Several cases of the kind had come within his personal knowledge; and, upon investigation, he found that the surcharges were most unwarrantable, the surveyor surcharging at a venture, and the persons charged being compelled to establish their right to relief. In the very parish in which they were assembled great complaints had been made. The House should, therefore, most carefully scrutinize any new scheme for raising the tax before it consented to impose it upon the country as a permanent source of revenue. He did not propose to make any Motion on the subject, but, as the tax had been re-imposed for a year only, he thought it would become the duty both of Parliament and of the Government, when they next met, to be prepared to meet the question, whether the tax was to become a permanent portion of the financial system of the country, or whether it was so essentially vicious in principle that they were bound gradually to reduce it, with the view to its ultimate extinction.

2. Resolved, That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, there shall be charged, collected, and paid for one year, commencing on the 6th day of April 1865, for and in respect of all Property, Profits, and Gains mentioned or described as chargeable in the Act passed in the 16th and 17th years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter 34, for granting to Her Majesty Duties on Profits arising from Property, Professions, Trades, and Offices, the following Rates and Duties (that is to say):

For every twenty shillings of the annual value or amount of all such Property, Profits, and Gains (except those chargeable under Schedule (B) of the said Act), the Rate or Duty of four pence;

And for and in respect of the occupation of Lands, Tenements, Hereditaments, and Heritages chargeable under Schedule (B) of the said Act, for every twenty shillings of the annual value thereof,

In England, the Rate or Duty of two pence;

And in Scotland and Ireland respectively, the Rate or Duty of one penny halfpenny:

Subject to the provisions contained in Section 3 of the Act 26th Victoria, chapter 22, for the exemption of Persons whose whole Income from every source is under £100 a year, and relief to those whose income is under £200 a year.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, and in lieu of the Duties now payable in respect of Insurances against loss or damage by Fire only, there shall be charged, collected, and paid for the use of Her Majesty, Her heirs and successors, the following Duties (that is to say):

For and upon every Policy of Assurance or Insurance, or other Instrument, by whatever name the same shall be called, whereby any Insurance shall on or after the 25th day of June 1865, be made of or upon any Building, Goods, Wares, Merchandise, or other property from loss or damage by Fire only, the Duty of one penny;

Mr. Hubbard

And for and upon any Note or Memorandum given as a Receipt on the deposit of any sum of money, preparatory to the making out or issuing of any such Policy as aforesaid, the Duty of one penny;

And for and in respect of any such Insurance as aforesaid which shall be made, or continued or renewed, on or after the said 25th day of June 1865, a Duty of one shilling and sixpence for every £100 insured for a year, and at and after that Rate for any fractional part of £100 insured, and for any fractional part of a year, as well as for any number of years for which the Insurance shall be made, or continued or renewed, but no fraction of a penny shall be charged; and when any such Insurance as aforesaid shall be made or renewed at any time between the 27th day of April 1865 and the said 25th day of June, for any period of time extending beyond the said last-mentioned day, there shall be charged and paid for and in respect of the time intervening between the making or renewing of the said Insurance and the said 25th day of June the yearly per-centage Duty at and after the rate chargeable on the said 27th day of April, and for and in respect of any subsequent period including the said 25th day of June, the rate of Duty chargeable according to this Resolution; and no return or allowance of Duty, except at and after the last-mentioned rate, shall be made in respect of time unexpired or otherwise, on any such Insurance as aforesaid, which shall have been made or renewed before the said 27th day of April 1865."

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, that he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would consent to an alteration of the time at which the reduction of the duty should come into effect. Great inconvenience would arise to the Scotch insurance offices from the time proposed in the Resolution, and, as no considerable loss could accrue to the revenue from the alteration which he was about to propose, he trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would show the same consideration in this case which he had done in a former instance. The 25th of June was the time at which most of the policies were effected in England; but in Scotland the 15th of May was the great period for effecting insurances and renewing policies. That being so, if the scale of duties were to commence on the 25th of June, the Scotch Companies would be put to the inconvenience either of issuing a receipt for the period between the 15th of May and the 25th of June, or of proceeding on the double scale of duties. No injustice would be done by taking the 15th of May as the date for the whole kingdom, because the duty of fire insurance effected sent year were paid up to the 25th of June, and therefore it would be only fresh policies after the day named that would be affected by the change. There might be a certain loss to the revenue from the lower scale upon which payments would be made between the two dates, but he was informed if the alteration were not made the people would prefer becoming their own insurers for the intervening month, and one loss might be fairly set against the other. He begged, therefore, to move the substitution of the words "15th day of May" for "the 25th day of June" in the Resolution.

Amendment proposed, in the 7th line of the proposed Resolution, to leave out the words "25th day of June," and insert the words "15th day of May."—(Sir James Fergusson.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Resolution."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he would have been very glad to carry throughout the evening the accommodating character which he appeared to have acquired; but it was not in his power to accede to the Amendment, for several reasons. In the first place, the narrow surplus mentioned in the Financial Statement had been still further reduced by the Vote of the House that night, and it would be most unwise to incur any further diminution. Secondly, the proposal of the hon. Baronet would be retrospective legislation of a kind that was entirely without precedent. It was perfectly certain that the Bill could not become law until after the 15th of May, and therefore to fix that day would be an innovation of a serious character only to be justified by the gravest reasons. Lastly, he could not accede to the argument founded upon inconvenience. Unfortunately, they had different quarter days in England and Scotland, and those of England had been adopted in the Bill as the most appropriate. He was sorry any inconvenience should be felt in Scotland, but Scotch transactions being in a very small minority, it would have been a great mistake to have adopted the Scotch date in preference to the English.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, that he wished to ask a question with regard to the operation of the Resolution. He understood that all who had paid their insurances on the 25th of March, which was a quarter-day on which insurances were made for the whole year, would, under this Resolution, be entitled to claim from the insurance companies a Return after the 25th of June of the excess of duty which they might have paid. But in a great many instances the duty had been already paid to the Government, which collected its duties quarterly, and therefore might have already reached the hands of the right hon. Gentleman. Would the right hon. Gentleman consent to return the money? He had received letters which informed him that a great many persons were in the habit of paying their insurances three, five, and even seven years in advance; and in one case the writer, a solicitor, said he had several houses, upon which he always paid seven years in advance; that he had so paid £11,600, and that the Government would unjustly keep £43 10s. of his money unless some return were made. His correspondent called that "wholesale robbery."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, with regard to the question of the hon. Gentleman and other similar ones which might arise, he wished to observe that the Government proposed to go on precisely as they had done last year, and if they were to depart from the regulations then made it was quite evident that they would raise a crop of questions not only belonging to the present Session, but, retrospectively, questions which had been settled last year which would involve them in great difficulties. The two proceedings were connected by so many links that they must be regarded as parts of one transaction. No allowance was made last year for payments in advance for more than a year, and he proposed to follow the same course this year. With regard to the other question, he was a little at variance with the hon. Member in his idea of the fact. He was very doubtful whether there were any cases of payments in advance falling in the period of the reduced duty, where the money had already found its way into the hands of the Government. If the hon. Member was as conversant with the practice of insurance companies as to paying their duties as he was with the general bearing of the question of fire insurance, he would find that the payments of duty were mostly considerably in arrears. The money, then, in such cases as he described, would be in the hands of the companies, and would form a matter of account in settling with them. At the same time, if any such cases should occur the Government would be quite willing to deal with them according to their particular merits.

MR. HUBBARD said, he regarded the remission in the Fire Insurance Duty as very gratifying to the House and the country. The hon. Member for Dudley (Mr. Sheridan) was, he thought, rather unreasonable the other evening when he expressed his disappointment at the extent of the reduction. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had taken the Resolution of the House, proposed by the hon. Member himself, as his rule and guide, and had obeyed it literally. There was, therefore, in his opinion, no ground of complaint against the right hon. Gentleman. It was further to be remembered that, taken in connection with the other remissions of taxation, the Chancellor of the Exchequer left himself no margin for a larger reduction of Fire Insurance Duty. From the terms, however, in which he communicated his intention, the House was justified in the certain expectation that before very long the whole of the Fire Insurance Duty would be removed. It had been stated that the lower duty would recoup itself by the impetus it would give to the practice of insuring. He, for one, had never used that argument. He denied the propriety of keeping any duty whatever on Fire Insurance, and he accepted the definition of the tax by the Chancellor of the Exchequer as decisive. The right hon. Gentleman said the duty had been called a tax upon prudence, but he gave a more correct and more telling definition. He described it as a tax upon property with two large exemptions—an exemption to the imprudent and to men of large property. Accepting that definition, he (Mr. Hubbard) regarded a Fire Insurance Duty of 1s., or even of 6d., as too high. There ought to be no duty at all, except a duty of 1d. per cent as a record of the growth of the property coming under that head, it forming an especially interesting branch of domestic economy. The duty on Marine Insurance was very much lighter than it used to be, but it was still in an improper and unsatisfactory condition. The lowest duty was 3d. when the rate did not exceed 10s. premium, but as premium rose the duty rose also. If the premium rose to 50s. the duty rose to 4s. on the value insured. The effect was that, in the worst times of the year, when property was in the most jeopardy, the increased cost of insurance arising out of such circumstances was aggravated from increased duty.

These were taxes on the consumer, and it was the object of wise legislation to diminish, as much as possible, the taxes on imports, which were the fruits of the industry of the country and the means of subsistence of the people. He trusted that at some future period the Chancellor of the Exchequer would make a decisive alteration of the scale of Marine Insurance Duties, so as to take the present minimum rate of 3d. per £100 of the sum insured and make it the invariable duty whatever be the premium paid. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had passed a most useful measure to enable the working classes to insure their lives. There was the same inducement of prudence to insure lives and houses. According to the last tables, a man who began to pay 40s. per annum at the age of twenty-six insured £100 payable to his executors at his death. What would be the effect upon the scheme if a quarter of the sum went as a tax into the Exchequer? It would arrest all action and neutralize the whole of the advantage that was expected from the measure. He maintained that it was the duty of the Government to avoid discouraging the exercise of prudence in any form of insurance, and to reduce the duties on Fire and Marine Insurance to the minimum which he had ventured to suggest.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, he regretted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not seen his way to a more considerable reduction of the Fire Insurance Duty. The objection to such a duty was threefold. It was a tax on prudence, on property of a particular kind that was exposed to risk by fire, and a restraint on a branch of legitimate trade, capital, and enterprise. The tax pressed very heavily on the class of small houses which, if sold, would bring only from ten to fifteen years' purchase, but which were burdened by heavy local imposts in the nature of poor rates, property tax, charges for management, and the risk of loss from failure to pay rent. In the borough he had the honour to represent there was a great variety of opinions upon political subjects, but every man was of the same mind as to the impropriety of this tax, which was a blot upon our financial system. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would, before long, see his way to the entire removal of the tax on fire insurances from our fiscal system.

COLONEL SYKES said, he had understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that duties paid to insurance companies yearly, or in a lump, for several years were only paid into the Exchequer quarterly. Was that so?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the practice was, when a person insured to carry on the fraction of a quarter, if there were one, to the next quarter-day, and generally the policies would run twelve months from that quarter-day. The insurances of the four quarter days were separately dealt with, but were not paid at once into the Exchequer. The companies had a certain time allowed them. Practically, the companies were always a quarter in arrear at the Exchequer; but they paid on each quarter-day for all the yearly policies renewed or effected.

MR. AYRTON said, the wealthier classes of the country were extremely astute in finding reasons to escape from the operation of particular taxes, but he did not find that they were equally on the alert to suggest modes by which other and more equitable taxes might be substituted for those withdrawn, to which they could themselves make an equitable contribution. The Fire Insurance Duty had been denounced upon every moral and political ground, but he had never heard in these debates a suggestion as to how the Chancellor of the Exchequer was to reach the richest classes, to whom the remission would be a great gain. No doubt the attempt to reach property through the medium of the Fire Insurance Duty had been attended with injurious effects; but originally the tax was one of the most constitutional ever imposed. In very early times taxation was placed upon all visible property—not, as some politicians imagined, upon land merely, but on all kinds of visible property. In course of time, no doubt, the land was solely charged, but it was because it was the most obvious source of revenue, visible property of other kinds finding means to escape its proper share of contribution. It was in order to reach the property which thus withdrew itself from taxation, and from being visible became invisible, that the device of a duty upon insurance was first adopted. No better evidence of wealth could be afforded than when a man collected in his house a large amount of unproductive property—not only furnishing his residence sumptuously, but accumulating and surrounding himself with works of art. Manifestly, such a man could well afford to contribute to the public burdens. Some centuries ago a great English financier applied a stringent test to property of this kind, but his agents came to an untimely end. The principle upon which they acted was called "the Dilemma," and their instructions were to examine into the circumstances of every man. If they found anybody spending a great deal, this was accepted as a proof that he had the means of contributing to the necessities of the State; if, on the other hand, a man was sparing in his expenditure, his thriftiness showed that he must have accumulated wealth, and from his store could afford to spare for the service of his Sovereign. That was the principle established by Henry VII., and though it might have been carried to too great an extent, in principle it embodied sound views of taxation. Upon a survey of the Budget of the present Session, he feared the people would scarcely feel that they had got their full share of benefit from the contemplated remissions of taxation, which were boons rather to the property than the industry of the country. Whenever the Chancellor of the Exchequer came next to review the national taxation, it would be well that this view of the subject should not escape his attention. Nothing, he confessed, had given him more pleasure in the Financial Statement than the passages which showed that in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman the conviction was growing that the idea once prevalent, and for which he himself had contended, as to the necessity for abolishing the income tax, was neither sound nor expedient. He plainly intimated that at whatever figure it might be placed for the time, it would be regarded as one of the permanent sources of public revenue; and if it were retained as a great machine of taxation it ought to be kept in the most perfect working order. No doubt, in some of its aspects the income tax was unjust and oppressive, but no tax yet was ever levied to the perfect satisfaction of those who had to pay the money. The income tax was, to his mind, as legitimate a source of revenue as could exist; the hypercritical arguments about unequal adjustment were not to be accepted against it more than against any other source of revenue. He had no doubt if it were understood that the tax was to be permanent, the Government would apply themselves to insuring a more just assessment, and that at no distant day it would be paid with as little reluctance as any other impost. It seemed to him, that it would be the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to bring the unproductive property of the country within the range of the income tax. He protested against its being supposed that there ought to be this desperate run against the taxation of property in favour of taxing the industry of the working classes.

SIR FRANCIS CROSSLEY said, that in order to do what the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) required, it would be necessary to go a step further and compel every one to insure, to get at what he called the unproductive property of the country. He thought it would have been much better if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had reduced the duty to 1s. than to 1s. 6d., and he was inclined to think if that had been done a larger amount of revenue would have been obtained. The sum of 1s. 6d. upon a £100 risk was an enormous duty. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not consider this question settled. He supported the Budget because he considered it was on the whole a good one.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he was at a loss to understand why the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets had called it unproductive property because it was not insured, and so far from its not being taxed, he begged to state that it was taxed both for national and local purposes. Insurance was not a question between rich and poor. If a man's house were burnt down, it was a State loss, inasmuch as the payment, and the security for the payment, of a certain amount of rates and taxes were both lost to the State. The tax upon insurance was no more a tax upon property than a bet on the Derby was a tax upon property. Insurance meant nothing more than this—the owner bet the office 1s. 6d. to £100 that his house would not be burnt down; and the office bet the owner £100 against 1s. 6d. that it would be burnt down; and this wager was repeated every time the insurer paid his money, and the event might never happen. The insurance tax was nothing else than a tax upon this system of betting. Besides it was an event that might not come off for some generations, there being instances of houses still standing that were erected 150 or 200 years ago. It would be impossible to convince the country that this was a tax upon property.

MR. VANSITTART said, he thought that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had lost a grand opportunity of dealing with this tax in a generous manner, by reducing it to 1s. He did not rise to take part in the discussion, because hon. Members on the Opposition Benches had reason to congratulate themselves on having for the last six years not only constantly and persistently supported the hon. Member for Dudley (Mr. Sheridan) in obtaining a reduction of this tax, but also others in calling for a reduction of the income tax, but he rose to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer a question in which his constituents felt much interest—namely, whether or not they were entitled to a return of the amount of premiums paid by them at Christmas and Lady Day last, on the renewal of their policy at the 3s. rate of duty.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, they were not.

CONSTABULARY FORCE (IRELAND) ACT AMENDMENT BILL—[Bill 122.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Robert Peel.)

MR. BAGWELL said, that the effect of the Bill would be entirely to change the allocation of the police force as fixed by the Act 20 & 21 Vict. c. 17. Under that Act the county of Tipperary was allowed 1,030 men, and that number had been found so insufficient to preserve the peace of the county that a further large number had been paid out of the county rates. Notwithstanding that, it was proposed by this Bill to take away from them 246 men. He could not admit that the occurrence of riots in Belfast was a sufficient reason for disturbing the police arrangement ~~now~~ throughout Ireland. It was ~~that~~ all the proposed addition ~~take place in Pro-~~ it had always been ~~and contented.~~ ~~and~~ had now 149 police, and no more had been asked for by the authorities, but the Government were going to give it 219, taking 246 away from the county of Tipperary, which already had to pay extra constables. He should like to know whether the opinion of either the Lord Lieutenant, the high sheriff, or the grand jury had been asked upon the question of that withdrawal.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he had to complain that the police force in Roscommon was to be reduced from 347 to 337 men. There was the less reason for such a change inasmuch as by the Act passed a few years ago the force in that county had been reduced from 437 men to 347; and the county had at present an additional body of fifty men to maintain at its own cost.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he had made a full statement of the provisions of the Bill the other evening. The object of the Bill was to provide for the establishment in Belfast of a police force which would not be under the control of the municipal authorities. Recent events had proved the necessity of such a measure, recommended, as it had been, by the Report of the Commissioners specially appointed to investigate the subject, and he believed it met with general approval. The hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns), who was unable to be present upon that occasion, had assured him that he had no opposition to offer to the Motion for the second reading of the Bill. It was proposed that 130 of the police force already in Ireland should be stationed in Belfast, and of that number fifty-nine would be taken from the county of Antrim, and fourteen from the county of Down; but the fact was, that as Belfast occupied portions of each of these two counties, they already supplied it with those men. The remainder of the 130 men would be taken from various counties; but he had to inform the hon. Member for Limerick and the hon. Member for Clonmel that there would be none removed from Limerick or Tipperary. He hoped the House would then assent to the second reading of the Bill, and they could afterwards consider its details in Committee. He proposed to introduce in the fourth clause an Amendment, which would leave undetermined the number of men to be added to the 130 at Belfast, so that the Lord Lieutenant could exercise a discretion in the matter. He would only further observe, that the present police force in Ireland had been established to meet the requirements of a larger population than that which the country at present contained.

MR. BAGWELL said, that the Government Returns gave the number of policemen in Tipperary at 1,032, while the number was set down in the Bill at 784; and it therefore appeared that there was to be in that case a reduction of 248 men.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that the Bill would only take 130 men from all the Irish counties, and it was manifest therefore that it would not remove 248 men from Tipperary.

LORD JOHN BROWNE said, he believed his hon. Friend the Member for Clonmel must be mistaken in reference to the Return from which he had quoted. It appeared to him that the distribution of the force proposed in the Bill was better than that which at present existed.

Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>, and committed for Thursday next.

MR. CARDWELL said, he should preface with a very few remarks the Bill he now asked permission to introduce. The subject had already been brought more than once under the consideration of the House by different hon. Gentlemen who took an interest in the subject. He thought it would be generally admitted that the position of Colonial Governors was a most responsible one, and that the gentlemen who filled it ought not to be called on to exercise parsimonious savings with a view to make provision for their declining years. It was also one in which the holders had no claim for consecutive employment. According to the rule laid down by Mr. Huskisson, their employment terminated at a given period, it was uncertain and could not always be immediately renewed. It was, therefore, felt desirable that some provision should be made in the nature of a pension for those who had held this particular office. This class presented the single exception to the rule of retiring pensions. Throughout the Civil Service such a provision was made. In the diplomatic service there was the same provision. Even those engaged in the political service of the country had some provision in the shape of pensions. It appeared right, therefore, that some provision should be made for those holding the office of Colonial Governor. But it had been suggested that if made it ought to be at the expense not of this country but of the colonies. Now, the answer he had to make to that statement was this. He fully insisted upon and recognized the principle that the payment of a Colonial Governor properly fell upon the colony, and not on this country. But if the Governor chiefly served the colony, it could not be denied that he did discharge important duties to the Queen, whose representative he was, and to this country. Was it right, then, that, admitting the principle of retiring pensions, these Imperial services should be ignored? It must be recollected that, in point of fact, to throw this particular payment on the colonial resources was only, in other words, denying it altogether. The colonies had not, and could not have, a joint purse. Every colony had a separate treasury, and separate responsibilities, and they could not pension a Colonial Governor from the treasury of one for services rendered in another. Nor could any scale be adopted. The highest salary of a Colonial Governor was £10,000 a year and the lowest £500. There could be no joint purse or scale of contribution, and, therefore, if the payment was just and right, it must be defrayed from the finances of this country. Having established, first, that the charge ought fairly to be incurred, and secondly, that from necessity and justice it must be met by the Treasury of this country, the next question was as to the principle they should adopt in regulating what the pensions should be. It would be evident to the Committee that they should arrive at some principle to be laid down by Act of Parliament, to which the gentlemen who received the pensions might look forward as constituting a regular and established rule. Such a matter should be left as little as possible to the judgment, the interpretation, and, he would even say, the caprice of the Secretary of State. From the nature of the employment it was difficult to lay down those precise rules which referred to the permanent servants of this country. The employment was, for public reasons, temporary, and terminating in each case after a number of years. That rule was laid down by Mr. Huskisson, and had been maintained ever since upon grounds of public policy and utility. The Committee would feel, however, that an endeavour should be made to establish some rules, and not leave a question of this kind to be decided by political considerations. In laying down these rules he thought they must adopt as far as possible an analogy—though not in the precise terms—to the rules relating to the permanent Civil Service of England, and the first rule he would lay down was that every pension should begin to be paid at the age of sixty years. He took that from the Civil Service Superannuation Act. The next rule he proposed was that, as the office could not in principle be considered permanent, a pension should be given to those who had devoted their lives to the service of their country in that particular mode for which the Bill intended to provide. It was thought by the Government that these conditions constituted a quasi-permanent service. In the first instance, if a gentleman had filled three Governments—that was, if he had served for eighteen years, he might be considered to have devoted himself to the service of his country as a Colonial Governor, and as being entitled to a pension. Next, they thought that those practical and valuable public servants who were taken from the permanent Civil Service of this country to fill the office of Colonial Governor should not be excluded from combining the time they had served in the Civil Service with that which they had served as Colonial Governors. Therefore, the second class of persons whom it was thought fair to include within these pensions were those who had served altogether a period of at least twenty-five years, having served ten of these as Colonial Governors. The Government would make provision, thirdly, for those who retired, not from age, but in consequence of ill health. If a person had served fifteen years as Colonial Governor, and then retired from permanent ill health, he should be entitled to a pension, and in this case it was not proposed that the pension should wait until the officer was sixty years of age, but should begin from the time of his retirement. Another class of persons would obtain the benefit of the Bill, and these were gentlemen who, not having served the full period would not be entitled to the whole pension, but would receive a portion of it. This was the case of a person who, after forty years of age, had served for five years as Governor of a colony, or for twenty years as a permanent servant in the Civil Service, but as a Governor. This class would be entitled to a pension of ten per cent.

of the salary, and would include persons retiring from permanent disability after a service of ten years. Then the pension itself would depend upon the salary which the colony gave the Governor. The colonies would be divided into four categories, according to the amount of salary. The first would be colonies where the salary was £5,000 and upwards, where the pension would be £1,000; next, the colonies where the salary was £2,000, where the pension would be £750. The third class would be where the salaries were £1,000, where the pension would be £500. The fourth, where the salaries fell below £1,000, and where the pension would be £250. There would be certain other conditions laid down accompanying the granting of pensions. He would now move a Resolution on which he proposed to find a Bill, in accordance with these propositions.

"That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of the Consolidated Fund of Great Britain and Ireland, of the charge for Retiring Pensions of Colonial Governors."

MR. MARSH said, up to a recent period the Governors of colonies generally received valuable perquisites in addition to their salaries, but these had been all abolished. He thought the time had arrived when pensions ought to be granted to them. Indeed, he wondered it had not been done before.

MR. AYRTON said, the salaries of the Colonial Governors had been fixed at a high standard, because they had not pensions, and he was astonished to find they were now about to receive them. He hoped the proposition did not include India.

MR. CARDWELL said, that the Bill would have no reference to our Indian possessions. It only applied to the colonies in the usual sense of the word.

MR. M'MAHON said, he had to suggest the propriety of postponing the consideration of the proposed measure until next Session, when much might be done in the way of abolishing many of the Colonial Governorships—especially those in the West India Islands—which were utterly useless. He believed the colonies were far better able to provide pensions for their Governors than we were.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would not alarm himself about the magnitude of the expense which the measure would occasion. It would not create such a heavy charge upon the country as would require the consideration of the new Parliament. The hon. Member (Mr. Ayrton) was altogether mistaken in saying that the salaries had been fixed high on the ground that there was no pension. The salaries had been largely reduced in almost every case, and the officers thrown upon the colonies themselves. While the salaries of the Governors were very moderate, they had a great expenditure, and had to maintain a high position as representatives of the Queen. He would now leave the matter entirely in the hands of the House.

MR. VANSITTART said, he believed it to be a mistaken principle to regulate the pensions by the amount of salaries received by the Governors. The promotion of Colonial Governors was the result of interest, and while one man with interest might receive a large salary in a mild and healthy climate, another without the necessary means of obtaining promotion would be sent to spend years in a place like Sierra Leone, which was a perfect Golgotha. He believed that the right hon. Gentleman's predecessor had complained to the House of the difficulty under which he laboured in procuring a Governor for the colony. And yet the salary of the latter Governor might be much less than that of the former. They were, in point of fact, not going to regulate the pensions by the length of time which the Governors had been in the public service, but by the amount they had received as salaries. He might mention, in answer to the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Marsh) that the lieutenant-governors and the Governors in the Indian service were not allowed to trade in any way whatever. They were strictly prohibited from speculating, buying land, taking shares in public companies, or mixing themselves in any public concern, but this was not the case in the colonies, where the Governors, the secretaries, and the clerks oftentimes engaged in speculation. In fixing, therefore, the pension of Colonial Governors, no reference ought to be made to Indian Governors, because they stood on a wholly different footing. He did not say this in disparagement of the claims of our colonial governors, but simply in reply to the observations of his hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury. His sole object in rising was to ask the right hon. Gentleman to reconsider the matter, and to regulate the pensions by the periods of service.

MR. MARSH said, he did not anticipate any heavy charge from this measure. His hon. Friend (Mr. Vansittart) had referred to Sierra Leone, but it was evident that if any Governor remained long in that colony he would not require any pension.

MR. HIBBERT said, he wished to ask what proportion of the payment of the pensions would fall upon the colonists themselves. If not any, he thought the pensions should be regulated according to the amount of salaries paid by this country.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that the salaries of the Colonial Governors were, with very few exceptions, paid by the colonies. But the Colonial Governors were partly servants of the colony and partly of the Imperial Government, and their Imperial duties were as important as their colonial duties. The Government, therefore, thought that the pensions should be paid by the Imperial Government. There were, moreover, difficulties, almost amounting to impossibilities, in the way of charging these pensions upon the colonies, because the Governors were frequently transferred from one colony to another after short periods of service, and it would be found impossible to frame a scheme under which the colonies could be made to contribute to a common fund for the purpose of defraying those pensions.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that as the question before the House related only to the introduction of a measure for giving pensions to Colonial Governors, he would confine himself to expressing the great satisfaction which he felt at the course adopted on this occasion by Her Majesty's Government.

MR. CARDWELL said, he was sure the hon. Member for Windsor (Mr. Vansittart), when he found that his statement with reference to the tendency of the Colonial Governors to speculation was incorrect, would regret that he had made a statement which was calculated to produce a painful impression on those to whom it referred. The hon. Member was mistaken in one point, because he (Mr. Cardwell) had distinctly stated that the pensions would be regulated by the length of service. As to the amount, the usual mode of calculating pensions was with reference to the salary.

ISLE OF MAN DISAFFORESTATION (COMPENSATION) BILL—[Bill 67.]

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Peel)

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that various inhabitants of the island had been wrongfully deprived of their rights. The waste lands were not a forest at all, and they ought to have been dealt with in a manner analogous to the course pursued with regard to inclosures. It had been customary to hold portions of land which were called "intacks," and which were clothed with all the incidents of personal property; but the Commissioners, being all English lawyers, thought that these intacks did not constitute a right, because they were unfenced, and the land was warned back into the forest. Some persons who had obtained an inkling of what was about to take place contrived to secure their rights by running up a slight fence, while others who did not obtain that information were deprived of long established rights. He hoped the Government would allow the whole subject to be fully inquired into, more especially as the parties who claimed this property had no one in the House to represent them. What he had hoped was, that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury would have agreed to refer the whole question to the Select Committee at present sitting on Epping Forest and the open spaces round the metropolis. But, as this had not been done, he should move that the order for the third reading be discharged, and the Bill referred to a Select Committee.

MR. DILLWYN seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the words "That the" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "said Order be Discharged,"—(Mr. Augustus Smith,)

—instead thereof.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. J. C. EWART said, he had also received complaints of possible injustice. He suggested that a clause should be inserted, that if ~~any~~ a re-hearing established it, it should be restored; if done he had no objection to a third reading.

MR. PEELE said, the object of the Bill was simply to enable the Commissioners of Woods and Forests to pay out of the capital of the land revenue a sum of £2,500 towards a fund to which the commoners of the island would contribute an equal amount. That fund was to be applied to compensate parties who claimed to have a portion of the forest allotted to them in severalty, in the event of those claims being found to be well founded at the re-hearing which would take place under the Act lately passed by the Legislature of the Isle of Man.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH asked if this re-hearing would enable the parties to re-establish their claims to the rights of which they had been deprived, or would it only entitle them to compensation?

MR. PEELE said, the claims rejected on the first occasion would be re-heard by one of the Commissioners, and if any of the claims were allowed compensation would be given, not in land—as some of the lands had been sold—but in money. The boundaries of these waste lands had been accurately defined, and a very liberal arrangement had been made as to the rights of the commoners. The hon. Gentleman had made no objection to the disafforestation of these lands, and the feeling in the Isle of Man was in favour of it. He did not think that a Select Committee of that House was the tribunal best fitted to judge of the matter, and he hoped that the hon. Gentleman would not persist in his Motion.

TORIES, ROBBERS, AND RAPPAREES (IRELAND) BILL—[BILL 95.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. HENNESSY said, he would explain the object of the measure. Within the last few months in Ireland one of Her Majesty's Judges, Baron Hughes, had sentenced a man for the offence of vagrancy to seven years' penal servitude. The Judge said that the poor man having been presented by the grand jury under a penal law, and having been convicted of begging, he had no option but to sentence him to penal servitude, and the man was sentenced accordingly. That took place under the 6th of Queen Anne, c. 11, being an Act for the suppression of Tories, Robbers, and Rapparees, and one of the penal laws that is still remaining on the statute book, which he now sought to repeal. The word “Tory” came into our legal phraseology about the reign of William III., but it was of still older date as applied to the Irish Roman Catholics. The usurping assembly which in the time of Oliver Cromwell called itself a Parliament took cognizance of these Tories. In the diary of Mr. Thomas Burton, Member in the Parliaments of Oliver and Richard Cromwell, he found the following record:—

“Wednesday, June 10, 1657.—On the Motion of Mr. Downing for a three years' assessment on Ireland, Major Morgan said—‘We have three beasts to destroy that lay burdens on us—1st is a public Tory, on whose head we lay £200, and £40 upon a private Tory's. 2nd beast is a priest, on whose head we lay £10; if he be eminent, more. 3rd beast, the wolf, on whom we lay £5 a head if a dog; £10 if a bitch.’”

The term Tory was said to be derived from “Tor,” a bush, because in those days there were bush-rangers; but its real origin appeared to be two Irish words, “Tor” and “re,” which were equivalent to the Cavaliers' cry of “Long live the King!” for in the days of Charles I. the Tories fought for that Sovereign. Again, in the reign of Charles II. they were brought under the notice of Parliament. In 1678 the English House of Commons committed the Secretary of State Williamson to the Tower for countersigning commissions to M'Carthy and other Irish Popish Tories. King Charles II. immediately ordered the release of his Secretary, and a serious dispute arose thereon. The King said these Roman Catholic gentlemen were without money and in great want, and that they had fought for him. However, by stopping the supplies the Whig House of Commons compelled the King to cancel the Commissions to these Tories. The first Act of Parliament relating to Tories was passed in the reign of William III., and the preamble of that statute showed that they were political in their origin. It set forth that Tories were concealed, harboured, and countenanced by the inhabitants of Ireland, and that for the purpose of settling the kingdom it was desirable to pass that penal law. The Act went on to say that—

“Any person may be presented by the grand jury as a Tory, and if such person does not render himself to the justices within the county, he shall be proclaimed by the Lord Deputy, or other chief governor of Ireland, and shall thenceforth be convicted of high treason, and suffer accordingly.”

After that statute of William III. came one of Queen Anne, and then the Act which he proposed to repeal, continuing the former Acts. In Committee he would insert an Amendment which would remove an objection taken to the Bill by the hon. and learned Member for Wexford, and prevent any useful provision being repealed.

MR. WHALLEY said, there could be no doubt that under Oliver Cromwell's rule "the condition of Ireland" problem had been to a great degree solved, and that the prosperity of Ireland had attained a wonderful development. At no period had Ireland been more prosperous and happy, and his policy showed the true spirit in which that country should be governed. He hoped, therefore, that it was not without consideration that the Government had consented to the repeal of this Act, which was an ancient relic of that system.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he believed that since the world began there had never been a more cruel Government than that of Cromwell in Ireland. He might refer to the massacres of Drogheda and of Wexford in proof of that statement. Those massacres had hardly ever been paralleled, and the government of Cromwell in Ireland could only be regarded as an unmitigated evil.

MR. BLAKE said, it was not very long since a man had been sentenced to seven years' transportation at the Cork assizes because he happened to call begging at a stipendiary magistrate's. He thanked the hon. Gentleman for moving to repeal this Act, and he hoped some hon. Gentleman would undertake the task of endeavouring to prevent criminal justice being administered in Ireland in the present harsh and oppressive manner.

TURNPIKE TOLLS ABOLITION.—LEAVE.

MR. WHALLEY moved for leave to bring in a Bill to discontinue the taking of tolls on the turnpike roads now existing in England and Wales, and to provide for the maintenance of such roads as public highways, and for the discharge of debts due thereon by voluntary commutation.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, there was not any provision made by the Bill for the payment of the debts due by the roads. The Bill seemed to be one to authorize the discontinuance of the payment of debts. He did not think there was any possibility to frame a Bill that could carry out these objects.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he hoped there would be no objection to the introduction of the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to discontinue the Taking of Toll on the Turnpike Roads now existing in England and Wales, and to provide for the maintenance of such Roads as Public Highways, and for the discharge of the debts due thereon by voluntary commutation, ordered to be brought in by Mr. WHALLEY and Mr. M'MAHON.

THE REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, seeing the noble Earl the President of the Council in his place, I wish to call his attention to a matter of some importance with respect to the Select Committee over which he has lately presided. In the proceedings of that Committee your Lordships will have observed that two divisions taken towards the latter end of the Report were taken on two distinct paragraphs of that Report. On the first of the paragraphs in the draft Report a noble Lord (Lord Taunton) moved an Amendment, which was carried by a narrow majority. Upon the second paragraph the same noble Lord moved another Amendment, which was carried by the same small majority. But in the Report as it appears it would seem that the whole of the two Amendments were consolidated into one, and that they were carried against the first paragraph of the draft Report. If that had been the case it would have made the second paragraph of the Report absurd, because it was in pari materia, and the only difference was as to the manner in which we should express our opinion substantially with regard to the course taken by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. Our opinion was not very different with regard to the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack; but as the Report stands it would appear that the minority appeared to object, which they certainly did not, to the declaration embodied in Lord Taunton's Amendment to the second paragraph, acquitting the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack altogether of being actuated by any unworthy motives in the course he had pursued. We thought the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack had committed an error in judgment, and had taken a wrong view of his duty; but both the minority and the majority were perfectly prepared to acquit him of improper or unworthy motives.

EARL GRANVILLE: I am much obliged to the noble Earl for having mentioned this subject to the House. It struck me this morning, in reading the Report, that the second paragraph, as printed, in casting an imputation upon the noble and learned Lord's conduct, was a mistake. That mistake has been clearly described by the noble Earl. I have been in communication with the Clerk of the Committee who committed the mistake, and who expresses his regret for the error. I am bound to state that the gentleman who acted as clerk discharges his duties with remarkable intelligence; but it was quite natural, from the manner in which the Amendments were put, that this mistake should have occurred. Under the circumstances, I think the best course will be to have the Report corrected and delivered in the amended form on Monday.

THE DEFENCES OF CANADA.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE asked, Whether negotiations were still pending between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Canada on the subject of the defences of Canada; and, if so, whether, after negotiations shall have been concluded, the papers relating to them would be laid before Parliament? The noble Earl said, that when this very important subject was brought at an early period of the Session under the attention of the House, the impression on his mind was that an arrangement had been made between the Government of Canada and that of Her Majesty, by which we were to undertake the erection of certain defensive works, and Canada was to undertake to find men to defend them, and also to contribute something towards the expense of constructing the projected works. It now appeared that that was a wrong impression, and that no such arrangement had been made; for since that discussion a debate on the subject had taken place in the Canadian Assembly, and no resolution was come to with respect to the works; the debate was adjourned, and he understood that two gentlemen from Canada had come over to this country to confer with the Government on the subject of the confederation of the British North American Provinces, and also to enter into arrangements with the Government, if possible, with respect to the defences of Canada. This being the case, it seemed desirable that the Government should make some declaration, not as to the amount of money to be expended on the works, or as to the points where they were to be erected, but as to the principle and basis of the proposed arrangement. From speeches made by the two gentlemen he had referred to, Mr. Galt and Mr. Cartier, and from the declarations made in the Parliament of this country, it appeared that Canada and the British Government were very much of one mind in respect to this matter, and he was of opinion that nothing could be more satisfactory than the tone of the speeches of Mr. Galt and Mr. Cartier, who declared that Canada ought to bear a considerable share of the burdens of her own defences. In such a case he thought that the Government were bound to recognize the obligation of standing by Canada in the event—which he trusted might never happen—of Canada being invaded. Other speeches had been delivered in the Canadian House of Assembly by persons who thought that it was no part of the duty of Canada to take any of those reasonable precautions which had been suggested, and that if war broke out the whole burden should be assumed by the mother country. If it were clearly the desire of the Canadians to remain connected with this country, and to take their fair share in the defence of Canada if it were attacked or invaded, then it would be the duty of this country, undoubtedly, to render them assistance; but if such was not the wish of the Canadian people then it could not be possible for this country to defend Canada; and if it were possible it would clearly not be their duty to burden themselves with the expense of defending a country so devoid of public spirit. He wished that those who were desirous to throw upon the mother country the whole burden of the defence of Canada would profit by the example of a similar case—namely, that of the small but flourishing Kingdom of Belgium. The great Powers of Europe had guaranteed the neutrality of Belgium and had entered into a solemn pledge to assist her in the event of her being invaded. But Belgium did not rely entirely on these guarantees. She maintained an efficient army, respectable in number considering the smallness of her population. She had also expended large sums of money upon the fortifications of Antwerp. She did this, knowing that if she had not an army and fortifications sufficiently strong to stay the progress of an invader in the first instance, it might so happen that the liberties of Belgium might be overthrown before any of the great Powers could come to her assistance. He need hardly say that this argument applied with still greater force to Canada than to Belgium, separated as she was by 3,000 miles of ocean from the mother country, and considering that during a great portion of the year she was inaccessible to the fleet of Great Britain. He should like to be allowed to say a few words as to speeches which from time to time had been delivered in their Lordships' House, proposing to abandon altogether the defence of Canada as hopeless against invasion, and to throw the whole burden of defence upon the Canadians themselves. In a discussion which took place in that House last Session, on the affairs of New Zealand, some noble Lords, not satisfied with telling the colonists of New Zealand that they must not expect aid without submitting to a certain heavy impost, went on to tell their Lordships that Canada could hope for no assistance from this country in case of invasion unless she submitted to an expenditure far beyond her ability. He (the Earl of Airlie) happened at that time to be going to Canada, and actually sailed in the steamer which conveyed the newspapers containing those speeches; he had, therefore, the best opportunity of witnessing the effect produced both in Canada and the United States upon those speeches being read by the populations of both countries. In Canada it was quite clear that the people became disheartened. They said that they were anxious to maintain their connection with Great Britain, but they saw by the language lately held in the House of Lords that the mother country was only anxious for an opportunity to turn them adrift, and was looking out for a reasonable excuse for so doing. The effect in the United States was worse, if that were possible. The reports of those speeches were re-printed in the American newspapers, accompanied with exulting comments, the purport of which was that the time was when England stood by her colonies to the last, but that time had gone by, and that it was quite evident that England would now do anything to avoid war. It was most painful for him to think that the texts for comments of that kind should have been speeches delivered in their Lordships' House. Their Lordships had further learned that speeches had been made elsewhere—he supposed he must not say where—in which people were told that if Canada were to be defended at all the best mode of doing so would be to withdraw the British troops and to seek for some vulnerable point elsewhere to attack the invaders. It was not difficult to foretel the construction which would be put abroad upon speeches of that kind. It would be said that after the withdrawal of the British troops people who were of this opinion would be apt to discover that it would be difficult to reach the vulnerable points of the enemy, and that the best plan would be to leave Canada to its fate. It was not by so fainthearted a policy that this great Empire had been founded, nor did he think that such speeches tended to maintain a friendly understanding with the United States. Now, in reference to the United States, he believed that the Government of that country was sincerely desirous of maintaining friendly relations with us; and he had seen with much satisfaction the address of the new President to Her Majesty's representative at Washington. Nevertheless, we knew very well that there was a party in the United States who avowedly were unfriendly to us; and it appeared to him that the speeches to which he had referred could not fail to have the effect of strengthening the power of that party, and of greatly embarrassing the Government of the United States, however friendly it might wish to be towards this country. In mentioning the United States Government it was impossible not to revert, at least in thought, to him whose career had been cut short by the atrocious crime which had excited such horror and detestation in this country—a sentiment fully reciprocated in Canada, where the Governor General had ordered that the flags should be hoisted half-mast high at all the military stations, and there were general demonstrations of sympathy among the Canadians. In New York the sympathy shown by Canada had been much appreciated, and it was some consolation to find that the sympathies of the whole Anglo-Saxon race were called forth by this melancholy event. He rejoiced at this wide-spread expression of sympathy, not only because as an Englishman he set the highest value upon the friendship and alliance of the United States and thought that war between the two countries would be disastrous, but because he had himself received so much kindness at the hands of Americans, and had seen so much in the national character which was worthy of respect, that he could not but feel a kindly interest in the welfare and happiness of this great people. As to the civil war, terrible as its effects had been, it had drawn out in strong relief the great qualities of individuals on both sides; and it must be a source of heartfelt satisfaction to see that by its means they were likely to see an end of the institution which had been a source of injury to the white race, while it had depressed and degraded the black population. Nobody supposed that the war was undertaken in the first instance for the abolition of slavery, but nobody could doubt that that would be the result of the war. Notwithstanding that great and good man the late President of the United States declared in the earlier period of the war, on more than one occasion, that he had no power under the constitution to interfere with the institution of slavery, yet having, in the first instance, adopted the principle of emancipation, he felt bound in conscience and good faith to adhere to and carry out that principle to the utmost extent. It was not in keeping with the dignity of this country nor the honour of Canada that that great colony should be dependent for its security upon the moderation and forbearance of any foreign Power. This was a favourable time for taking measures for defence, for we could set about it without being liable to the charge of acting under the influence of panic; and he hoped the Canadian delegates, who were now here would, upon their return home, succeed in impressing their countrymen with the absolute necessity of co-operating with this country in the great work of placing the defence of Canada, both with regard to men and works, in a satisfactory position. He desired to ask, Whether negotiations were still pending between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Canada on the subject of the defences of Canada; and, if so, whether, after the negotiations had been concluded, the papers relating to them would be laid before Parliament?

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, he quite agreed with his noble Friend (the Earl of Airlie) in his estimate of the importance of the question to which he had adverted, and it was for that very reason that he hoped his noble Friend would forgive him if he was unable to reply in detail to the questions which he addressed to him. Four members of the Canadian Administration had recently arrived in London for the purpose of consulting with Her Majesty's Government as to various questions connected with the North American Provinces, and especially as to those questions with regard to the defence of Canada which had engaged the attention of Parliament during the present Session. It must be obvious to their Lordships that it was not desirable, at a period when those communications had commenced and were still going on, that Her Majesty's Government should enter into any details with regard to a matter which was still the subject of negotiation. All he could say then was that these negotiations were still going on, and that the representatives of the Canadian Government who had come over to this country appeared to be fully impressed with the magnitude and importance of the question and the duty which lay upon Canada with regard to it. When those negotiations were brought to a close it would be the duty of Her Majesty's Government to take an early opportunity of informing Parliament of the nature of those communications and the results at which they had arrived.

SELECT COMMITTEES.—RESOLUTION.

EARL STANHOPE said, he had a Resolution to move, the object of which was to give to that House some control over the appointment of its own Committees—for at present no such control existed. In the House of Commons a similar want had been felt for many years, but it was at last fully and completely removed. He begged to move —

“That with regard to Select Committees of this House, other than those on Private Bills, Notice of any Motion for naming the Lords to serve on such Committee, or for adding any Lord to such Committee, or for substituting any other Lord for any Lord named on such Committee, shall be given and entered among the printed Notices for the Day or previous to the Day on which such Motion shall be made.”—(The Earl Stanhope.)

Motion agreed to.

CASE OF COLONEL JOHNSON.

OBSERVATIONS.

EARL VANE, in rising to call the attention of the House to the charges brought against Colonel Johnson, a magistrate of the county of Durham, said, that he regretted the absence of the noble Earl (the Earl of Malmesbury) who on a former occasion, in moving for correspondence on the subject of Mr. Dockrall's detention in the lunatic asylum, had, he ventured to say, adopted against Colonel Johnson an ex-parte statement. He was quite sure that no one in such a case would be more ready to retract the charges he had made than his noble Friend. All men were liable to errors of judgment, and he did not mean to say that his friend, Colonel Johnson, had not been guilty of an informality in signing the committal of the late Mr. Dockrall to an asylum without having seen him on that particular occasion. But Colonel Johnson, in order to show how much he regretted that informality, was prepared to indemnify the unfortunate man for what he had done, for he offered a sum of £80, £30 as the costs of the suit which had been undertaken, and £50 for himself. The charge which his noble Friend had brought against Colonel Johnson was this—that he had sent to the lunatic asylum of Sedgfield Mr. Dockrall, a man who was perfectly sane, and who ought never to have been sent to such a place at all. Now, Colonel Johnson had known this man for years; his family were in the habit of dealing with him, and the unfortunate state of Dockrall's mind was notorious, not only to Colonel Johnson but to every individual in the neighbourhood. But the worst part of the charge was founded upon a letter from the father of the man—namely, that Colonel Johnson had entered into a conspiracy with the wife of Dockrall, who was a bad woman, in order to keep him in prison. He knew Colonel Johnson to be an honourable man, and a magistrate of thirty years' standing, and their Lordships must agree that he was much aggrieved by the stigma cast upon him. At the last Quarter Sessions for Durham he (Earl Vane) moved a resolution, which was carried by the whole Bench, affirming that, however much the Bench might regret the informality which Colonel Johnson had committed, they were satisfied that he was only actuated by the kindest motives towards the unfortunate man.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he would merely observe that, as there was a pending action yet undisposed of against Colonel Johnson, he must wait until that was decided before he could take notice of the matter.

LORD RAVENSWORTH said, that having been acquainted with Colonel Johnson for forty years, he would affirm that he was a most honourable man both in his private and magisterial capacity, and he must express his belief that he had been actuated in this matter by the best and purest motives. He trusted that when the pending action should be disposed of the Lord Chancellor would consent to lay the correspondence before their Lordships, in order to clear the character of Colonel Johnson.

LORD CHELMSFORD thought that his noble and learned Friend must be under some misapprehension in regard to the action said to be still pending. If he understood aright, an action of tort had been brought against Colonel Johnson—an action to recover damages. Such an action, however, died with the person, and could not be revived by the executors, and as this unfortunate man was dead, there could be no pending action at the present moment.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that in certain cases the representatives of the deceased would be entitled to revive the action for recovering the expenses. He was informed that a suit was now pending in the Court of Probate to determine to whom letters of administration should be granted. If they were granted to the father, the action might be revived. At present, therefore, he did not think it proper to take any proceedings to investigate the charges against Colonel Johnson.

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

WORKHOUSE NURSES.—QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS said, he rose to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether it is the intention of the Government to adopt the suggestions contained in the evidence given before the

Select Committee on Poor Relief, respecting the employment of trained and competent nurses in workhouses; whether it is intended to carry out the recommendation embodied in the Report, that quinine and other expensive medicines should be provided, when required, by the guardians; and whether the Articles of the Consolidated Order now in force respecting the voluntary visitation of the sick poor present any practical obstacle to those who may desire to visit the inmates of union workhouses?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS, in reply, said, he believed the evidence to which the hon. Member referred was that of a lady, Miss Twining, who appeared as a witness before the Poor Law Committee. She referred to the great want of improvement in the system of proper nurses for the sick poor in the workhouses of London, and stated that in most of these workhouses there was no such attendance at all. Now, he found that this was an overstatement of the case. The Metropolitan Poor Law Inspector had always urged the guardians to employ competent persons as nurses for the sick, and the fact was that upon inquiry, which he (Mr. C. P. Villiers) had directed in consequence of this evidence, he found that there were no less than ninety-three paid nurses in the different houses in London, and that out of the thirty-nine workhouses there were only eight without them. There was, however, great reason to doubt whether they were efficient for the purpose for which they were employed, and there was no doubt a great difficulty in proving who were competent persons; but, in consequence of communications lately received at the Poor Law Board from Miss Nightingale, who superintended establishments for the purpose of properly training nurses, and who was now taking much interest in the state of these houses, there was every reason to suppose that well qualified persons could be obtained, and in number equal to the demand for them, should the guardians be willing to engage them. The Poor Law Board had already issued a Circular to the guardians of all Unions and Parishes in London urging them to employ such persons, together with proper assistants, and it was to be hoped that they would now exercise their discretion in doing so. With respect to the supply of expensive medicines, such as quinine, &c., which the hon. Member inquired about, the Poor Law Board had issued a Circular to all the unions in England and Wales on this subject, suggesting the propriety of their making arrangements with their medical officers forthwith for this purpose, and he was glad to say that many unions and Parishes in the Metropolis did supply those medicines and found no difficulty in doing so. With respect to the third question, he would read the Article to which the hon. Member referred, by which he would see what was allowed in this matter—

“Article 118. Any person may visit any pauper in the workhouse, by permission of the master, or, in his absence, of the matron, subject to such conditions and restrictions as the guardians may prescribe.”

Under this Article the guardians might permit the visit of any person for any lawful purpose, to any sick pauper; this Article also allowed any pauper in the workhouse to receive the visit of a stranger, subject to such restrictions as the guardians might think fit to impose. The Poor Law Board imposed neither restrictions nor conditions, and therefore the rules and regulations of the Poor Law Board presented no obstacles to those who might desire to visit the inmates of workhouses.

THE ZOLLVEREIN.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the reduced Tariff on British goods in Prussia and the Zollverein will come into operation on the 1st July next?

MR. LAYARD said, in reply, that in consequence of the Treaties between France, Prussia, and the Zollverein States a considerable reduction would take place in the Zollverein Tariff; that reduction would extend to all countries, England included; and that would be the case whether the treaty between this country and the Zollverein should be concluded before the 1st of July or not. He hoped, however, that would be the case.

ENDOWMENTS FOR EDUCATION— MINUTE OF COUNCIL.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, that in laying a Minute of the Council of Education upon the table of the House, it might be convenient if he made a short explanatory statement. The House was aware that at the time when the Revised Code was passed, no change was made with respect to endowments. The result was that if an endowment did not provide more than 30s. a head upon the average attendance of the children in the school, no deduction was made from the annual grant. It was consequently found that in many cases payments in excess of the actual expenditure of schools to the extent of 20s. or 25s.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he rose to order. He wished to know whether it was competent for the right hon. Gentleman to make a statement when the papers had only just been laid upon the table of the House.

MR. SPEAKER said, there was nothing out of order in the course which the right hon. Gentleman was pursuing. He was moving that the Minute be laid upon the table. He understood that the right hon. Gentleman purposed to make a statement not of a nature to invite discussion at present, but calculated rather to furnish the House with information which might be available for a future occasion.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that he also rose to order. He was aware that the right hon. Gentleman had fairly enough given notice on the previous evening of the course which he intended to pursue, and that notice was, no doubt, recorded in the newspapers, but it was impossible for them to obtain their information from the newspapers. When he heard of the intentions of the right hon. Gentleman, he looked upon the Votes without being able to discover any notice of the course which the right hon. Gentleman proposed to adopt. He thought it very desirable that explanations should be given, but he submitted, at the same time, that it was not desirable that statements should be made without there being any opportunity afforded for answer or debate.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, he had no desire to enter into any explanation contrary to the wish of the House, but if he did not do so, the only course which remained open to him was to lay the Minute on the table of the House without any explanation whatever, and to leave to some other hon. Member the task of raising a debate upon it at some other time. He had adopted the course which he was now pursuing because he was informed by the authorities that it was not competent for him to place the notice upon the Orders of the Day. If it was not the wish of the House that he should proceed with his statement, he had no desire to do so. His only object was to give to the House that information which was often not sufficiently afforded by the Minutes themselves. By the present Minute it was proposed to extend to all schools that concession which was made by the Minute of March, 1864, to rural schools alone. A rural school was defined to be a school—

COLONEL FRENCH said, he rose to order. He objected to the right hon. Gentleman making any statement, as no notice had been placed upon the Votes. The right hon. Gentleman, by the course he had adopted, was anticipating other Motions which were coming on that evening.

MR. SPEAKER said, the fact that the paper was laid upon the table of the House by command caused a distinction as to the necessity of giving notice. The right hon. Gentleman, however, had said that he had no desire to proceed with his statement if it were contrary to the wish of the House.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, he wished to know, if the right hon. Gentleman proceeded with the statement, whether it would be competent to raise a debate in reply to the information given.

MR. SPEAKER said, that if the right hon. Gentleman concluded with a Motion that the papers should lie upon the table of the House the subject would be open for debate.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, that he had no desire to proceed with his statement unless such a course were unanimously approved by the House. He should, therefore, content himself with laying the Minute upon the table.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read:—

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

SCIENCE AND ART COLLECTIONS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GREGORY said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the condition into which our science and art collections had fallen. He thought no occasion could be more appropriate than the present to endeavour to rescue these collections of art and science from the chaos and confusion in which they had been so long involved, and that the present time was well suited for arriving at some final decision with regard to the future management of these collections. They were near the end of their days, they were in the placid humour which gilds the autumn of life, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had exhibited a goodly balance, no political conflict was impending, but they might be engaged next year in some party questions, which would altogether preclude their dealing satisfactorily with this subject. He must say that nothing could be more illogical or more irrational than the manner in which we had hitherto treated these collections. He could perfectly well understand a Government arriving at the determination to have nothing more to do with those works, to disperse the pictures in the National Gallery to sell the treasures contained in the British Museum and expel Mr. Cole from Kensington to wander through the world with his own circulating collections. No doubt such a course would be profitable, because there was not a petty State throughout Europe which would not undergo considerable sacrifices in order to purchase and worthily to house portions of those inestimable treasures of art so unaccountably neglected by ourselves. Personally he should regret exceedingly the adoption of such a course, but it would be at least logical. We took, however, quite a different course. We had been excavating the great plains of Assyria; we were ransacking the tombs of Rhodes; we transport the Mausoleum bodily to Bloomsbury; Professor Owen buys fossil caves in block, and birds, beasts, and insects come trooping into the Museum just as we see them in old pictures marching into Noah's Ark. Sir Charles Eastlake was going abroad every year to buy beautiful pictures, which were hung where nobody could see them; Mr. Robinson and Mr. Cole were annually purchasing objects of art, which, in many instances, were stowed away in places of Cimmerian darkness, more adapted to the vision of owls and bats than to the optics of creatures accustomed to daylight. Our galleries had now become mere accumulations of objects, without order, system, or classification, and in many respects without even light. Whose fault was this? The Government would, no doubt, lay the fault upon the House of Commons; but, for his own part, he would not scruple to say that the fault in a great measure was that of the Government, and he would proceed to prove his statement. Every now and then the Government undoubtedly did make a spasmodic effort to do something with these collections, but so unpopular and injudicious had been their proposals—as in the case of the Exhibition Building at Kensington—that the suspicions of the country were always aroused hanging pictures, and in the Royal Academy there were 750 feet, making a total of 1,700 linear feet. At this moment the nation owned 750 pictures, and according to the calculations of those who had charge of large collections, three feet of linear space was the average space required for each picture. There was, therefore, a deficiency in our available space of 500 linear feet, even if we had the whole building in our hands. He was told that the Turner pictures, if properly exhibited, would take up the whole space occupied by the Royal Academy. The annual average increase in the number of our pictures was thirty-five, requiring about 100 linear feet, and in the course of seven years we should require a space nearly equal to the Royal Academy, if only for our accessions. The right hon. Gentleman, therefore, had taken a wise course in buying up the ground in the rear, and he trusted he would bring forward a Vote to commence building immediately, taking in the ground occupied by Dukes Court; otherwise, considering the time which would be necessary, the eyes would grow dim, and the faculties of Gentlemen present would fail them before they saw the pictures of the nation properly housed. He thought the Royal Academy ought to have due notice. As far as his own wishes and feelings were concerned he was sorry to see the Royal Academy separated from the National Gallery, but, as that was to be, he hoped the Government would deal with the Royal Academy in a liberal spirit. The Commission of last year had borne witness to the valuable services which the Royal Academy, since its institution in 1768, had conferred on the country, and Sir Robert Peel and Earl Russell had also expressed their opinions that it was to that body that the foundation of a National School of Painting was in a great degree owing. He had no adverse criticism to make upon the management of the National Gallery. The Government had done wisely in putting it into the hands of the ablest man in England—Sir Charles Eastlake—and he was glad the trustees had the good sense to work harmoniously with him. It was owing to the standard which Sir Charles had set up that we had from small beginnings, in a few years, acquired a National Gallery which, as far as Italian art was concerned, was as instructive and as varied as any collection in the world. He felt proud of this noble collection, and proud that we had in Sir Charles Eastlake an Englishman with whose taste and knowledge of Italian art hardly any foreigner professed to vie; but he felt humiliated when he saw the condition in which these pictures were—different schools mixed up with different schools, and various epochs thrust together without order and without sequence solely from want of room. It was perfectly astonishing to foreigners when they remembered at what a large cost of money many of these grand works of art were obtained, they came to the conclusion that the English mind was unable to appreciate the advantage and the increased interest conferred by a proper system of classification and exhibition. One of them once said to him, "You English seem to have enormous appetites, but very little digestion." As to the lamentable condition of the British Museum, he had so often brought it before the House that he was afraid to trespass again on its patience. It was enough to say that the whole system of arrangement was as bad as bad could be, and that the system of administration was even worse than the arrangement. He did not speak of the library department, which was an honour to the country and to the energy and genius of Mr. Panizzi; but as to the other departments, hon. Members need only go there to have the most conclusive evidence of their own eyes. On entering, the visitor was struck with the curious penthouse in which were crowded and hidden from view the marbles of the Mausoleum, of Branchide, of Cyrene, and other interesting objects of art. If you went upstairs to the Mammalia Room, you might see the heads and tails of certain animals, but he defied any one to see the bodies. If you went into the insect room, you would be glad to get out of it, so dark, dingy, and stuffy was it; and if you asked to see a specimen, ten to one but you would be told that it was shut up in a box for want of space to exhibit it. These were not, however, his chief complaints. What he did remonstrate against was the improper arrangement of the great department of antiquities which was far and away the most extensive, complete, and instructive in the world. If there was one thing into which of late years ideas of reform have entered more than another, it was in the conception of what a proper museum ought to be. Formerly a museum was a kind of strange old curiosity shop in which curious odds and ends were collected and arranged without any definite object. But now all this was changed. The object, besides amusement, and far more than

descension, would not refuse her assent to that arrangement if it should be the wish of the House of Commons. Then, as to the drawings of the ancient masters now in the British Museum, he thought nothing could be more monstrous than the present system. The finished pictures of the great masters were in the National Gallery; but if any one wanted to study the earliest ideas and modes of drawing of those great men, which was more essential to a young artist than almost anything else, he would have to proceed to a confined room in Bloomsbury, and there turn over folios of drawings to be enabled to make the comparison he desired to make. There were at this moment at Bloomsbury drawings of pictures which were to be found in the National Gallery, so that a student had to carry in his mind the efforts of the pencil to compare them with the finished effects of the brush—a necessity that did not occur in any other country in Europe. Their removal was part of the recommendation of the Committee of 1860. They would require very little room, as excessive light would be rather injurious to them than otherwise. He then came to the modern pictures at Kensington, and he thought, when they were about to provide a new National Gallery, some decision should be come to with respect to those pictures. He believed that it would be most unwise, as well as most invidious, to admit the pictures of living painters into the National Gallery at Trafalgar Square. It would be unwise, because it would create an enormous pressure upon the space of the Gallery from the numerous presents that would be made. It would be unwise, because it might happen that some living artists might be more than duly represented as regarded the history of art in all ages and all countries, and because many pictures might obtain a temporary reputation which the judgment of posterity would not ratify. An invidious task of rejecting pictures would also be imposed upon the Director of the National Gallery, which ought not to be imposed upon any one. He found a confirmation of the views which he entertained upon the subject in the 11th Report of the Science and Art Department, in which Mr. Redgrave said—

“The practice followed in France might afford a suggestion towards the solution of these difficulties here. The works of the great living masters were placed in the Luxembourg, where they remained until time and death and the judgment of posterity entitled them to removal to the Louvre.”

An arrangement might be adopted to keep at Kensington all works of modern painting which may be acquired by the nation. After the death of the painter selections from his works might be made and transferred to the National Gallery. There was another point to which he must refer, although he was aware that it was not within the right hon. Gentleman's Department. He referred to the number of duplicates of works of art in our possession in the National Gallery. As an instance, he might refer to the well-known picture, by Leslie, of “Uncle Toby and the Widow Waddell,” of which there were three or four reproductions. There were National Galleries in Dublin and Edinburgh, and as Scotland and Ireland had contributed freely and graciously to the national collections, he thought that those specimens of art which were not wanted in London might be transferred to the galleries of those cities. The same remark would apply to duplicates in the British Museum and the South Kensington Museum. Then, as to the National Portrait Gallery, he thought that also should be transferred to Trafalgar Square, although he was aware that the pictures in that collection had not been selected upon principles of art. Still, there would be an advantage in placing that collection under the same roof as the National Gallery, and the Resolution by which it was constituted distinctly affirmed it was to have its place there. On the 4th of March, 1856, Lord Stanhope moved an Address—

“That Her Majesty would be graciously pleased to take into Her Royal consideration, in connection with the site of the present National Gallery, the practicability and expediency of forming by degrees a gallery of Original Portraits, such Portraits to consist, as far as possible, of those persons who are most honourably commemorated in British History as warriors or as Statesmen, or in Arts, in Literature, or in Science.”—[8 Hansard, col. 1780.]

And they had been annually voting, ever since, £500 on the strength of that future connection. There were other questions of a gallery for objects upon loan for first-rate copies of pictures which never could be purchased, and for other purposes, upon which he should not enter. There was one point upon which he desired to lay stress. He found that an opinion prevailed that if the Royal Academy was turned out from the present building, there would be ample space to house the national collections. But it was easy to show by figures that this was not so. In the National Gallery there were 950 linear feet of wall space adapted for

Evidently they were written by a gentleman who had the whole subject at his fingers' ends. He gave chapter, verse, and figure for every department and every sub-department in the great collection. He showed that there was ample space where the Museum was at present, and that for a very small outlay space could be provided for these various collections. He ventured to say that if hon. Gentlemen read those letters they would say that those who had opposed the separation had not got the worst of it in argument. Having occupied so much time he would defer his observations with respect to Kensington Museum to a future day. He was perfectly aware that the subjects he had brought forward were subjects every one of which would require an evening to itself, if it was to be properly discussed, and he was equally aware that he was obnoxious to the reproof that these questions might have been raised upon the Estimates; but they knew how haphazard the estimates were, and how impossible it was for Gentlemen who took the greatest interest in questions connected with the Estimates to be present at the proper time to discuss them. He did not wish to approach the subject in a fault-finding disposition, but only to urge the Government to do something in the matter. He had, therefore, brought this question forward in detail, being most anxious to forestall the action of the Government, and he was convinced that if the Government would only incline a little to public opinion and a little to the opinion of the House of Commons, they would find Parliament disposed to act with every generosity towards them in their endeavour to redeem our national collections from the state in which they were—a state which was a discredit and a reproach to the wealth, the character, and the intellectual eminence of England.

MR. COWPER said, he was glad to find that the hon. Member who had just spoken had taken a comprehensive survey of the principles upon which our national collections of art and natural history should be dealt with. He trusted the question would now meet with the earnest attention of the House, and that the tendency to witticisms and levity which had so often characterized the discussion of the subject would be laid aside, and that the House would assist the Government in their endeavour to give ample accommodation to our art collections. He was sure the House would adequately and fully represent the feelings of the country in so doing. The fact that no less than 11,000 persons visited the British Museum and 10,000 the National Gallery in a single day showed how popular those institutions were with the lower classes, besides instancing the good effects they had had in inducing a just appreciation of art among the people. The hon. Member had described in glowing but not in exaggerated language the deplorable state to which those collections were reduced for want of sufficient space for their accommodation. The hon. Member had truly described those collections as worthy of any reasonable expenditure, and no one would grudge the money necessary for their accommodation, it should be remembered that England possessed the two greatest works of art in existence in sculpture and in painting—namely, the Elgin Marbles and the Cartoons of Raphael. But the hon. Member, while lamenting that so much time had been lost in providing suitable accommodation for those collections, had adopted the old cry and the vulgar error of laying the whole blame upon the Government. As to the delay that had arisen from the rejection of the proposal of the Government last year, his hon. Friend had expressed the opinion that in that instance they were right. But the real reason for the delay was that two alternatives on behalf of which a good deal might be said had been under consideration for many years, with regard to both the National Gallery and the British Museum. The first proposition was to improve and enlarge the existing buildings, and the second to erect new buildings on different sites. The advantages of the latter alternative in the case of the National Gallery were justly obvious. The present National Gallery having been built twenty-five years ago, at a time when the best arrangement for the exhibition of pictures was not understood, was a very inferior building for the purpose to which it was applied. It was very inferior to any building that an architect would erect for the purpose at the present day. When compared with the exhibition buildings at South Kensington in 1862, with the exhibition buildings at Manchester or Dublin, every one must admit that the rooms of the present National Gallery were very inferior. He was one of those who were desirous of seeing the national pictures exhibited in rooms erected in the best possible manner for their being classified and seen. Of late so much experience had been gained in the method of building picture galleries, and so much scientific knowledge had been brought to bear upon the subject, that if they were now to build a new gallery they would get rooms which would amply accommodate any number of visitors—even the 10,000 which had been crammed and crowded together at the National Gallery on one holiday—and at the same time permit of that quiet and repose round certain pictures which was so essential to the enjoyment of works of art, while every room would be properly lighted and a means afforded of classifying the different schools. Those were the advantages offered by the alternative of building a new National Gallery, and he was sure that a building offering accommodation such as he had described would meet with general approbation. It had also been contended that the present building might be turned to better account if they applied it to some other purpose. On the other hand, it was said people were accustomed to it; many had acquired a fondness for it, and could not bear the idea of the pictures being removed. Others were anxious that the national building which contained our pictures should remain in the most prominent site of the metropolis, in the lingering and doubtful hope that if it remained in the hands of the Government it might ultimately be pulled down and a new one erected in its place worthy of a site which had been called the finest in Europe, and which was, at all events, the finest in the metropolis. A suspicion was afloat that some advantage was to be conferred upon the Royal Academy by the proposed change, and many Members did not appreciate the services rendered by the Royal Academy by means of the annual exhibition and of their schools. The popular taste was directed to the modern pictures rather than to the ancient ones, and it was obvious that that great exhibition of modern paintings was the greatest encouragement to art in the present day as well as a great gratification to all who were interested in art. He was not aware that the Royal Academy would have much to choose between remaining where they were and erecting a new building for their exhibitions, but he knew that whenever they did erect a new building they would take care to have galleries containing rooms where the pictures could be much better seen than at present. That was the only way in which the Royal Academy would benefit. The hon. Gentleman said that the real fault in the scheme proposed by the Government was that they had called upon the House to go to the expense of £17,000 in converting a useless hall into an excellent gallery. But it seemed to him that the fact of their having improved the building was no reason why they should permanently employ it for the purpose to which it was now put, although, no doubt, that expenditure would have been taken into consideration in the pecuniary arrangements connected with the transfer of the building. He denied that the Government had committed themselves in 1860 “for evermore” to use the building as a National Gallery. That was never intended to be a binding arrangement, precluding the Government from re-considering the matter. The delay in providing accommodation for the national pictures had arisen in a great measure from the change of opinion and vacillation of the Gentlemen who had sat in Committees or on Commissions appointed to take the matter into consideration upon the two alternatives which presented themselves, and until last year no decision whatever had been come to on the subject. When the House came to a decision on the subject, those who had the management of affairs would be glad to know in what direction the opinion lay. Though he still thought it would be a desirable thing to build a new Gallery on that new site, he was so anxious to make progress that he adopted the other alternative, and was prepared to make the best of the building in Trafalgar Square, taking care that all additions should be built with as much perfection and completeness as the state of science on the subject would allow. Fortunately the space in the rear of the National Gallery was very well adapted to the purposes intended. It was ample in extent, and if large additions were hereafter required for collections other than those now in the hands of the trustees there would be no difficulty in finding space for them. He quite agreed with his hon. Friend that it would be a desirable thing if the Cartoons of Raffaele could be placed in the National Gallery. These Cartoons were the property of Her Majesty, who had graciously allowed them to be exhibited to the public in a fire-proof room at South Kensington, as part of that loan collection which was attracting so many visitors. At Hampton Court they were in a room very far from being fire-proof—there being a great deal of woodwork in the walls, which was not put in modern buildings, and there being many residences in the Palace, whence arose those risks of fire which they were most unwilling to see in the neighbourhood of such priceless works of art as the Raffaele Cartoons. He ought to have mentioned, with reference to the adaptation of the space in the rear of the National Gallery for its extension, that it possessed this advantage, that being secluded from public view the architect would not be subjected to the temptation of sacrificing the convenient and best distribution of his interior to external symmetry and impressiveness, and the building might be erected there with greater economy than if it were in a greater thoroughfare. His hon. Friend then proceeded to deal with the British Museum, in which it was not his province to follow him. Those immediately connected with that establishment were better qualified to reply to that part of his speech. He would only say this, that he did not agree in the observations made with respect to the alterations in the mode of classification. He had in his office a plan prepared for a building that would adequately exhibit those objects which the trustees of the British Museum in their resolution of 1852 wished to be removed elsewhere. That decision of the trustees had been the starting point of the subsequent measures, and the plan referred to would adequately carry it into effect.

MR. WALPOLE: The concluding portion of the statement of the right hon. Gentleman has, I confess, rather alarmed me. I had hoped that the declaration of the Government would have been more definite and clear as to what they intend shall be done. Some months ago I presented to the House a petition from the trustees. All the difficulties were stated in it. The petition stood over simply and solely that the Government might take the subject into serious consideration, and my right hon. Friend concludes without informing us what the Government would do, or whether the opinion of the House should be taken on that which would be the basis of all future proceedings—namely, the continuance of the collections together, or their separation. Unless the opinion of the House be taken on that point, I foresee that sufficient accommodation will not be provided. The hon. Member for

Galway (Mr. Gregory) commented with very great freedom on the state of the British Museum and the management of that great institution. As to the state of the British Museum, I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman. The collection is so extensive—so much is added to it from year to year, and the space is so inadequate, that it is not creditable to the country that the magnificent collection contained in the Museum should remain in the state in which it now is. But he must forgive me for saying that when he attributes that state of things to the want of management in the Museum he casts censure on the trustees which they do not deserve at his hands. The trustees were bound to add to the collections if they wished to make them worthy of this great nation. They were added to in order to bring the collections into that state of perfection and completeness adverted to by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Cowper). For nearly fifteen years the trustees have urged upon the Government the necessity for additional accommodation, and since no effective response has been made to that application they are not to be blamed for the present inconvenient mode in which the collections are exhibited. But when I say this, let it not be supposed that I cast off the blame he throws on the trustees in order to fasten it on the Government. I am not going to do any such thing. I know the difficulties the Government have in dealing with the subject. But we have arrived at that point where I think the Government may and—I might venture to add—ought to take the matter in hand, and the sooner they do so—my firm belief is—the better they will settle the question. I do not believe any Session will be more convenient for bringing the matter forward. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is aware of everything that has taken place from the commencement with regard to the different applications which have been made to the Government on the subject. Nobody took a more active part both in and out of office in regard to it. Nobody takes a deeper interest—nobody is better qualified to take that interest and to advise the House as to what should be done. The difficulty this Session has certainly not been the want of funds—the want of a surplus—but, unfortunately, for some reason we remain where we were ten years ago, although the collections of natural history and antiquities are extending so rapidly, that unless increased accommodation is provided they must be closed to the public. It is very well known that I was one of those trustees who thought it would be better to keep together the magnificent collections you have got, provided you could find space enough for them; and this could have been accomplished by purchasing the whole buildings around the Museum. If that had been done, I say, without the slightest hesitation, doubt, or distrust, no country in the world either has, or ever will have, such a magnificent collection of art, literature, and natural history as would then be brought together on the same spot for the use of those who wish to study. One way in which that might have been done—and it might be done now, without any great expense to the public—would be to purchase the whole of the buildings around the Museum, to pay for the purchase at once, but not to pull down the houses except to the extent and according as you want the space to provide increased accommodation. In this way you would have the rents of the remaining houses to discharge the interest of the purchase-money, and you might gradually add to your buildings as your collections required increased accommodation. The expense, no doubt, in the end would amount to a considerable sum, but it would be spread over a number of years, so that the pressure would be comparatively slight. There are two courses open for the Government and the House to take. The one is to keep the collections together where they are now; the other to draw a clear line between the two sets of collections, between the objects of antiquity and those of natural history and then to remove these latter objects to some other place. This would be a most intelligible line to draw, and if it be thought, for the purpose of better management, and also on considerations of economy, that such a division would be better than the other course—namely, that of having all the collections together, then I would ask the Government to lay that alternative before the House by a proposition, and let it be decided upon once for all. In that case the trustees and the Government should take active and immediate steps for having the opinion of the House carried out. If they did not, a great deal of blame and responsibility would fairly and justly rest upon them. But some decision must be come to in this House, and, depend upon it, if you do not come to a decision now you will only be postponing the difficulty from year to year and making it still greater. I would urge upon the House to decide whether they will keep the collections together or provide separate accommodation for them. A plan should be submitted, and the sense of the House taken upon it, and having determined which course we shall take let us abide by it, and then take care that no time is lost hereafter. Not a day, at least not a year, should be allowed to pass before accommodation is provided for these collections in a manner suitable to their great value, and creditable to the country which has the good fortune to possess them. I thought on behalf of the trustees I should say this much in reply to the censure which my hon. Friend passed upon them. No doubt their position is a difficult one, and the want of accommodation presses upon them on every side, and they find it impossible to provide for the collections. It was due also that I should venture earnestly and respectfully to press upon the Government, some of whom are our Colleagues, that no time should be lost in coming to a decision upon the subject. The trustees cannot stir until the Government do decide; and when that decision is come to I hope the House will take care to see that it is ratified, and that the plan, whatever it may be, shall be immediately carried into effect.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he gathered from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cowper) that he contemplated the erection of some temporary building at the back of the building in Trafalgar Square. [MR. COWPER: Not temporary.] He did not understand it to be, strictly speaking, a temporary building, but he understood him to say that they should make the best of the buildings they now possessed, with the view hereafter that these buildings might be taken down and something better put in their place. He maintained that this was in reality making a temporary arrangement. We were a great deal too fond in this country of erecting temporary buildings, or "make-shifts," and we spent immense sums of money very unwisely in that way. If all that the country spent in make-shifts had been applied to the erection of one building they would have had one that was both useful and handsome. A well-considered plan should be proposed for a handsome building which would be a permanent structure for all time. The National Gallery was so unsatisfactory that it ought to be pulled down as soon as possible, and a really good building erected in its place. Everybody knew that the portico of the National Gallery was nothing more than a cast-off portico of Carlton House. The building was really erected for the portico. The great fault of the National Gallery was that it was not high enough. Hon. Gentlemen took of its being on the finest site in the world, but they could never have a handsome building if they had not height, which was a necessary element of beauty and magnificence. That was a feature in architecture which we did not understand in this country. We erected low buildings and expected them to produce a great effect. While height added much to beauty it also contributed greatly to convenience. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) had spoken of enlarging the British Museum by purchasing the buildings adjacent to it. That might be an exceedingly desirable, but it was a very expensive mode. Space in the air cost nothing, and why should they not raise the Museum two or three stories higher? The same plan would apply to the National Gallery. If it was raised sufficiently high, the building would accommodate three times the quantity of things that it does now, and it would then really have a fine effect. At present, to a person going up Parliament Street, the building was almost hidden by the Nelson column and the spray from the fountains. And when they got near it it looked as though they could throw a stone over it. If a really good plan were submitted to the House, he was sure they would not grudge the money for the erection of a handsome building. To provide accommodation piecemeal would be throwing the money away, and the country would never be satisfied if a proper building should not be erected. The House should take a lesson from Paris upon this subject. If they could not carry out a good plan in one year, let them take three years.

MR. TITE said, he did not think the Government were to blame with reference to the National Gallery, as they had proposed a scheme last year to remove it to Piccadilly, which had his humble approval, but which received the support of only a minority of that House. He thought it would have been much better to erect a new building wherein they could make efficient arrangements and avoid all the difficulties and inconveniences that now existed. The House, however, had determined otherwise, and they preferred the situation of Trafalgar Square for the National Gallery. While we had the finest collections in the world, we had the worst arrangements for their accommodation. He thought, as the House had determined the National Gallery should remain on the present site, they ought not to grudge the money for improving it as far as possible. The collections in the British Museum were the finest but the worst arranged in the world. He did not think they ought to be divided, nor was it necessary. He could not entirely concur with the plan of Professor Owen. He ventured to think land could be obtained adjacent to the present site, and that it was unnecessary to go elsewhere, and this would be a great advantage to the public. The question, however, turned upon whether the House would agree to divide the collections or not. The House alone could decide that question. He believed the advantages in favour of keeping them together were predominant, and, if sufficient accommodation could be found in the neighbourhood, that plan would be, he thought, more economical and desirable than any other which could be adopted. If the House were of opinion that it would be well to have a separate building for the collections of antiquity, proper buildings could easily be erected for the purpose of accommodating them. With regard to the National Gallery, the Government might submit plans and estimates for a new building, and he had no doubt the House would make a good selection. The whole question was one which admitted of an easy solution.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Before, Sir, you pass to another subject I will say a few words especially in answer to the appeal of my right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Walpole). First, however, I must refer to the speech of my hon. Friend (Mr. Gregory) who brought forward this Motion, and whose speech resolved itself into a Bill of indictment against Governments generally and the present Government in particular. According to him everything is wrong about the British Museum and the National Gallery. The Government have always adhered to unpopular plans and rejected popular ones; and the unpopular plans have always been those of the Government and the popular ones those of my hon.

Friend. It is one of the duties of a Government to endure such pelting as this with patience, and therefore I will take patiently those kind offices which the hon. Gentleman has bestowed upon us to-night. The last thing that I should think of would be to retaliate upon him and insinuate that he has himself introduced into this matter elements of division, confusion, and delay. It is not, however, fair to say that the Government have been slow to respond to the wishes of the House of Commons. What are the questions which have been raised? Originally, when my noble Friend now at the head of the Government (Viscount Palmerston) was at the head of another Administration he proposed to transfer the National Gallery to South Kensington. That step had, if I mistake not, been recommended by a Committee of this House, presided over by Colonel Mure, who reported in favour of a site being obtained at Kensington. A vote of this House afterwards showed its disinclination to adopt that plan, and it was at once abandoned by the Government. Then the Government proposed to purchase the buildings at South Kensington as well as the land—I do not speak of the land now—with a view to the speediest and amplest accommodation of the national collections which they proposed to remove from the British Museum. The House rejected that proposal, and it was at once frankly, absolutely, and finally abandoned by the Government. Then the Government proposed, with reference to the National Gallery, with a view to the immense advantage of one complete and comprehensive plan, and one great structure for the accommodation of the national pictures, that we should start afresh upon the magnificent site of Burlington House, and make a complete National Gallery worthy of the country and of the collection. Again the House differed from the Government, and the Government never dreamed of recurring to that plan. What have the Government done in which they have not deferred to the wishes of the House? The hon. Gentleman says that they have not deferred to the wishes of the House because they have not extended the British Museum upon its present site; but such a wish has never been expressed by the House. [Mr. GREGORY: The division upon the Bill of 1862 for the transfer of the collections.] That turned upon an entirely different matter—a question as to the government of the Museum, and had nothing to do with the question of removal. And what happened in 1863, when we proposed to purchase the land at Kensington for the purpose of accommodating the natural history collections? [Mr. GREGORY: That was not stated.] Several objects were mentioned, the accommodation of the Patent Museum, the National Portrait Gallery, and others, but my noble Friend at the head of the Government distinctly stated that the main reason for purchasing that land was the provision of full and ample accommodation for the natural history collections in the British Museum, and that vote so explained by my noble Friend was carried by an overwhelming majority. The presumption arising out of that is, that when the House voted the purchase of the land they intended that the Government should follow up the purchase by the erection of buildings. Therefore, in every case in which the House has expressed a wish the Government has deferred to it. We have never set ourselves against the desires of the House. My hon. Friend has returned to the subject of the extension of the Museum upon the existing site. In dealing with that question we had to consider, first, what amount of additional accommodation was required; and secondly, what was the price per acre of the land that it would be necessary to purchase in order to give that accommodation. Professor Owen, the highest authority whom we could consult upon every subject of natural science, and the person who is immediately responsible for the natural history collections of the Museum, stated that a space of eight acres would be required for the full accommodation of those collections, and he supported that statement by reference to what had been done or was doing by foreign countries in which large natural history collections existed, and where the amplest and wisest measures had been taken for their accommodation. The next thing that took place was, that a Committee of the trustees inquired into the cost of land around the British Museum and they found—I speak from memory only—that its price was £50,000 per acre. We have now obtained a site at South Kensington, the cost of which per acre was only £7,000. Now, as we are specially responsible for the proposals which have been made to the House of Commons upon this subject, I must say that although this country ought to be liberal with regard to the provision which it makes for the national collections, still, especially considering the great jealousy entertained by many of the expenditure of large sums upon the metropolis, it would have been wrong to have purchased the space required at a price of £50,000 per acre when we could obtain a site in an eligible situation for £7,000 per acre. That has received provisional sanction by the vote of this House for the purchase of the land at Kensington in 1863, upon a statement distinctly setting forth that the accommodation of these collections was one of the main purposes for which it was to be acquired. If there be those who say that the House of Commons did not give that vote with a view to placing the natural history collections upon that land, I should like to know for what purpose did the House agree to purchase these seven acres; and I should like my hon. Friend in the next ingenious and able speech which he makes upon this subject to put a construction upon that vote which shall not convict the House of Commons of insanity, and shall at the same time show that it did not contemplate the removal of the natural history collections to Kensington. I now come to the appeal made by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole), and I can assure him that if he felt any alarm with reference to this subject, that alarm was entirely groundless. There was not a word which he said upon the subject of the duties of the Government to which we do not entirely subscribe; but if the correspondence has not proceeded at the rate of an express train in the 19th century it has not been entirely our fault. My right hon. Friend knows that at present the Government are proceeding in the matter in concert with the trustees of the British Museum, and it is impossible for them to propose a vote until a plan has been decided upon, which they can submit to the House, and according to which it is intended the buildings shall be erected. It was impossible for the Government to choose a plan without obtaining the opinion of the trustees, and this difficulty has arisen, that while the persons who were selected to pronounce upon the comparative merits of the designs gave their judgment in favour of Plan No. 1, the trustees of the Museum stated that having reference to some internal conditions Plan No. 2 was, in their judgment, more convenient. That being so, it was the duty of the Government to invite further communication with the trustees, in order to see whether the great architectural merits of Plan No. 1 could not be combined with the convenience of internal arrangements of Plan No. 2; and it was necessary that these communications should be brought to a close before the Government was justified in placing a proposal upon the table of the House. There has been no delay on our part. I quite admit that it is the duty of the Government to make a proposal to the House, in fulfilment of what they believe to be the proper and natural construction of the vote which was arrived at by the House in 1863. That is the course which the Government propose to take, and hon. Members will thus be afforded an opportunity of arriving at some decisive judgment upon the matter. I fully concur—setting aside all question of who is to blame—in the view that the present state of things is unsatisfactory and little creditable, and that it is the duty of the Government to labour with all the energy which they can command for the purpose of placing things on a better footing.

MR. AYRTON said, he rose for the purpose of taking exception to the explanation which had been offered to the House by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in seeking to acquit the Government of the responsibility which devolved upon them for the present position of affairs in reference both to the National Gallery and the British Museum. So far as he could recollect there was considerable vacillation of opinion in regard to the National Gallery anterior to the time when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks (Mr. Disraeli) as Chancellor of the Exchequer, announced to the House that his Government had come to a deliberate conclusion on the subject. The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gladstone) would probably remember that when that announcement was made it was received with unanimous approbation, he might almost say with acclamation, by hon. Members on both sides of the House. And what was the nature of the announcement? That the long-pending negotiations—they ought rather to be called intrigues—for the purpose of removing the National Gallery to Kensington would be brought to a close; that the Government were determined to disconnect themselves altogether from the Kensington party; that the National Gallery would be devoted to its original object, and that some arrangement would be made for the benefit of the Royal Academy. That being so, the present Government acceded to office, and the subject was again brought under the notice of the House in 1860. The noble Lord at the head of the Government then stated that he had deliberately arrived at the same conclusion as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks; that he believed it was the general wish of the House that the National Gallery should be appropriated to the purpose for which it was originally designed, and that a new habitation should be found for the Royal Academy. On the faith of that statement it was that the House had voted a sum of money for altering the National Gallery in such a manner that it might conveniently be adapted to the exhibition of the whole of the national pictures. Notwithstanding, however, that the Government must in 1860 have been convinced that it was the wish of the House of Commons that that scheme should be carried out, they deferred taking any steps with that object, and at last came down to the House to ask it to reverse its decision. Was it not clear, then, that the Government were responsible for the vacillation which had taken place upon the subject? But the House, instead of reversing, adhered to its decision, and he should now like to know what steps had since been taken by the Government in the matter. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was entirely silent as to whether the requisite arrangements had been made with the Royal Academy for the purpose of enabling them to remove their pictures from the National Gallery. Was the right hon. Gentleman not, then, he would ask, fairly open to the remarks which had been made by his hon. Friend the Member for Galway, with reference to the National Gallery? The same observation might be made with regard to the British Museum. In speaking of the British Museum the right hon. Gentleman relied upon the authority of Professor Owen, but he seemed to have forgotten that the question of the exhibition of the natural history collection had been very carefully considered by a Committee of the House, which was presided over by the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Tite). The opinions of Professor Owen had been controverted by several very eminent men who had been examined before that Committee, and the result arrived at was, that we were not to have eight acres of natural history, embracing every variety of stuffed whales, and all sorts of animals, but that it would be better to have a more limited exhibition of types of animals which avoiding minute details impossible for any one but a highly-educated natural historian to comprehend, would present to the public a general view of the whole scope of natural history. But, notwithstanding the Report of the Committee to that effect, the Government still persevered in pressing their own scheme upon the House, which, however, rejected by a large majority the proposal for a natural history exhibition extending over eight acres. And what was the effect of that decision? To bring the House back to the question which had been raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole)—namely, the practicability of exhibiting all that was necessary of the natural history collection in a much more limited space in the immediate precincts of the British Museum itself. He, for one, could not admit that the decision at which the House had arrived to purchase land at Kensington was tantamount to an adoption of a scheme to which they objected; it was simply the expression of a desire on their part to avail themselves of an excellent bargain by means of which they would secure for £7,000 a piece of land for which at some future period they might expect to get £20,000. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Subject to contract.] Subject to contract! Yes, but the contract had no real existence; it was purely fanciful, and the very Commissioners who were said to have made it had recognized the doctrine that the land might be appropriated to the purposes of science and art by selling it and applying the proceeds of the sale to that object. The House, therefore, might deal with that land as it pleased, provided the money realized by it was ultimately made available in the direction which he had just mentioned. That being so, he must protest against the doctrine of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the purchase of the land irretrievably bound the House to an eight acre exhibition. That was a question which was still entirely open for the consideration of the House, and he felt quite satisfied that, whenever the matter came fairly before them, it could be shown that not only the most convenient but the most economical course to adopt for the exhibition of the natural history collection was that suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge—that was to say, not sweeping away the houses until the space was actually required; but buying from the ground landlord the land in the neighbourhood of the British Museum, extending the limits of the Museum as the necessity for such extension arose, and keeping the houses on the property for the benefit of the rental which they would afford. There was a vast open garden space behind those houses, which would admit of the required extension for many years to come, and when that space was exhausted the houses might be pulled down. Under these circumstances, it was, he thought, desirable that it should be understood that the House had reserved to itself full authority to deal with the matter, and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had fallen into a grave error in the supposition which he had made.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, that in 1852 the Government and the people were directly at issue with regard to the removal of the National Gallery. The Government endeavoured to drag all the public exhibitions and buildings down to Kensington, but the House succeeded in keeping them where they were. When Colonel Mure's Committee was appointed in 1852 not one hon. Member whose views were in favour of keeping the National Gallery in Trafalgar Square was allowed to serve upon it. He declined, therefore, to be bound by the decision of a tribunal against which at the time of its nomination he protested as being unfairly constituted. The right hon. Gentleman said they accepted the Report of that Committee as the best exponent of public opinion. How, then, was it consistent for the Government to introduce a Bill, as they were about to do, for severing the collection of the British Museum, a proposal directly in opposition to part of the Report of that Committee. He shared the regret already expressed that the Government in this matter had not formed some comprehensive plan and acted upon it. It was especially to be regretted that the right hon. Gentleman, who was a distinguished patron of art, justly celebrated for his taste, had not applied himself to the mastery of the whole subject a few years ago, when a decision by him would have been attended with very great advantage. Bearing in mind how London was spreading in every direction, the Government, as it appeared to him, ought to fix upon some central position such as that lying at the bend of the river between those two magnificent edifices St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey, and say, "Here we will cluster our finest buildings." Depend upon it if this were done the neighbourhood would soon assume a worthy appearance. Dealing, as they were, with 3,000,000 people, he believed that commercially, socially, and politically, it would be of great advantage to have some central point at which the vast population could meet daily. To us this would be like the Agora at Athens, or the Forum at Rome, and no other site that he knew of was so well suited for the purpose as Trafalgar Square. The land between that and Westminster belonged almost entirely to the Crown. Instead of pursuing the course which had been adopted with regard to Government buildings he would have carried out the noble design of Inigo Jones for the re-building the Palace at Whitehall. He never would allow any portion of the Crown property to be sold or devoted to any purposes inconsistent with these public improvements. Instead of hankering after Kensington, and proposing to drag the National Gallery or the British Museum all the way there, a central site like Trafalgar Square should have been chosen, and then gradually they might have worked up to it. Charing Cross was the natural point for a great bridge to be thrown across the river. On that point he remembered speaking to the late Mr. Barry, who said he would not have a common bridge between two such cities as those lying to the north and south of the Thames, but a Broadway of width proportionate to the immense population clustered on either bank. Regard being had to the Thames Embankment and other great works which were going forward in connection with it, he appealed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as a man of taste, not to overlook the enormous advantages derivable from the proximity of great edifices to one another, and the consequent advantages of the Trafalgar Square site. For like reasons, he deeply regretted the decision which had been arrived at as to the new Law Courts, which was mainly owing, he believed, to the fact that the lawyers did not wish to walk across the Strand with their wigs and gowns on. But of this he was quite sure, that in purchasing the seven acres of land at Kensington the House never supposed that they were entering into such a contract as that which the Chancellor of the Exchequer declared they had sanctioned. Unless he was much misinformed, it was the Chancellor of the Exchequer who had prevented the growth of the natural history collection in the British Museum, since 1852, on the ground that if it were improved in its present position the House would never consent to anything upon a grand scale being sanctioned down at Kensington. He was told that the Chancellor of the Exchequer when asked for money on behalf of the collection always said, "If we grant it, the public won't assent to a great expenditure at Kensington. Don't improve it, but let the public year by year feel how necessary it is to do something on a great scale." [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Totally groundless.] He was glad to receive that assurance. But how was it, then, that the natural history collection had not been allowed to receive proper development? Professor Owen had told him that the question of site was altogether a secondary one in his eyes, and that the collection could be improved in its present position. What he objected to was the wasting of ten or twelve years of his life, which he would gladly have devoted to the making of this collection. A building quite adequate for the purpose might, he (Mr. Seymour) believed, be constructed at comparatively little cost at the site where the British Museum now stood, and if the adjoining houses had to be purchased the value of the ground would not be as great as that at Kensington. He could not understand the limited views which the First Commissioner of Works had always held as regarded Trafalgar Square and the space proposed to be taken in its vicinity. The First Commissioner of Works said he was coming to the House for powers to take the land on which St. Martin's Workhouse and the barracks stood for the National Gallery, but it was to be regretted his scheme did not include further improvements for giving a better communication between Leicester Square and the Strand. It would be much better to set inquiries on foot as to whether the large space behind the National Gallery to the top of Leicester Square could not be turned to advantage for the purpose. If the Government bought the land requisite, he believed an estimate for the works requisite to open up a great line of communication with Regent Street might be obtained from some of the public companies, by cooperation with whom and the Metropolitan Board of Works plans adding greatly to the beauty of the metropolis might be carried out at no very great expense.

IRELAND—MILITARY OCCUPATION OF THE CURRAGH.—QUESTION.

LORD NAAS said, that considerable interest was felt in Ireland with regard to this matter. It was doubtless well known that the Curragh, which was a large open space many miles in extent, had been used from time immemorial by the public for various purposes, sometimes military, sometimes agricultural or pastoral. A large portion of it also had been used for the racing. It was impossible to define exactly the rights of the Crown over this extensive plain; in fact, he believed that hardly any Member would venture to offer a confident opinion upon the subject. In years past the Crown seemed to have the power to give charters to certain individuals as to liberty of pasturage. Other rights had doubtless been exercised by the Crown; and of late years rights had been exercised to a considerable extent in the way of granting leases for small portions of the Curragh for various purposes. A notable instance of this had occurred lately in the plain having been taken possession of by Government for a camp and for rifle ranges in connection with it. They would find, on the other hand, that there were extensive public rights in connection with the Curragh; that rights of pasturage were claimed by certain corporate towns in Ireland; that in some Acts of Parliament the Curragh was described as a common; and that almost within his own recollection the county of Kildare appointed an officer—a Conservator of the Curragh—whose duty it was to see that no encroachments were committed. It had also been asserted by lawyers that the public possessed the right of traversing any portion of the Curragh on horseback and on foot. Some time since some women were summoned for trespassing on the Curragh, but the magistrates refused to convict on the ground that the charge could not be maintained unless the prosecution proved an ownership in the soil. A stipendiary magistrate, acting upon the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown, did subsequently, he believed, commit some of these people. The question was, however, re-considered; and it was generally held by those competent to give an opinion on the matter, that the magistrate had no right to send those persons to prison at all. He mentioned this circumstance merely for the purpose of showing how doubtful were the rights claimed by the Crown, and how desirable it was that the disputed points should be determined before any definite steps were taken with reference to the Curragh. If the rights of the Crown were to be defined by legislation, he thought that it should be preceded by inquiry, in which the public on the one hand, and the Government on the other, would have a full opportunity of stating their views. He understood that the military authorities complained of the great inconvenience resulting from the doubtful nature of their right to exercise the powers of police for the proper maintenance of discipline and order in the camp, and that it was partly with a view to remedy this grievance that the Government proposed to take the steps they intended. If the public really possessed any rights over the Curragh, those rights had undoubtedly been materially interfered with by the establishment of the camp. One-third of the Curragh was occupied by the camp and the ranges, and there could be no doubt that certain rights both of highway and pasturage were obliterated altogether. Some years ago he was informed that a Royal Commission was to have been issued upon this subject, but he could never discover that any steps had been taken in that direction. He would now ask whether it was intended to lease the whole or only a portion of the Curragh; if so, on what terms and conditions, and to whom that lease was to be granted; and whether the War or any other Department would have the right of selling or otherwise disposing of any portion of the Curragh, for other than public purposes. He wished also to know whether it was intended to propose any legislation on the subject during the present Session?

MR. PEEL said, that since June, 1854, the Curragh had been used as the site of a large encampment. The numbers were to be limited to 10,000, but they had not always been so. The Curragh was Crown property, subject of course to those common rights referred to by the noble Lord. It was decided, after some communication between the late Lord Herbert when at the head of the War Department and the Office of Woods and Forests to lease the Crown rights to the War Department for the term of twenty-one years, subject to termination, if deemed advisable, at the end of seven or fourteen years. It was not intended to introduce any Bill during the present Session; in fact, no Bill was required to authorize the Commissioners of Woods to lease the Crown rights over the Curragh to the War Department. As the War Department might find it necessary to erect buildings of considerable size and importance during their lease, they had asked for a right of purchase if they should find it necessary, and the arrangement upon this point was to the effect that the War Department should ascertain the value of the fee simple of the property, paying to the Crown one-half after deducting any preliminary expenses which might have been incurred, and that they should take any steps which might be found necessary afterwards for obtaining an Act of Parliament to ascertain, define, and extinguish the rights of common. With regard to the terms of the lease, the Commissioners of Woods had received from the War Department to the present time for the occupation of the Curragh and for the right of taking gravel for military roads, and for letting ground to booth-holders, £170 a year, and they had in addition to pay £350 a year to the Ranger of the Curragh, making together £520. The War Department would, therefore, during the continuance of this lease, have to pay every year the sum of £520. It was proposed that the gentleman who had acted for many years as Ranger should retire upon a pension equal to his salary, and that the office of Ranger should remain in abeyance while the lease lasted, as it was found that the exercise of the duties of his office was inconsistent with the rights of the War Department as lessees of the Crown.

LORD NAAS wished to know if the whole of the Curragh was included in the lease?

MR. PEEL said, that it was, subject to the rights possessed by the Turf Club for racing and other purposes. The lease had, of course, been made subject also to such rights of commoners and others as might be found to exist. All that would be leased would be the Crown rights, whatever those rights might be.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that when the camp at the Curragh was formed the Government said there would be no infringement of the rights of the commoners, but he had always apprehended an interference with those rights. He had from the first objected to the course adopted by the Crown in reference to this matter, because the Crown possessed no rights whatever upon the Curragh. He believed that a more atrocious invasion of public property had never been heard of. There used to be 30,000 sheep, the property of the people of the neighbourhood, kept on that plain; but the number had been reduced more than 20,000, and no compensation was allowed to these persons for the loss of their privileges. In England the Government purchased at a great expense the ground for Aldershot camp; but in Ireland they went and occupied land for a similar object in a most violent and outrageous manner. The Curragh belonged to the Irish people, and the Crown had no right or power to dispose of it. He hoped to be able to get up a subscription for the purpose of trying the question of right against the Crown. The Turf Club and the gentlemen of Kildare had acted supinely in the matter, but he trusted they would now bestir themselves in order to have the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench on the subject. The lease which the Government were secretly arranging was a most unpopular as well as most unwarrantable proceeding, and he would do his best to resist it.

LORD DUNKELLIN said, he was not so anxious as his hon. and gallant Friend to go to law about the matter, but he had no conception that such a cool and deliberate scheme of spoliation as that apparently contemplated by the Government would have entered their heads. It was a matter of notoriety for years past that the Government had a faulty title to this land. But the affair was much worse than he thought, and he was glad it had been brought before the House. They had no right to transfer the land to the War Department, yet they proposed not only to do that, but to make permanent erections upon the Curragh. The camp there was a nuisance and an eyesore, and yet it was sought to perpetuate it. There was no knowing where all that would end. The Curragh was a place of national renown, and ought not to be cut up and destroyed. The bargain which the Government were about to make was not only illegal, but would be most obnoxious to the whole country. Barely 12,000 sheep were allowed to feed where there used to be 30,000, and the office of the ranger was to be put in abeyance. It was most essential that there should be an officer like the ranger to look after the Curragh and make such regulations as were required for the convenience of the community resorting to it. He earnestly hoped that Government would re-consider the matter before coming to a final determination upon it.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he did not think it desirable to continue the discussion. He thought the Government from what had taken place must be convinced that it ought to pause before embarking on the illegal course which they were contemplating. He denied that the Crown had any right whatever to these lands, and maintained that there ought to be a full and fair public inquiry, with a view to the protection of the public interests, before the proposed lease was entered into. What was complained of had arisen in consequence of Irish interests not being understood by any one connected with the Government.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that he viewed that as another instance of the great inconvenience which had arisen since the passing of the Act 14 & 15 Vict., owing to the distinction between Crown and public property, and also of the aggressive spirit shown by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests in encroaching upon what might be deemed public rights. The respective rights of the public and the Crown ought to be ascertained in regard to that property, and he regretted that the noble Lord (Lord Naas) had not proposed the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the subject.

WRITS REGISTRATION(SCOTLAND)BILL.

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [27th April], "That the Bill be now read a second time;" and which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Edward Craufurd.)

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. CARNEGIE said, he understood that the learned Lord Advocate had consented to hold a meeting of the Scottish Members to consider this Bill, and that it was not therefore the intention of the hon. and learned Member for the Ayr burghs (Mr. Craufurd) to persevere with the Amendment which he had moved on the second reading.

SIR JAMES FERGUSON said, he wished to know whether the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Greenock (Mr. Dunlop) upon the same subject, and which the majority of Members from Scotland believed to be a better Bill than that of the Lord Advocate, was to be read a second time, so that the two Bills might be considered together. If that were not done, it would be under a great disadvantage as compared with the rival measure.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he understood that his hon. and learned Friend who moved the Amendment did not intend to divide on the second reading of the Bill, with the understanding that there should be a meeting of Scotch Members to consider the measure after the second reading. Beyond that no undertaking had been made by him (the Lord Advocate), and he intended to carry the Bill this Session if possible. The Scotch Members would meet to discuss, and not to decide upon the provisions of the Bill, and every Member would be perfectly free to take what course he might think proper. With regard to the Bill of the hon. Member for Greenock, he had given no pledge whatever, and it was his present intention to oppose it.

MR. DUNLOP said, he approved of the course which was proposed to be taken. His object in introducing his Bill was, that the whole question should be considered by a Select Committee. He had no desire that the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend should be rejected, but he held himself free to take what course he might think best.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he would adopt the course which had been taken on the understanding that the Bill would be brought before the meeting of Scotch Members and that he would be at liberty to reserve to himself the right of action when the Bill next came before the House.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

IRELAND—THE DUBLIN EXHIBITION.

RESOLUTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he rose to move—

"That this House has heard with regret that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland has approved of a programme of music for the opening of the Dublin Exhibition from which all Irish music has been excluded."

The Lord Lieutenant, in approving of this programme, had deviated from well-established precedents. A former Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (the Earl of Eglinton) opened the Exhibition at Cork in 1852, and approved of a programme, in which there was an Exhibition Ode written by an Irishman, and set to music by an Irishman. On other occasions he had devoted much attention to Irish music. The Earl of Eglinton was a popular Lord Lieutenant, and what he did was worthy of the attention of Lord Wodehouse, if he wished to study how to gain the heart of the Irish people. Lord Eglinton, on the same day, attended a concert at which Irish melodies were performed. In 1853, at the opening of the Dublin Exhibition, an Exhibition march was performed, composed by Dr. Stewart, which was afterwards repeated in the presence of the Queen and the Prince Consort. However, as there were not many Members present, he would postpone his Motion until Monday evening—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at a quarter after Eight o'clock till Monday next.

LEONARD EDMUNDS ESQ.—RESIGNA- TION OF CERTAIN OFFICES.

RESOLUTIONS.

LORD REDESDALE: My Lords, your Lordships will probably have all seen, and perhaps read, the Report of the Committee that was appointed to inquire into the retirement of Mr. Edmunds. A censure is passed in that Report upon the Committee to whom the petition of Mr. Edmunds for a pension was referred. On behalf of myself and the other Members of the Committee, I cannot allow the matter to remain without bringing it under the notice of your Lordships' House. I beg, therefore, to give notice that tomorrow, I will, at the request of the Committee, call the attention of the House to that portion of the Report which states the opinion of the Committee as to the conduct of the Select Committee on the Office of Clerk of Parliaments, and I shall move that the passage of the Report in page 14, beginning "The Committee have examined, &c.," and ending "not have been recommended," be read, and also will then move the following Resolutions:—

"1. That the petition of Mr. Edmunds stating that after having served the House Seventeen years as Reading Clerk and Clerk of the Private Committees he desired to retire, and praying the House to grant him such allowance as to their Lordships may seem fit, having been presented on Tuesday, the 14th of February, by the Lord Chancellor, without any Comment being made thereon by him or any other Member of the Government present on that occasion, and referred to the Select Committee on the Office of the Clerk of the Parliaments without any special Order or Instruction in relation thereto, that Committee, when they met on Thursday, the 16th of February, (Mr. Edmund's Resignation having been already accepted by the House), had no Question to determine on the Petition so referred to them but the amount of retiring Pension to which he was entitled, and would have exceeded their Duty if, without special Instruction from the House, they had proceeded to inquire into his Conduct in any Matter unconnected with his Duties in this House.

"2. That the Report having been presented on Friday, the 17th of February, was Ordered to be laid on the Table, and was not agreed to until Friday, the 24th of February, whereby sufficient 'Delay was interposed before the Question was finally disposed of in favour of the Pension' for any Lord acquainted with Circumstances, which ought to have been known to the House before the Report was adopted, to have brought the same under the Consideration of the House."

In doing this I wish it to be distinctly understood that I have no wish and do not intend to enter the least into the Edmunds case, or into any of the facts affecting any one either in this House or elsewhere; but simply to clear the Select Committee from that which is felt to be a reflection on them. The expressions in the Report seem to have caused an impression on the part of newspapers and in other quarters which renders it necessary the Committee should show that the course which they pursued on the occasion referred to was the only one they could, with propriety, have adopted.

STRIKES AND LOCK-OUTS.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD ST. LEONARDS rose to call the attention of the House to the subject of strikes and lock-outs. In doing so, he would, in conclusion, lay on the table a Bill to establish equitable Councils of Conciliation to adjust disputes between masters and men. He believed it to be the wish both of masters and men that some such course should be taken; but, for himself, he could not say that he had any great hopes that any measure for settling disputes by arbitration would ever meet so much approbation as to work well in practice. In those disputes which led to strikes, the men, he was sorry to say, like all other parties to a dispute, were too apt to think they were always in the right. If ever a case of strike might have been expected to be settled by arbitration it was that which had taken place in Staffordshire, where the arbitrator, Lord Lichfield, was neither a master nor a workman, but the lord-lieutenant of the county, and who entered so heartily and warmly into the matter, both as affecting the interests of the masters and men, with a view to their reconciliation. But the strike still continued in the north of Staffordshire. The men would not yield the slightest of their original demands. Nobody denied the right of the men to strike. If conducted without intimidation, a strike was perfectly legal. But it was a reproach to our age that through the operation of strikes on the one hand, and of lock-outs on the other, great branches of our national industry should be as completely suspended as if suddenly paralyzed by the hand of Providence. The operatives of this country, with all their intelligence, did not seem to estimate their own just position. They were in a kind of partnership in the business in which they were employed, in which they found the labour, while the capitalists found the money, and generally the knowledge necessary for carrying on the common business. When the workmen suspended the application of the capital which was theirs—their labour—the capital of the employer—his money—was laid up in a state of forced idleness, and great loss and mischief to both parties was the result. Instead, however, of acting in harmony, the two parties were often arrayed in hostility to each other. The men in one district struck work to enforce their own views upon the masters, and the operatives of other districts remained at work and supported those who were out on strike. That system, if carried out, threatened the utter destruction of capital, because as soon as one master was destroyed another was attacked, and each was unable to offer effectual resistance to these attacks in detail. The masters, in self-defence, resorted to what was called a lock-out, for they saw that ruin would overtake them all individually in rotation unless they united to resist demands which would render it impossible for them to carry on their concerns. He was anxious that, if possible, so lamentable a state of things should be put an end to. He was satisfied that no attempt could be wisely made to regulate wages by law, and the area over which legislation could operate in this matter was very limited. If anything could be done in that direction at all, it must be by bringing the masters and the operatives into friendly communication, and inducing both to consider together what was for their common benefit. In this way strikes may be avoided. No legislation can put an end to an actual strike. A strike is war, and victory alone can end it. In France Courts of Conciliation for dealing with the differences arising between masters and men had existed since 1806. Originally there was a Council, and also a sub-committee, or bureau de conciliation. Before that sub-committee every single dispute between master and man was taken; and if they could not settle it the matter was then taken before the Council. When the Revolution of 1848 broke out a great change in the system occurred, for then the masters and the men were put upon an equality, and a vast number of operatives being introduced into the Council, the scheme failed. Then came the plan now in operation, which placed the matter on a very different footing. The president and vice-president of the court were nominated by the Emperor, and a more restricted qualification was required both from the masters and the men who were to be electors. The masters were required to be patentés, and the workmen to be twenty-five years of age, to have been workmen for five years, and to have resided in a particular district for three years. The qualifications for a seat in the Council were thirty years of age, the capacity to read and write, and the qualification of an elector. There was great authority for the establishment of Courts of Conciliation, for three different

Select Committees of the House of Commons had at different periods reported in favour of such a measure. Yet it was singular that there were enactments already on our statute books which admitted of arbitration in matters of dispute between masters and operatives, but very few persons seemed to be aware of them, and they had almost entirely ceased to have operation. The 5 Geo. IV. c. 96, was still law, and under it arbitration might be resorted to on the subjects of dispute between masters and workmen in any trade or manufacture in Great Britain or Ireland: disagreements respecting the price to be paid for work done or in the course of being done, whether such disputes respected the payment of wages as agreed upon, or the hours of work as agreed upon, &c.; disputes arising out of or touching the particular trade or manufacture, or contracts relative thereto, which could not be otherwise adjusted. But the arbitrators were not to establish a rate of wages or price of labour or workmanship at which the workman should in future be paid unless with the mutual consent of both master and workman. The principal reasons why this measure had ceased to have an operative effect were, he believed, these:—The Act required that the parties should go before a magistrate, and this the men very much disliked; because, first, that it looked as if they were criminals; secondly, that the magistrates were, in many instances, connected with the employers of labour; and thirdly, that an arbitrator had to be appointed in every particular instance. A Bill on this subject was brought into Parliament consequent upon the Report of a Select Committee. That Bill passed the House of Commons and came up to their Lordships' House, and he (Lord St. Leonards) was induced to take charge of it; it was not accurately framed, but he corrected it to the best of his ability. He found, however, that it met with the entire disapprobation of both sides of the House; but from the kindness shown to him by both sides of the House after he had taken so much trouble in the matter, it was allowed to be read a second time, and was referred to a Select Committee, when it met with equal opposition, and as the Session was far advanced was not further proceeded with. He now brought forward the Bill once more, in consequence of the desire expressed during the late strikes by both masters and operatives for the establishment of some Court to which resort might be had for the purpose of putting an end to disputes between masters and men; but he should not attempt to press it to a second reading unless it met with general approval by both masters and operatives; and, in the meantime, the circulation of the Bill throughout the country might possibly lead to the suggestion of some better enactment, and, at all events, would show to masters and operatives the sort of jurisdiction which would be established if a Court of Conciliation were determined upon. The Bill would enable masters and men, if unanimous, to apply to the Crown for a licence empowering them to establish a Court of Conciliation. The masters must for six months be traders in the district in which they applied; the workmen must also be resident for six months, and must have worked in their particular trades for seven years. The number of the Council was not to consist of less than ten masters and ten workmen and a chairman, and no member of the Council was to adjudicate in any case in which he was interested. Powers would be given to them, when a case was submitted to them by both parties, to make an award. There were other provisions in the Bill which, he thought, would be beneficial, particularly one borrowed from the French code, a Sub-committee of Conciliation, to whom, in the first instance, all disputes are to be referred; but if they cannot prevail upon the parties to agree, the dispute is to go before the Council; but he would not press the measure unless, on examination, it met with approval from both sides of the House.

COURTS OF JUSTICE BUILDING BILL. (No. 28). THIRD READING.

BILL PASSED.

Bill read 3<sup>d</sup> (according to Order).

LORD ST. LEONARDS moved the omission of Clause 16, allowing the Lord Chancellor to purchase or redeem Chancery Compensations with the Moneys forming Funds belonging to the Suitors of the Court of Chancery in addition to the One Million of Stock previously authorized to be taken from the same Funds.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the Amendment of his noble and learned Friend ought more properly to have been moved on the second reading of the Bill. His noble and learned Friend proposed to strike out a portion of the Bill, and if his Amendment was carried the effect would be that the rest of the Bill would fall to the ground. His noble and learned Friend had for the first time failed to understand the meaning of the measure. There was a large fund in Chancery charged with certain compensations and annuities to persons, the greater portion of whom were advanced in years. Now, it was proposed, first of all, to take from the principal fund a million of stock; and then the residue, together with another fund that was available, could be applied in redeeming the annuities he had referred to. In that way there would be ample means for providing the compensations either in the shape of Government annuities, or by selling off a portion of the stock from time to time. His noble and learned Friend had objected to certain fees that would be charged under the Bill. But it had been already explained that those fees were of the most trifling description, and would be a mere drop in the ocean compared with the benefits to be derived from the Bill. His noble and learned Friend had referred to objections made by the Master of the Rolls and Vice Chancellor Wood. But their objections were of a very different kind. What they objected to was that the money which had been accumulating in the Courts of Chancery should be applied to the building of courts for the benefit of the suitors at common law. But was it possible to distinguish between the two classes of suitors? Was it possible to draw a line between the use of those Courts by one set of suitors and their use by another? The Bill, however, met the very objection which he had noticed, because, while the contribution from the Suitors' Fund was to be £900,000, all the residue and all possible deficiency were to be made up by charges in the Courts of Common Law. He trusted their Lordships would refuse to strike out this clause, to do which would cause the whole scheme to fall to the ground; and thus would be lost a measure which he was convinced would prove one of the greatest benefits to the public generally, and especially to the suitors, both in law and equity.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he feared he was about to be troublesome to both the noble and learned Lords, but the case was one upon which he did not feel quite clear, and he wished to have his doubts removed. He assumed, in the first instance, that his noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards), whatever his own opinion on the subject, did not intend to revive a discussion upon a point already decided by the House — namely, that the money of the Suitors' Fund was fairly applicable to the purposes of the Bill. But the question now was, whether under the clause they were not taking more from the Suitors' Fund than the Bill professed to do. It was upon that point he should like to have some explanation.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, if the noble Earl would permit him he would repeat the figures. The Suitors' Fund consisted of £1,291,000 Consols. Besides that there was a Fund of more than £200,000—he believed it was £240,000—Consols which had arisen from the surplus fees invested under the direction of the Court. The operation which was proposed was this:—From the £1,291,000 stock £1,000,000 would be taken, which would leave a surplus of the Suitors' Fund of £291,000 Consols. To that surplus would be added the second Fund of which he had spoken — say £200,000 — which would make £491,000 Consols. Now it was estimated that the money required for the redemption of the compensations and annuities would be £437,000; and therefore the £491,000 of which he had spoken would be ample for the purpose. That would discharge every kind of encumbrance affecting the Funds, and would leave a million of stock perfectly free.

LORD ST. LEONARDS reiterated his arguments against the power proposed to be given to the Lord Chancellor to purchase or redeem Chancery compensations by the Suitors' Fund in addition to the one million of stock already authorized to be taken from the same Fund. It must be remembered that the whole of those Funds were a security for the compensations, and hence no part of the Funds could be taken until the compensations were redeemed.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, if he understood the noble and learned Lord correctly those two Funds—the Suitors' Fund and the Suitors' Fee Fund—were practically one, and out of the whole he proposed to take £1,500,000. The Suitors' Fund, as he understood, was now chargeable with a certain amount of annuities by way of compensation, and those annuities were chargeable on the whole of the Suitors' Fund. His noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards) said that the Bill proposed to throw an additional charge upon the Suitors' Fund, because it was taking from it £430,000 more than it professed to do. But it appeared to him (the Earl of Derby) that this £400,000 was to be taken for the purpose of redeeming those annuities; and his noble and learned Friend's argument was that, by taking the capital of the Fund, they would be diminishing it more than if it continued to pay the incumbrances. Then, although he understood the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack to say that the suitors would not be more injured, still there was a question whether it was advisable to pay off those incumbrances. But his noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards) said, that inasmuch as the security of those compensations was upon the whole of the Fund, they could not proceed to diminish the Suitors' Fund by taking this £1,000,000 of stock, representing £900,000, without previously clearing the way by paying off those compensations. He confessed he did not see, if their Lordships admitted the principle that it was legitimate to apply this £1,000,000 at all to the purposes proposed, that they were doing a greater injury by retaining the clause than by adopting the proposition of his noble and learned Friend. There was another question as to the contribution professed to be made by Government; but, as his noble and learned Friend said, in reality to be made by the Suitors' Fund itself. He (the Earl of Derby) confessed he thought that his noble and learned Friend had not made out a case for his Amendment as to Clause 16, and if he divided the House he should vote against him. He should, however, be prepared to listen to his arguments on the other question.

LORD ST. LEONARDS moved to leave out Clause 22, which proposed to take from the Chancery suitors the value of the Masters' Offices (which were built at the expense of the Suitors' Fund, and were now vested in the Lord Chancellor upon trust to sell and pay the proceeds to the Suitors' Fund), and to pay the money to the Consolidated Fund, so as to form part of the £200,000 which the Government were to pay towards the expenses of the new Courts. The noble and learned Lord contended that the above would be the effect and operation of the clause—although it was not so framed as on the face of it to show the intention—and that the proposed transfer would be inequitable.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the noble and learned Lord who now objected so strongly to any interference with this particular Fund was himself the first to give the example for so doing by introducing a Bill for devoting buildings properly connected with the Suitors' Fee Fund to the purposes of the Patent Office. He actually, to use his own expression, "with unhallowed hand" took those offices from the suitors to the Court of Chancery, and devoted them to a purpose totally foreign and utterly alien from that to which they were originally applied. He was not, however, about to set the Attorney General in motion to cause his noble and learned Friend to make restitution. The fact was simply that the Government were about to become the purchaser of these Masters' Offices and other offices, every claim being extinguished by the sum of £200,000 for which the Government proposed to make themselves responsible.

LORD ST. LEONARDS explained that at the time the offices were made over, as stated by the noble and learned Lord, the Masters themselves ceased to exist. There had been no breach of trust, because, though the offices were not sold or the money paid over to the Suitors' Fee Fund, they were transferred with that liability still attaching to them.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, the question was not whether his noble and learned Friend who had just sat down or the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack had been guilty of a breach of trust, but what the practical effect of this clause would be. Whether the offices were treated as buildings or treated as money it was plain that they belonged equally to the Suitors' Fee Fund. But the Government proposed to help themselves to these buildings as part of their contribution, ignoring the liability that attached to them. The buildings did not belong to Government but were the subject of a trust. It would, therefore, be unjust to allow the clause to remain in the Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he had explained more than once the course which the Government proposed to take. It would be very much shorter to take the houses than to follow the roundabout process of selling them and paying over the proceeds to the Suitors' Fee Fund, from which a certain amount was then to be withdrawn.

On Question, "That the said Clause stand part of the Bill?" their Lordships divided:—Contents 46; Not Contents 47: Majority 1.

COURTS OF JUSTICE CONCENTRATION (SITE) BILL—(No. 56.)

THIRD READING. BILL PASSED.

LORD REDESDALE moved an Amendment in Clause 14 to leave out the words "Bridges over or." The object proposed by the insertion of these words was to authorize the construction of a covered bridge over the Strand whereby the members of the Temple and others might have ready access to the new Courts. Now, a bridge over the Strand would at best be a most unsightly object; it would also be an impediment to the proper traffic of that crowded thoroughfare, and ought not on any account to be sanctioned.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he did not admit that such a structure must necessarily be either an ugly object or an obstruction; although it might be so treated as to become both. But the possibility of a bridge over a thoroughfare being made inconvenient would hardly warrant them in striking out the words. Such a covered way would, undoubtedly, be a great convenience, and if properly made would neither prove an impediment to the traffic nor a disfigurement to the site and building.

LORD REDESDALE held it utterly impossible that any bridge could be carried across the Strand without being a disfigurement. No architect would venture to propose such a thing. He should certainly say Not Content.

LORD REDESDALE moved a new clause after Clause 18, in order to enable the public to know what would be the cost of this great speculation, and how the ground was proposed to be occupied. At present they had not the slightest idea of either. The Government asked power to appropriate £1,500,000 to the erection of these Courts, of which £750,000 was to go towards the site; but what that site was actually to cost neither the Government nor anyone else knew. He proposed that no notice should be given of the intention to take any property till plans and estimates were prepared of the cost and construction of the buildings, and the sanction of Parliament thereto obtained. His own impression in regard to the site was that it would not be found very advantageous. There was a very considerable fall from Carey Street to the Strand, and this building would no doubt have more fronts than one. It would be utterly impossible that two of them could, from the nature of the ground, have an uniform elevation. He thought it desirable that both Houses of Parliament should be made acquainted with the extent of land required, how the plan was to be carried out, and the cost of the structure before anything was finally done.

“No Notice shall be given of the Intention to take any Property under this Act, nor shall any Contract be entered into for the Purchase of any Property, until after Plans for the proposed Courts shall have been prepared and Estimates made of the Cost thereof, and further Provisions made for securing such additional Lands as may be required for Approaches to or necessary Convenience of the said Courts, with an Estimate of the Cost attending the Purchase of such Lands and the Formation of such Approaches, and shall have been sanctioned by Parliament.”

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that it would require the spirit of prophecy to ascertain with certainty beforehand what would be the actual expense; but, so far as calculations and estimates of the cost were concerned, they had already been made. He had before stated that an estimate of the value of the buildings on the proposed site had been made several years ago. That estimate was afterwards carefully revised by a Commission, who reported in 1859. Every part of that estimate had again been gone over, and the conclusion arrived at was that the sum required would be £1,500,000. But they were not without fresh resources. In addition to the Suitors Fund, there was a tax to be imposed in the shape of fees, which might be augmented to double the amount. The Bill proposed that the plans should be prepared by the profession with the aid of the Government, and that there should be a body of men constituted with the aid of the Treasury to allot out the land. Instead of that, which would alone be satisfactory to the profession, the noble and learned Lord proposed that no notice should be given to take the land until plans should have been prepared. But how could that be done if the Amendment were agreed to; when it would be impossible to allot out the plan until the estate should have been laid bare? If the Amendment were carried everything would have to be postponed until the Government had arrived at a decision, and a plan had been agreed upon, and that could not be done until the land had been acquired and cleared of the present buildings, when the shape and state of the land could be seen. No Amendment ever contained within itself more impossible things than this one, and if it were carried the noble Lord would have the credit of defeating the Bill. They could not tell what approaches they would want until the plan had been made.

THE EARL OF DERBY must confess, notwithstanding the statement of the noble and learned Lord, the course recommended by the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees was suggested by the most ordinary consideration of prudence in regard to an undertaking of that magnitude. It was all very well to say that this matter had been deferred for a very long time; but although there might already have been great delay, that was no reason for imprudent haste now. One part of the Bill was intended to sanction the appointment of a Commission which should decide on the plan. The estimate for the purchase of the land was £750,000; but for the buildings to be erected on that land there was no estimate. The whole thing was an entire guess. Until they determined what the buildings were to be, it was nonsense to talk of an estimate. Before the Committee of the House of Commons the chief witnesses examined were the Surveyor of the Board of Works, another surveyor who spoke to the character of the houses on the site, and a doctor who spoke of the importance of the scheme in a sanitary point of view. But as to the space not a tittle of evidence was adduced before that Committee except that Mr. Pennethorne said that  $7\frac{1}{2}$  acres would be enough, and not more than enough for the proposed buildings. The approaches were important, not only in reference to the space to be occupied, but even in reference to the money to be paid for it. The noble and learned Lord said that no architect could frame a satisfactory plan for the occupation of a particular site unless all the existing buildings upon it were removed.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR explained that he referred to the delay which would be caused in preparing the plans—because the Commission would first have to determine the number of courts and offices required, together with their dimensions before the building could be commenced.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that the exact plans, with the length, breadth, and even the levels of the land, could be prepared without the land being first cleared; and he could not understand why the architect could not proceed with his plans while the land was covered as well as if it were cleared. If he himself were going to build a range of stabling upon the site of the old ones, he certainly should not pull down the old ones before he arranged the plan for the new building; and he should be very much astonished if any architect told him that the old stables must be pulled down before the plan of the new ones was prepared. His own opinion was that the carrying of this Amendment would not in the slightest degree interfere with the progress of the work, and that its adoption was required by the exercise of even the most ordinary prudence.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the noble Earl overlooked the fact that the site of his old stables would be his own land, whereas in the present case the land belonged to other persons.

THE EARL OF DERBY: But by the Bill the Government made the land their own by taking compulsory powers to buy it, and the only question was as to giving notice to the parties.

EARL GRANVILLE: But the Amendment said that no notice to take land should be given until the plans had been prepared.

LORD REDESDALE: The time for giving the notices would not expire for three or five years; and therefore the delay in giving notice for a year would not interfere with their getting possession of the land in the end. As to laying out the plans, the Commission would not go over the land to do this, but would sit in a room and form their opinion upon plans laid before them; doing so with the assistance they might receive from professional men. The moment this Bill was passed the Commission could be appointed and instructions given to prepare the plans. With regard to the estimates for buildings of this character, he begged their Lordships to bear in mind what the Houses of Parliament had cost building compared with what they had been estimated to cost. He believed that they had cost more than three times the amount of the original estimate of the architect. To proceed with a work of the magnitude now proposed without any estimate appeared to him to be an act of imprudence that it would be discreditable to Parliament to allow.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that the allusion to the cost of the Houses of Parliament was not applicable in the present case; for, with respect to the Houses of the Legislature, Parliament took the management of the business on itself and would not allow the Government to interfere. Therefore, for the excess of expenditure over estimate Parliament was responsible and not the Government; and it was now proposed with the same view of economy that Parliament should have the management of the expenditure in the case of the Courts of Law.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that the words of the new clause requiring the sanction of Parliament before anything was done must necessarily lead to a postponement of the work until an Act granting the required sanction should be passed in another Session of Parliament.

LORD REDESDALE said, it would be impossible to begin the building till next year or the year after. There was plenty of time.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, if the Amendment were agreed to there would be no less than four distinct Acts of Parliament required to carry out the Bill, and therefore the Amendment was nothing less than a covert way of defeating the Bill altogether.

PROTEST

"DISSENTIENT:—

"1. Because it is the duty of the State to provide fit Courts for the administration of justice; whilst the Bills just passed provide the principal means of erecting the new Courts out of the Suitors' Fund of the Court of Chancery and by taxation of the Common Law suitors. Taxation ought never to be imposed for that purpose. As to the Equity Fund, the first Bill directly takes one million stock for the scheme, and subsequently takes indirectly about half a million more by authorizing the Lord Chancellor out of that fund to purchase or redeem certain compensations which are charged on the funds; and by assigning to the Consolidated Fund the value of the late Masters' Offices which are held by the Lord Chancellor as a trustee for the Suitors' Fund, although the section (22) which transfers the property from the suitors to the Consolidated Fund contains no statement of such an intention.

"2. Because no portion of the Suitors' Fund can be appropriated by Parliament for any other object than the benefit of the suitors in equity without a violation of the rights of property and indirectly repealing divers Acts of Parliament, to which no reference is made in the Bills. The funds in question have arisen from moneys belonging to the suitors in Chancery, which were paid into court from time to time without any direction to invest them, and the Court, with the aid of Parliament, which was required only because the consent of all the owners of the moneys could not be obtained, invested them, and the dividends, with fees of Court, form the fund in question. Until now the Government never ventured to treat it as a public fund, or to appropriate it to purposes not connected with the ease and benefit of the suitors. In the many Acts of Parliament relating to the fund, not a syllable can be found to sanction Parliament in treating this as a public fund. The principal belonged to the suitors; to whom but them should the produce of it belong? The Court of Chancery held it as a fund dedicated to the purposes of the suitors as a class. From the 12th of George II. to the 15th and 16th of the Queen, a period of more than a century, some 10 or 12 Acts of Parliament recognize the fund as belonging to the suitors; the sums not expended for purposes required for the ease and benefit of the suitors were carried to accounts in the name of the Accountant General for the benefit and better security of the suitors in Chancery. It is not disputed that the fund, if required, is liable to the suitors as a class. And, indeed, their right is fully admitted by the provision in the Building Act for providing out of the Consolidated Fund the means of any insufficiency of the cash of the suitors to satisfy their demands, but this provision is improperly confined to the million of stock directly appropriated by the Bill. The Chancery Commissioners, in their Report, state that it is true that in times past this fund has been exclusively employed for the benefit of the suitors in Chancery, but this may have been because the exigency of the moment rendered such an application thereof necessary or expedient. Circumstances, however, have now changed, new and varied exigencies have arisen, and the wants of the present day urgently call for a different application. This statement may be left without a comment.

"3. Because, as already stated, there is no foundation for the claim of the Government to treat the fund as public property. The statement in the Building Bill is that the fund stands to the credit of "an account of securities purchased with surplus interest arising from securities carried to an account of moneys placed out for the benefit and better security of the suitors of the High Court of Chancery," which admission seems conclusive against the right of the public; but the Bill adds, "which has arisen from the profit of investments made under the authority of Parliament at the risk of the public of unemployed cash balances paid into court on account of individual suitors." This is the first time since the institution of the fund that it has been pretended that the investments were at the risk of the public, and therefore giving to the public a right to the fund. For this statement there is not the slightest foundation. Not the public indemnity, but the ease or the benefit and security of the suitors, are the objects declared in every Act of Parliament. The public incurred no risk, and therefore is not entitled to the benefits claimed. It is truly said that no individual suitor is entitled to the fund, but it does not follow that the suitors as a class are not entitled to it. All the applications of the fund for the last century and a half prove this, for they were all for the benefit of them as a class. The ownership of the fund is strikingly exemplified by the great settlement in 1852 (15th and 16th of Victoria, cap. 87), followed by the Act of 1853 (16th and 17th of Victoria, cap. 98), of which latter Act the Chancery Commissioners do not appear to have been aware. These Acts made all the funds in question at once applicable to the relief and benefit of the suitor, and the unclaimed funds were added to the others, although subject to be made good if claimed hereafter; and now the present measure, without referring to this important and, as I thought, final settlement, repeals and destroys it. In 1852, so far was Parliament from claiming the fund as public property, that it relieved it from charges to the amount of £9,000 a year which had been imposed upon it by Parliament for the salaries of some of the Equity Judges. This was done on the ground stated, "that it was expedient that the salaries of all the Judges of the Court of Chancery should be paid out of the Consolidated Fund instead of out of the interest of the securities purchased with the cash of the suitors." This relieved the fund for the benefit of the suitors, and was a just and proper provision, but utterly inconsistent with the claim now set up in the name of the public, for if the Suitors' Fund did belong to the public it might properly be applied to the payments from which it was relieved, or, indeed, be expended on the Thames Embankment, or any other public work. The analogy attempted to be set up that the Court of Chancery is a banker, and therefore is entitled to the profit will not bear examination, and if it could, still the profit would belong to the Court, and the Court, with the aid of the Accountant General, is the guardian and not the owner of the property to which the public can have no claim. The Lord Chancellor, if a trustee without authority invested the trust money and made a profit of it, would be bound to compel him to pay it to the owners of the capital, although they had given no directions for its investment with costs. All the risk would fall on the trustee, all the benefit would accrue to his cestui que trust. This will be a painful rule to follow, now that the Court itself holds the interest of the fund belonging to the suitors, which was invested without their consent not to belong to them as a class. Those who rely upon the fact that no individual suitor can claim the fund and deny the right of the suitors as a class, yet maintain the right of the public, that is the nation, to the fund. Has any individual citizen any claim to any portion of it?

"4. Because, although no objection could be made to the erection of new Courts of Justice for the Equity Judges if necessary, at the expense of the Suitors' Fund, yet no such necessity exists beyond a very limited application of that fund. There are six Equity Courts—1, the Lord Chancellor's; 2, the Lords Justices'; 3, the senior Vice-Chancellor's; 4, and 5, the two Courts of the other Vice-Chancellors; and, 6, the Rolls Court. The first five Courts are all in Lincoln's Inn; the first three of them are good Courts, and require none others to be substituted for them; the other two are unfit for Courts of Justice, and would long since have been replaced by new and good ones, if the present scheme had not been introduced. Lincoln's Inn was prepared to expend £100,000 on new Courts, and to require from the Suitors' Fund only £4,000 a year, including the present payments from that fund to the Inn, and a plan was made and laid with a Bill for effectuating that object before this House. It is, therefore, wholly unnecessary to build on the proposed site any new Courts for the Equity Judges. In Lincoln's Inn the Courts have long been established. The suitors, the Bar, and the solicitors have the benefit of the garden and the open grounds. If left where they are they would not interfere with the proposed concentration of the Courts, for the Common Law Courts would be concentrated on the site proposed, and the Courts of Equity would be within a few yards of them. The Rolls Court is a fine and excellent Court. The Master of the Rolls objects to be removed; more especially as the great Record Court of which he is the head is connected with his Court, and he has constant occasion to resort to it. There is no reason why his Court should be removed. The distance between it and the proposed Courts is too trifling to form a reason for the removal. Nevertheless, all these Courts are to be removed at the expense of the Suitors' Fund. Concentration after all will not be effected. The Nisi Prius Courts are left at Guildhall, the Court of Bankruptcy in Basinghall Street, the Central Criminal Court in the Old Bailey, the Land Transfer Court, the Charity Commissioners, and the Inclosure Commissioners are to remain where they are, and some of them at a great expense to the public. The still more important Courts of Appeal in this House and in the Privy Council Court are, of course, left undisturbed. Two Courts are to be removed; one the Lunacy Commissioners' Court, which ought not to be taken into the turmoil of all the Courts, and the other—the Divorce Court—which for obvious reasons should be kept as far as possible from the seat of the other Courts. The suitor will be astonished to find how little benefit the concentration will afford him; an injury, in all probability, it will inflict on him; for at present the Equity Bar confine themselves as much as may be to one Court, but when their Courts are all under one roof, the suitor may have to regret the absence of his leading counsel, or of his junior, when he requires the services of both.

"5. Because the Bills will take one million and a half of stock from the Equity Suitors' Fund for the purpose of building new Law Courts and unnecessarily rebuilding Equity Courts, thus depriving the suitors of £40,000 or £50,000 a year revenue, and thus stopping the future relief of suitors in equity from fees of court which ought to be reduced. The Commissioners appointed to inquire into this subject, in their Report of July, 1862, were of opinion that if the Suitors' Fund was taken, the Consolidated Fund should provide £40,000 a year to furnish the suitors with funds to meet their claims—a Parliamentary indemnity. But so far from this being adopted in the Government Bills, they first take £1,000,000 of stock, which reduces the income of the Suitors' Fund some £40,000 a year, and then the Lord Chancellor is to draw upon the fund for another £400,000, or £500,000 stock in order to relieve the fund from the compensations to which it is liable, or in other words to supply the annual revenue of which the appropriation of the one million will deprive it. If the suitors had still their funds in their own possession, the repurchase or redemption of the compensations charged on them might be a legitimate transaction. But one million of their stock is first taken from them absolutely freed from the charges which affect all the Sutors' Funds. If the remainder of the funds taken under section 16 were left to the suitors, they would be able to pay off the compositions till they fell in by the deaths of the annuitants, and when and as they died the fund itself would remain for the suitors' benefit clear of charge. The scheme is to take a million of the capital, and then, foreseeing that the interest would be required to meet the claims upon it, nearly half a million more of capital is taken to clear the million in the hands of the Government from its liabilities, and thus the suitors are stripped of all their funds.

The charge on the Consolidated Fund as an indemnity is a poor security. Instead of having their own funds in the hands of their own officers to answer their demands, they must resort to the Treasury as claimants on the public funds, and, of course, the relief from Court fees and other benefits from the fund are at an end. The injustice to the suitors in Equity is further shown. There is a sum of £88,254 5s. in the power of the Government, and of which they receive the dividends, which arose from fees in the Common Law Courts. Now, the Commissioners in their Report state, "that this Common Law Fund is wholly free and unappropriated, and there cannot be a more legitimate application of it than towards the completion of a scheme from which the suitors at Common Law will derive the most essential advantage." Yet the Government retain this large sum as public money, and take, of course, the like sum from the Equity Suitor's Fund, to build Courts for the Common Law suitors. Besides which they indirectly take from the suitors the value of the Masters' Offices, which is strictly and clearly their property, and of which the Lord Chancellor is a trustee for them.

"6. Because the funds of the suitors in Equity cannot bear the reduction of a million and a half of their stock. Upon the great settlement of 1852 fees in Equity were remitted, which, within a few years, it is proved would have amounted to £40,000. The Lord Chancellor is bound to further relieve them if the funds be not taken away; they still pay 8 per cent. The accumulation was stopped in 1852, and the interest of the Sutors' Fund was carried to the Fee Fund, and it appeared in 1860 that this arrangement had saved the suitors £551,978. At times the whole income is nearly exhausted in payments. The income is subject to fluctuations. £1,200 to £1,500 a year was cut off by a decision as to receivers; and in 1860, £6,000 a year charge had been added since 1858. Whilst Lord Cranworth was Chancellor he had to order the sale of £300,000 to meet the suitors' demands.

The payments into court cannot be depended upon. The power in one of the Bills, for which I am responsible to executors to administer with safety the assets without filing a bill and paying the money into court, was followed next year by the amount paid into court being £600,000 less than the previous year. Immense sums are paid in by railway companies, which must soon cease. Payments into court of trust moneys will, no doubt, be reduced in number when it is understood that the Government claim for the public a right to the fund which is still described as placed out for the benefit and security of the suitors.

Johnson, the solicitor to the Sutors' Fund, was examined at great length, and he showed clearly the impolicy of touching the fund, but to this important evidence no attention has been paid. Vice-Chancellor Stuart had a very strong impression that drawing upon the Sutors' Fund for an enormous scheme of that kind, including the Courts of Law and Equity, would involve considerations of injustice that required a profound deliberation. Lord Justice Turner, in an elaborate statement, objected to the fund being taken: he held that the fund belonged to the suitors by original right, and that it was besides appropriated by Parliament to the purposes of the Court of Chancery; and he said that every appropriation of it by Parliament had been for the benefit of the suitors, and for their benefit only, and he did not think that it could, consistently with moral justice, be applied for other purposes than for the benefit of the suitors; he treated the notion that the Court was to be considered as a banker as a mistake, and he agreed with me that the Court was a trustee of the fund, and the suitor was the cestui que trust. He was of opinion that if Parliament did take the fund, not merely a guarantee, but an actual revenue should be paid by the Exchequer to the Lord Chancellor equal to the interest of the fund taken from the suitors. The Master of the Rolls thought it very objectionable to touch any part of the Sutors' Fund for the building of Courts of Justice, and he stated that a former Chancellor of the Exchequer who wished to take the fund for public purposes, under a guarantee from the public, admitted that it could not fairly be so taken after its origin had been explained to him by the Accountant General. Vice Chancellor Wood, one of the Commissioners, dissented from the Report as far as it related to the appropriation of the Sutors' Fund, giving elaborate reasons in a separate form for his dissent; he agreed with Lord Justice Turner and the Master of the Rolls that the first step towards the appropriation of the Sutors' Fund to purposes unconnected with the business of the suitors would be erroneous and unjust, and he thought it wrong on the general principles of political expediency. He held that the fees should be reduced with the funds, which the appropriation to the buildings would prevent; and, in fact, you would levy fees on a Chancery suitor in order to ease Common Law suitors in the expense of their litigation.

"7. Because the scheme will displace 4,175 persons, of whom 3,082 are of the labouring class, including children. Many of them are described as of filthy habits, and it is proved that in some parts fever is never absent. The houses, warehouses, &c., occupied by this population are about 400. Now, much credit is taken for clearing away this crowd of people. Where are they to go? Government has made no provision for their future residence. Nobody pretends to know where they are to be located. We know that, go where they may, they will assist to further crowd some place already too full. Doubtless their filthy habits will accompany them, and the fever stricken—the never-failing fever—will be carried to other localities, to add misery and sickness to their inmates. Every one must desire to limit these evils as much as may be. Now, the unnecessary removals for the New Law Courts for the Equity Judges will greatly add to these evils, which ought to have much weight in the consideration of the subject, if we are in earnest in the sympathy which we so often express for the labouring man, who is driven from his home by public improvements.

"8. Because no plan of the new Courts has been matured, and, therefore, no estimate of the expense can be relied on. Everything is left to be done, and doubtless the expense will far exceed the sums provided. The accesses to the Courts will cost a large additional sum, for which no provision has been made. When it was proposed to build the Courts in the centre of Lincoln's Inn Fields, Sir Charles Barry, then Mr. Barry, in answer to a question from me in a Committee of the House of Commons, could not say that to open accesses from the two Turnstiles, Duke Street, and Clare Market, all of which would be required, would not cost a million of money. Five years are allowed for the purchases of the site, and it is not probable that the buildings will be erected in less than twice that period, during which, no doubt, after the Suitors' Fund is exhausted, large calls will be made upon the public funds before justice can be administered in the New Courts, and during all which time the suitors in Chancery will have to pay fees which ought to be abolished, and to put up with the two Courts of the junior Vice-Chancellors, so much complained of, without deriving the slightest benefit from the proposed concentration of the Courts.

"ST. LEONARDS."

PROTEST

Against the insertion of the words "Bridges over or" in Clause 14.

"1. Because these words are introduced for the purpose of sanctioning the erection of a bridge across the Strand to remedy the inconvenience (inseparable from the proposed site) arising from one of the most crowded thoroughfares in the metropolis being between the Temple and the new Courts.

"2. Because such a bridge in connection with the new buildings must be a most unsightly object if carried across the street in one span, and hardly less so if in any other manner, and will, in the latter case, perpetuate and perhaps add to the present Temple Bar obstruction, and the demand for which is as discreditable to the taste of the Templars as it will be to that of any authority which may hereafter permit it to be erected.

JURIES (IRELAND) BILL—(No. 55.)

SECOND READING. BILL WITHDRAWN.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH, in moving the second reading of this Bill, explained that its object was first, to allow the verdict of three-fourths of a jury to be taken in cases of high treason, murder, petty treason, sedition, or any other felony or misdemeanor; and secondly, to give the Attorney General the power to order a new trial where there had been a disagreement of the jury, and to change the venue in those cases. On the last circuit in Ireland there was one continued and entire failure on the part of the Crown Prosecutors to carry out the law. In one instance eleven of the jury were unanimous in convicting, but one man kept them for twenty-eight hours, declaring that he would never convict any one of an offence against the British law. The Bill recited that—

"Recent instances of the failure of justice in Ireland have occurred through the disagreement of juries in cases where the evidence appeared to be of a conclusive character to establish the guilt of the accused," and that it is therefore,

"Evident that the existing law of trial by jury is insufficient and inadequate to protect life or property in Ireland."

Some such amendment of the law as he proposed was absolutely necessary in a country where a person might openly avow that he would not act upon his oath, and judge according to the evidence; where men were so reckless of the obligations of an oath, and where public rejoicings took place in some instances at the failure of justice in the case of prisoners whose guilt could hardly be doubted.

(The Marquess of Westmeath.)

EARL GRANVILLE thought that their Lordships would hardly be prepared in a thin House to pass a Bill introducing such an important change in the law. The proposal to dispense with the unanimity of juries, if good for Ireland, was equally good for England.

LORD KINGSDOWN said, he approved that part of the Bill which proposed to allow a majority of the jury to give a verdict, and he would therefore vote with the noble Marquess if he divided the House.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, he could not support the first part of the Bill for altering the jury system; but he thought the second part, providing for a change of venue, well deserved the attention of the Government. At present a failure of justice was of no unfrequent occurrence through the want of such a provision. In one instance, in Donegal, a man had been tried three times for a capital offence; but such was the terror that existed that it was impossible to secure a conviction, and the man received a public ovation. Now if, after the first disagreement of the jury, there had been a power to change the venue to Dublin, a fair trial would probably have been secured and justice would have been done. In England this power existed, and had been exercised in the case of Palmer; and it would prove a beneficial power in Ireland. At the assizes in Belfast the other day there were a number of cases brought forward by the Crown, but party spirit ran very high in the place, and the convictions against both sides were very few. There would have been a much better chance of justice being done if the Law Officers had the power of removing the trials to places in which a more calm and dispassionate attention would be given to the evidence.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the statute under which the venue was changed in the case of Palmer's trial enabled such a change to be made for the purpose of avoiding delay, and he was under the impression that that statute applied to Ireland also. If it were the case that the same power did not exist in Ireland, it would be a very proper subject of consideration whether a measure should not be framed with the object of remedying the defect.

LORD CHELMSFORD did not think that any such power of changing the venue existed in Ireland, and he agreed with his noble Friend behind him (the Earl of Donoughmore) that it was desirable that the power should be extended to that part of the United Kingdom. It would be very objectionable, however, to give that power to the Law Officers; it should be given to a Court of Law, which should have the right to determine in each case.

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, the power did exist in Ireland, and he himself remembered an instance of its application in the county of Monaghan.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the matter should be taken into consideration, but suggested that the present Bill should be withdrawn.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH said, upon that assurance of the Lord Chancellor, he would not press the Bill.

Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

THE POLICE IN IRELAND.

RETURNS MOVED FOR.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM, in moving for certain Returns relative to the police in Ireland, said, that when the late Sir Robert Peel was moving the repeal of the Corn

Laws he undertook, by way of compensation to the Irish agricultural interest, that certain charges relating to the police should be placed upon the Consolidated Fund, and that Ireland should be exempt from the operation of the income tax. The quota of police allotted to the agricultural districts had been diminished, and he now understood there was to be a further diminution of 150 men in the police of the agricultural counties, in order that this number might be given to the town of Belfast. This would be a double wrong. The Commissioners appointed to inquire into the Belfast riots recommended that there should be a Police Commissioner appointed in Belfast. It would be much better that Belfast should be made a county of a city, so that the inhabitants might have the control of their own police. The plan proposed would cause much dissatisfaction, would give the Government increased trouble, and would not answer the purpose that was designed. He trusted that the Government would re-consider this matter.

EARL GRANVILLE said, there would be no objection to the Returns being granted, except in regard to that portion included in a Motion already made by a noble Earl (the Earl of Donoughmore).

THE 3RD. MIDDLESEX MILITIA.

QUESTION.

MR. DENMAN said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether the Junior Captain of the 3rd Middlesex Militia has recently been appointed to the vacant Majority of that Regiment over the heads of the other nine Captains, some of them of many years standing; and whether such appointment has been made with the approval of the War Office or in accordance with the usages of the Service; if not, on what special grounds such appointment has been sanctioned.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, it was true that Lord Chelsea, the junior captain, had been appointed to the vacant majority over the heads of the remaining captains. It was no doubt true as a general rule, but by no means an invariable rule, that such appointments should be made by seniority, but several reasons had been held sufficient to justify a departure from that rule, one of which was local influence and position in the county. The militia was essentially a local force, and the influence and position of the officers of that force were always taken into consideration. In the present instance the lord-lieutenant had represented to the Secretary of State that the position of Lord Chelsea in the county was such as to render it for the advantage of the regiment that he should be appointed to the majority, and the Secretary of State had, therefore, recommended the confirmation of his appointment.

CONDITION OF MINES.—QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, What steps he has taken, or proposes to take, to remedy the very serious evils which have been brought to light by the evidence taken by the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the condition of mines, and which was reported last Session.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, in reply, that the course which had been taken with respect to the Report was this. It had been thought right to confer with the Members of that Commission, several of whom were Members of that House, on the subject. On many of the points raised in the Report it did not appear possible that any legislation could take place, but there were other points on which it might be expedient to legislate, and he had accordingly called a meeting at the Home Office, when that matter was fully gone into; and it was decided by a majority of the Members of that Commission that with a view to the accomplishment of the object in question it was inexpedient that any hasty legislation should take place. It was necessary that the recommendation of the Commissioners, with respect to the county of Cornwall especially, should be more thoroughly discussed and the opinions of persons interested in mines in the locality should be obtained. That opinion, however, was not shared by his noble Friend (Lord Kinnaird) at the head of the Commission, who had proposed to introduce a Bill on his own responsibility, but for the reasons he (Sir George Grey) had stated the Government did not think it desirable to introduce any Bill during the present Session.

INDIA—EXPORT DUTIES.—QUESTION.

MR. CAIRD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether it is the intention of the Government in India to impose Export Duties on the more important staples of that country, and whether the Home Government approve of that course of policy?

MR. CRAWFORD said, he would also beg to ask the right hon. Baronet, Whether he has received any official account of the Financial Statement of the Indian Government in India?

SIR CHARLES WOOD: Sir, I have not yet received any official accounts of the financial measures proposed in India, but I have received private letters upon the subject, containing a copy of Sir Charles Trevelyan's speech and the Report of the proceedings of the Council of the Governor General by which the Act was passed imposing these duties. I must confess that the course which has been taken is directly the reverse of what I had reason to expect, and, moreover, that it is not the course I myself should have thought right to propose. I only received these letters yesterday, and, in point of fact, have not yet had time thoroughly to master their contents, but I quite agree in the opinion that on questions so much affecting the trade between India and this country, it is of the greatest possible importance that the commercial interests of this country should be informed, as speedily as possible, what it is intended to do. I therefore summoned together this morning as many of the Council of India as I could assemble for the purpose of giving the matter our best consideration, and I may now say that with their entire concurrence it will be my duty not to sanction the imposition of t Export Duties.

RUPERT'S LAND.—QUESTION.

MR. WATKIN said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General, If his attention has been called to a recent case in the Common Pleas, "Corbett v. Dallas," in which an action (against the late Governor of the Hudson's Bay Company) is brought by a person found guilty in 1862-3, of the crime of procuring abortion, by the regular tribunals of Rupert's Land, sentenced to six month's imprisonment, afterwards forcibly rescued from prison and now at large in this country; and, whether refugees from justice from "Rupert's Land" can exercise, under the present state of the Laws, a right of asylum in England or are liable to re-arrest?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, in reply, that he had received no information at all upon the subject. With reference to the more general part of the hon. Member's Question the colony referred to stood in exactly the same position to England as any other British Colony, and any man escaping from it to this country could be arrested by means of a proper warrant issued by the local authorities.

INDIA—LOAN.—QUESTION.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether it is his intention to propose any Loan in this country for the purpose of the Indian Government?

SIR CHARLES WOOD, in reply, said, it was not his intention to raise any Loan of the nature referred to by the hon. Member.

INDIA—THE LUCKNOW BOOTY.

QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, What was the total amount of the booty taken at the Begum's Coote, Lucknow, in December, 1858; what proportion of that amount was awarded to the troops by whom it was captured; whether the whole amount which was awarded has been distributed; and, if not, when the final distribution may be expected? He might just mention that there were a good many private soldiers in this country who believed that they were entitled to receive some money, and to whom it would be a satisfaction to learn their true position in respect to this matter.

SIR CHARLES WOOD, in reply, said, he believed that some £12,000 was found on the occasion referred to by the hon. Baronet, and that certain portions of the money were distributed among the troops by Sir Hope Grant under the orders of the Government. He was not aware that any money had been kept back, or that there was any further sum to be distributed.

MR. MASON JONES.—EXPLANATION.

LORD ELCHO: Sir, I wish to ask the indulgence of the House to a personal matter, arising out of the debate that took place in this House on Wednesday last, on the Borough Franchise Extension Bill. In the course of that debate I made a statement relative to what had taken place at an interview between the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) and Mr. Mason Jones, as I was told, in the lobby. That statement I made upon authority which I believed to be sufficient, and the circumstances attending that interview appeared to be such as to justify my making the statement I did to the House. Subsequent to the debate I received a letter from Mr. Jones, in which he asked me for my authority, and said that I had misrepresented him. I declined to give up my authority, but I at once said, that nothing could be further from my intention than knowingly to misrepresent any gentleman, and that I should not have the slightest hesitation to express my regret publicly to the House for having misrepresented him. That led to a correspondence between us, and a meeting—and the result was, that the meeting ended in the most friendly manner, for we shook hands at parting. The part of the statement which I made, to which Mr. Jones takes exception was that part in which I stated that he apostrophised the hon. Member for Bradford in certain words, those words being "that he had no business to sit in that House." Mr. Jones said he did not use those words, and therefore I am bound to state that my informant in that respect was completely in error. With reference to the former part of my statement, in which I said that the hon. Member for Bradford had been asked to attend a meeting, and that on his declining to attend this meeting Mr. Jones addressed him in words to the effect, "Then, sir, we don't want you;" my statement on that point is admitted to be substantially correct; but Mr. Jones went on to say that he did not want the presence of the hon. Member for Bradford, because he would do more harm to their cause than good by attending the meeting, if he did not support the object of that meeting. It is but right that I should do justice to Mr. Jones by stating these circumstances, and by further stating that he himself had no knowledge of a meeting intended to be held of the working men on Easter Monday, and that the meeting to which this conversation referred was of a different kind. I have no hesitation in expressing my regret that I should have unintentionally misrepresented him in my place in Parliament, and I now do him the justice to say that, though he appears to hold somewhat wild and visionary views, he seems to hold those views, which he expresses openly and in public, with sincerity and with earnestness.

NAVY—DOCKYARD ACCOMMODATION. QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether his attention has been called to the Correspondence between the Secretary to the Admiralty and the Secretary to the Treasury relating to the proposed extension of Basin and Dock accommodation in the Royal Dockyards, from which it appears that an expenditure of more than £2,500,000 at Chatham and Portsmouth is in contemplation, of which sum not more than £90,000 has been provided for in the Estimates for the current year; and whether it is the intention of the Government to propose any plan to this House for providing for the remainder of the contemplated expenditure; if so, when such a proposal is likely to be made?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, in reply, that his hon. Friend was quite aware of the history of the undertakings at Chatham and at Portsmouth, but the meaning of his question was in one respect not quite clear. If his hon. Friend meant to ask whether there was any plan on the part of the Government for a deviation from the system of providing year by year by Votes of that House for the expenditure of the year, he could only say that there was no such plan in contemplation; but it had long been felt in the public departments, and especially at the Admiralty, that a great disadvantage and waste of public money arose from attempts to limit the formation of contracts to the sums provided for by the House of Commons from year to year. The Government were anxious, if possible, to avoid that waste, and with that view they intended to submit to the House a Bill which, if adopted, would enable the Government in respect of the works at Chatham and Portsmouth, and possibly at other places, to enter into contracts extending beyond the Vote of the year, with a view to greater economy of the public money.

IRELAND — OPENING OF THE DUBLIN EXHIBITION.—OBSERVATIONS.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that in the absence of his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland he could inform the hon. Member for the King's County (Mr. Hennessy) that he had received a letter from the Lord Lieutenant stating that the impression which appeared to exist in the mind of the hon. Member that he had struck out Irish music from the programme of the opening ceremony of the Dublin Exhibition was incorrect. All his noble Friend had done was to suggest that the musical performance should be shortened, in order that the ceremonial might not be too long. The music was all chosen from the works of Handel, Haydn, and Meyerbeer.

AZEEM JAH — (SIGNATURES TO PETITIONS.)

COMMITTEE. CONSIDERATION OF REPORT.

Order for Consideration of Report read.

Whereupon a Petition of George Morris Mitchell, for Consideration thereof, and for referring the case back to a Select Committee, was brought up, and read; to lie upon the Table.

MR. CHARLES FORSTER said, that the result of the Report of the Select Committee to which the Order of the Day referred, was that thirteen gentlemen whose names were attached to the petitions had appeared before the Select Committee, and had stated that they had given no authority to any person to sign their names, which had been affixed to the petitions without their knowledge. The Committee, which consisted of the Members of the Public Petitions Committee, had had the benefit of the legal experience of the hon. and learned Member for Suffolk (Sir FitzRoy Kelly), and he felt sure he expressed the general feeling of the Committee in acknowledging the great assistance which his hon. and learned Friend had tendered them throughout the inquiry. It appeared from the evidence before the Committee that Mr. John Strutt, acting as sub-agent for Azeem Jah, employed other persons to get up petitions in support of the Prince's claims, and that George Morris Mitchell was employed to procure signatures in various localities, including Westminster, Pimlico, Hackney, and the City of London; and although there was no evidence implicating Mr. Strutt in any fraud, the Committee felt bound to reprobate the mode he adopted for remunerating the agents—namely, by paying the 1*l*. for every signature they procured, this was a direct incentive to fraud, and derogatory to the dignity of the House. Mitchell employed his clerk, whose name was Marshall, and another person named Whitehead. The expert whose evidence was taken by the Committee, deposed that it was his conscientious belief, after examining the signatures and comparing them with the undoubted and undisputed writing of Mitchell, Marshall, and Whitehead, that Mitchell had written hundreds of the signatures, and that a certain number had been written by the other two. But the case against Mitchell did not rest there, because he had admitted that the first signature of the City of London Petition, that of Francis Robert Graham, was in his own handwriting, but he urged that he had Mr. Graham's authority for signing it. Mr. Graham, however, stated to the Committee that he gave no such authority, and up to the time of his appearing before the Committee did not know that his name was affixed. If Mr. Graham's evidence was to be believed—and he (Mr. Charles Forster) never heard evidence given which more bore the manner and semblance of truth—there was a clear case, independent of the evidence of the expert against Mitchell. The Committee, after a careful review of the whole circumstances, thought it their duty to report that a breach of privilege had been committed, and that Report was almost unanimously agreed to, the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Hennessy) being the only dissentient. The Committee having discharged its duty, it was now the duty of the House to decide what course should be taken. The right of petition was one of which the House ought to be specially careful. It seemed to him that this was an offence which struck at the root of a public right of the greatest importance, and one, therefore, which the House could not pass by without severe punishment. There were three modes in which the House had been accustomed to deal with offences of this kind. The culprit was either summoned to the Bar of the House and there reprimanded by the Speaker, which had been done in 1839, in the case of a Mr. Lovibond, who was found guilty of forging signatures to a petition for a Private Bill, and this was the mildest punishment inflicted; or, secondly, he was ordered into the custody of the Serjeant-at-Arms and brought to the Bar, as in 1825, when a Mr. Pilkington was charged with forging signatures to a petition respecting Roman Catholic relief; and in 1851, when John Strutt (the person concerned in the matter now before the House) and Charles Cunningham, who were found guilty of forging signatures to an Aylesbury election petition, and who, having expressed their contrition, were then discharged; or, thirdly, he was committed on the Report of the Committee to Newgate without being called before the House—a course which was pursued with Samuel Potts in the Hepworth case in 1840. [Mr. ROEBUCK: Was he heard before the Committee?] Yes; but he was committed to Newgate on the Report of the Select Committee, without being heard at the Bar of the House. He presumed the House would think this a case to be dealt with after the manner of the third precedent he had named. He could not think it a case in which the offenders should only be reprimanded at the Bar, for they had had every opportunity before the Select Committee to offer any excuses or explanations. The cases of Whitehead and Marshall might be favourably distinguished by the House from that of Mitchell, as they acted under his instructions. When they had purged their offence by submission and contrition, it would be for the House then to say whether it would extend to them any measure of mercy and indulgence. The House would thus show that there was a reality in those privileges which they held in trust for the public, and that they could not suffer that trust to be invaded and invalidated.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That George Morris Mitchell, having fabricated signatures to several Petitions presented to this House, and having knowingly procured other fabricated signatures to such Petitions, has been guilty of a breach of the privileges of this House.”
—(Mr. Charles Forster.)

MR. HENNESSY said, that as the member of the Committee who had dissented from the Report, he wished to explain the reason of his dissent. He could not agree with the hon. Member for Walsall that Mitchell had been heard before the Committee in his own defence. It was not until the fourth day that Mitchell was before them, and he then, in answer to the Chairman, stated that he had only just seen the evidence. That was in consequence of a notice of Motion which he (Mr. Hennessy) had given that Mitchell should be furnished with a copy. The Chairman asked him whether he wished to see any particular evidence. He said he should like to see Mr. Strutts; in fact, that he should like to see it all. The whole of the evidence (fifty printed pages) was then given him, and he was told to retire and read it over, and if he desired to make any statement upon it that he could apply to be re-admitted. Then, Mr. Graham was called in, and cross-examined behind Mitchell's back, in his absence, although he desired to be confronted with him. This was a course which would not have been committed in any court of law. [Mr. FORSTER: We sent for him to come next day.] Yes, the next day Mitchell was to have been confronted with Graham, but then Graham was not forthcoming. Another point on which he dissented from the hon. Gentleman was that no questions had been put which would not have been put in a criminal court of justice. On the contrary, the vast majority of questions were such as no Judge would have allowed to be put. For instance, the hon. and learned Member for Suffolk, in Mitchell's absence, asked whether a certain signature looked like Mitchell's. The witness said, "I have seen two handwritings more unlike than this, but I would not swear to it," and then the hon. and learned Member put these questions—

"You are not asked to swear to it. Do attend to the form of the question. You have stated that you are well acquainted with the character of Mitchell's handwriting. Look carefully at that signature of the name of 'Hawes,' and state whether you have any belief, or can form any judgment, one way or the other, as to whether that is in Mitchell's handwriting. Do not appeal to anybody else, but exercise your own judgment. From your knowledge of the character of Mitchell's handwriting (and you have apparently some of his handwriting in your hand), do you see any resemblance so as to enable you to form a belief one way or the other?—Well, I should not like to swear.

"You are not sworn, you are only asked to speak to your actual belief. Do you see any sufficient resemblance to his handwriting to enable you to form a belief one way or the other?—I should not like to swear to it. I would not swear to it on any account."

And the hon. and gallant Member for Ayrshire (Sir Robert Anstruther) put this question—

"But do you think that it is not so wholly dissimilar as to make you say, in your judgment, that it might not be written by him?—Decidedly not."

The expert, Mr. Nethercliffe, was called in and said he found traces of Mitchell's handwriting in the signatures to the petitions, and on the strength of his evidence the Committee found that they were forgeries. After Mr. Nethercliffe's examination Mitchell was called in, and, in reply to questions put to him, stated that he had not before seen the report of the evidence given on the previous day, and that he was most anxious to get copies of the names which Mr. Nethercliffe had pointed to as being fictitious. The list of names was handed to him. [An hon. MEMBER: Who handed them to him?] He (Mr. Hennessy) put them into Mitchell's hand, and he said it was necessary for his defence that he should have an opportunity of calling the persons whose names were on the list. The room was then cleared, and a Motion was proposed declaring that the Committee had heard enough of evidence. To that Motion he (Mr. Hennessy) moved an Amendment declaring that Mitchell should have an opportunity of calling the persons whose names were on the list, and whom he wished to examine. His Amendment was lost by a majority of two, four voting against and two for it; and a subsequent Amendment for delaying the drawing up of the Report was lost by a similar majority. On the day the Committee met to consider their Report Mitchell was in attendance, with the names of the witnesses whom he wished to examine; but the Committee declined to hear further evidence. He had never seen Mitchell till he came before the Committee for examination, and since then he had not seen him till to-day, when Mitchell came to him in the lobby and handed him a list of names, saying he was prepared to prove by witnesses that in some of the cases referred to by Mr. Nethercliffe the parties had authorized him to sign for them, and that in others the petitioners had signed their own names. He added that he had had permission to sign for Graham. The man whom it was proposed to send to Newgate had been denied the opportunity of defending himself, and had been condemned upon unsworn evidence taken behind his back, and in a manner wholly contrary to the privileges and practice of the courts of criminal law of this country. Having served on the Committee, he was loath to move any Amendment himself, but he hoped the House would not agree to the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Walsall.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that in his reading of history he had come across a decision very like the present. In 1793 there were jurors appointed by the Committee of Public Safety, and they were told they need not hear evidence, as they were already sufficiently informed in the case which were to come before them. They did so, and people were executed under their decisions. If the statement of the hon. Member who had just spoken was correct, that was precisely what this Committee had done. He did not know one word about this matter, but the House were exercising a great penal power, and he advised them not to take one step without carefully considering to what it would lead. The accused said, and he was supported by a Member of that House that he had been denied the opportunity of being heard. The hon. Member for Walsall (Mr. Charles Forster) said the man had had every opportunity of being heard. He (Mr. Roebuck) wanted to know which of these statements was right. He was there a most helpless individual. He was at the mercy of the hon. Member for Walsall and the hon. Member behind him. One Gentleman declared distinctly that every opportunity had been given to the man of being heard, and the other declared as distinctly that the Committee decided that he should not be heard. They sat in that House as the representatives of a great body of people, whose pride was the impartiality of their Courts of Justice; they were about to exercise one the privileges of a court of justice, and send a man to prison; and were they not bound to take the same course of proceeding that a court of justice followed? He unhesitatingly appealed to the House to say in this matter that the House was not sufficiently informed.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he had, at the instance of several hon. Members, and also as a public duty, consented to serve on this Committee, and he must beg therefore to say a few words. The allegation was that in the great number of petitions, in eighteen from the metropolis and double or treble that number from other parts of the country, which had been presented in favour of the claims of Prince Azeem Jah, many of the signatures were fictitious. Inquiring as to the way in which these petitions got into the hands of the Members by whom they were presented, they found that Mr. Strutt, an agent of the prince, had been sending a number of petitions out to different parts of the country for signatures, but unfortunately he had also employed one or two persons to obtain signatures in the metropolis, one of those persons being Mr. Mitchell, who was formerly a servant of that House. As he (Sir FitzRoy Kelly) had submitted a Motion in support of the case of Prince Azeem Jah, it would of course have given him the greatest satisfaction if it had turned out that the charge of fabricating signatures was groundless; but in the course of a careful and impartial investigation it was clear to anyone who used his eyes that a number of the signatures to the petitions presented from the metropolis were in one handwriting. A great many of the signatures appeared to be in the handwriting of one person, and the resemblance to Mr. Mitchell's handwriting was such, that no Member of the Committee could for a moment have entertained the slightest doubt that that person was the fabricator of those signatures. Every opportunity had been afforded to Mitchell to make any statement in defence, but his answers to the Committee, from first to last, were evasive in the extreme, and on the last occasion when his attention was directed to the fact that there were nine or ten signatures to a particular petition which were represented to be in his handwriting, and he was asked whether he had anything to say, he was silent for a while, and ultimately gave some evasive answer. The Committee then reported that signatures to the amount of some hundreds had been annexed to the petition, and having compared them with the handwriting of Mitchell, they had no doubt that great numbers of those signatures were by his hand. He had gone into the Committee with an earnest desire to discharge his duty to the best of his ability, and he believed that their proceedings had throughout been conducted with great fairness and patience. He should at present be glad to find the House disposed to take a mild and merciful view of the case; but he felt bound to support the Motion of his hon. Friend.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he trusted that those hon. Members who had shown impatience during this discussion would bear in mind that they were dealing, not with an abstract question, but with a question affecting the liberty of a fellow subject. The question was, whether they should send a man to Newgate, and it would be a disgrace to the House of Commons if such a question were not entertained in the most patient and impartial temper. His hon. and learned Friend who had just sat down (Sir FitzRoy Kelly) stated that Mitchell had ample opportunity of giving evidence before the Committee. But that was the very point on which the House had to decide; and any one who read the evidence must, as it seemed to him, arrive at the opposite conclusion. Mitchell was examined on the last day the Committee sat, and he then declared that he desired two things—first, that he should have an opportunity of cross-examining his accuser; and, secondly, that he should be allowed to produce witnesses to show that the evidence of Mr. Nethercliffe was erroneous. One would naturally imagine that such a request would at once be complied with; but the answer of the Committee was that “they had already evidence enough to report to the House the result of the inquiry.” Under these circumstances he could not vote for depriving that man of his liberty; and he begged to move, as an Amendment, that the Report be referred back to the same Committee.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “the Report of the Committee be re-committed to the said Committee,”—(Lord Robert Cecil),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that it would be as inexpedient for the House hastily to adopt the course suggested by the noble Lord as that proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, because if there was one thing more desirable than another it was that the confidence of the House should not be unduly withheld from Committees to whom it referred inquiries of this description. The observation of the noble Lord led him to the conclusion that he had not very long or very fully or completely perused the evidence taken by this Committee, because there appeared to be parts of it to which his attention had not yet been directed. The proposition which he intended to make to the House was that they should not at that moment come to any conclusion, but that the debate should be adjourned for such a time as would enable hon. Members who desired to do justice both to the individual accused and to the Committee of that House to read the evidence and judge for themselves. It was, however, only due to the Committee that he should say that, although he had not been able to examine the evidence so carefully and deliberately as he should desire, he had, during the progress of the debate, discovered on the face of it some things which had not yet been mentioned, and which convinced him that the House would act both unwisely and unjustly if it was to assume that the Committee had dealt with Mr. Mitchell in the manner which had been represented by those who were only imperfectly acquainted with what had passed. He found from Mr. Mitchell's own statement that on the day on which his hon. Friend the Member for Walsall presented to the House the Report of the Committee on Public Petitions his attention was fully directed to his own position in regard to the matter. Before the Select Committee was appointed, he called upon the hon. Member for Walsall, and represented that Mr. Strutt had said that he had got into a mess about the petitions, and had asked him to take the ~~onus~~ entirely upon himself. The hon. Gentleman, as the House would imagine, replied that he could only deal with the matter as a Member of that House, and as the House directed. It was, therefore, clear that Mr. Mitchell knew what was his position, and how he would or might be affected by the inquiry. His friends also urged him to appear. [Mr. HENNESSY: What friends?] Mr. Wyatt, his attorney, stated that on the day on which Mitchell was served with the Order of the House he advised him to attend the Committee. Mitchell was served with the Order of the House at the place of residence known to his employer; but he was not there, and there could be no doubt that from the time that the Committee sat till the day on which he was brought before them he was purposely keeping out of the way. The House had been led to suppose that there was no direct evidence against him; but more than one gentleman whose signature had been forged stated, some of them in the presence of Mr. Mitchell, that their names had been appended without their authority to petitions which had passed through his hands. Mitchell did not attempt to deny this, but said that he had employed clerks under him, and denied that he had himself forged any signatures. He was told that he should have the fullest opportunity of producing those clerks, but he said that it was the affair of the Committee, and appeared to think that he had better do nothing unless ordered. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving that the debate should be adjourned until to-morrow.

MR. W. O. STANLEY, as a Member of the Committee, said, that Mitchell had been convicted of forging signatures to petitions from Pimlico, from Westminster, and from another place, the evidence as to which he made no attempt to disprove.

BOROUGH FRANCHISE EXTENSION BILL—[BILL 32.]

ADJOURNED DEBATE. SECOND NIGHT.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Previous Question [proposed 3rd May], "That the Question, 'That the Bill be now read a second time,' be now put." —(Lord Elcho.)

MR. GREGORY said, he thought it must have struck every one who had either heard or read the debate of last Wednesday that accusations of insincerity were scattered with most remarkable profusion by almost every Liberal speaker upon almost every Liberal Member of the House. First, his noble Friend below him (Lord Elcho) accused the hon. Member who introduced the Bill (Mr. Baines) of being insincere, because on an occasion for testing the Liberal opinion of the House selected by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White) he bolted from the House, and that with so much precipitation as to prevent the hon. Member with whom he came in contact from continuing the performance of his Parliamentary duties for that evening. Then the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) turned his attention to the Government, who, he said, were "deceitful above all things," and that the President of the Board of Trade was the "most desperately wicked" of them all. Not to be outdone, his hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Bernal Osborne) got up and said that the Government no doubt was insincere, but that all the so called Liberals in that House were just as insincere as the Government; and he (Mr. Gregory) was convinced that if there had been time for another Reformer to have addressed the House on that occasion, he would have declared that the three kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland were just as rotten and insincere upon this question of Reform as the hon. Member for Leeds, the Government, and the Liberal Members who sat around him. He read a book the other day written by an American which was full of pleasant conceits, and in which it was said that the horse was a most respectable animal, but somehow or other he was always managed and looked after by a set of rogues. Now he (Mr. Gregory) could not help thinking that that observation would apply to Reform. Reform was a very respectable thing in itself, but somehow or other it appeared to him always to be managed and looked after by a set of — insincere Gentlemen. The hon. Member for Leeds and the Liberal Members could protect themselves; but it appeared to him that the Government was unable to do so, and, therefore, although the other night the Chancellor of the Exchequer accused him of a disposition to pelt the Administration, he was about to stand up in their defence. In his opinion the Government had acted with regard to this question of Reform both with wisdom and with sincerity. They gave a pledge to bring in a Bill, and they brought a Bill in. They said that they would endeavour to carry a Bill, and he believed that they intended to carry it; but when they found that they had to contend not only with the formidable opposition of hon. Gentlemen opposite, which they were prepared to meet, but also with every obstacle which could be thrown in the way of the measure by their habitual supporters on that side of the House; when they found that the opinion of Members on that side, as expressed to them in conversation, was hostile to the Bill; and when they saw that the feeling throughout the country was one of perfect indifference, he thought that they were wise not to endeavour to force the measure down the throats of an unwilling House of Commons and an indifferent public. Now, upon the question of insincerity of which hon. Members had heard so much, he must say he firmly believed that the feeling on his own side of the House was not, as a general rule, in favour of such a Bill as that under discussion. He was no advocate of the Ballot, but he must admit that he should be glad to see that process, were such a thing possible, put into operation in the House of Commons on the present question. If that were done, and if the question put were whether the Reform Bill of the hon. Member for Leeds should be staved off for ten years, he believed that the revolution of opinion which would be observable on the Liberal side of the House would be something perfectly astounding, and not only that, but he felt assured that the verdict which would be pronounced would be received with the greatest complacency by the country. The reason why that would be so was sufficiently clear. The various constituencies, like the House of Commons, were pretty evenly divided, and very little was required in order to throw the balance into one scale or the other. In every constituency there was a small, active, noisy body of politicians who had considerable weight in the elections; and those gentlemen persuaded themselves—and, what was worse, persuaded others—that they were the sole high priests and depositories of Liberal traditions and opinions. When, therefore, any candidate happened not to come up to their standard, they declared that he was below the regulation height of Liberalism, and the result was that many candidates were induced to give pledges which they did not like when given, and which they devoutly hoped they might never be called upon to fulfil. On the other hand, in those constituencies, there were men who had fought the battle of Reform from their youth upwards, who had advocated the great changes which had been introduced into the Constitution of the country, not for the sake of change, but because the state of things was so utterly intolerable before the passing of the Reform Bill that they preferred almost the risk of a revolution than that they should remain as they were. It would have been impossible for them to have effected those remedies which were so sorely needed in every joint of our social and political system, without the most extensive alteration in the composition of the House of Commons.

These men, who were the fiercest and the foremost in the cause of Reform, are now looking at the effects of their work, and if they rest it was not because of any repentance of their past course, or from any unwillingness to move forward hereafter in the path of progress, should they deem further reforms to be necessary. They but act as Englishmen were wont to act in matters of the kind—with instinctive prudence and moderation. They turn their eyes aside from mere theories and abstract argument, and when they look at the great edifice of liberty and prosperity reared up in the country they were content, and did not, like Frenchmen, seek to pull such a fabric to the ground in order that each man might build it up again in accordance with some theory of his own. Such was the secret, in his opinion, of what was called Conservative re-action, and the election of so many so-called Palmerstonian Conservatives, that is, men quite prepared to move on with the times, but not prepared without rhyme or reason to run violently down steep places and be choked in the sea of democracy and universal suffrage. Now, his right hon. Friend the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) in the speech which he had made on Wednesday last had shown he thought as clearly as reasoning could accomplish, that the present Bill must, if adopted, be a step in that direction. Nay, more, not only would the Bill be the first step in the direction of universal suffrage, but universal suffrage must be the inevitable consequence of its passing into a law. That proposition he would not attempt to prove by any abstract argument. It was sufficient for him to say that the transfer of power from one stratum of society to another—which he would prove the Bill would effect—must have the result for the proof of which he was contending. In the first place, there was not one single logical argument, if they descend to the £6 franchise, on which any one could rely to escape going on to manhood, or even to womanhood suffrage; in the second place, once power was transferred from one class to another no one had any interest in limiting the number of that new class. In Finsbury and the Tower Hamlets, for instance, the whole electoral power lay in the £10 voters, and it made no earthly difference whether there were 23,000 or 45,000 in the former, or 50,000 instead of 25,000 in the latter. It should also be borne in mind that the working classes through their representatives most distinctly announced that even if they accepted the present Bill they would do so looking upon it only as an instalment—that it was utterly unsatisfactory, and that the moment it passed there would be a renewal of their agitation. Witness the Bradford petition and the words of Mr. Potter to the hon. Member for Birmingham, informing him that the working classes would not go with him for anything short of manhood suffrage. He had had a pamphlet presented to him a few days ago written by a gentleman who was well known for his extremely liberal opinions, who, he believed, possessed the confidence of the working classes, who wrote with great vigour on their behalf, and who, in speaking of half measures, and the Bill of the hon. Member for Leeds, said—

“The speakers at the late Bradford meeting, Mr. Stansfeld, Sir F. Crossley, Mr. Baines, and Mr. Forster, pleaded for no more (Mr. Stansfeld alone gave advice which would secure more) than the partial enfranchisement plan—a policy which palters with the popular hope, which fears to look the light in the face, which offers the least measure that can be called an improvement, settles nothing, and perpetuates the old disappointment.

. . . No partial enfranchisement can produce direct political improvement unless large enough to effect a substantial transfer of power.

. . . There may be no reason to refuse partial enfranchisement; but it would be as indecent in the working classes to exult in it as it would be in ten men who were taken from a wreck by a choice of the captain, and who should throw up their caps in the face of all those left to their fate.”

These were the words of Mr. Holyoake. Now, that was, he thought, the best answer which could be given to the statement of the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) that the present was a measure liberal and broad enough to meet the requirements of the time. Those, then, he maintained, who advocated such a change as the Bill proposed ought to be prepared to show, first of all, in what the Reform Bill had failed; they must show that the House of Commons had neither the power nor the desire to take the necessary steps in the path of progress; that the country under the present system does not advance as it ought to do in wealth and power; that the wants and wishes of the masses are neglected; that ability and intelligence are crushed down by the depressing influence of rank and social distinctions, and that it was, therefore, expedient that political power should be transferred from the classes now possessing it—the upper and middle—to the lower classes. That being done, it rested with the advocates of the Bill to show that the proposed transfer would result in an equal or a greater amount of liberty than that at present enjoyed, in the production of more correct notions with regard to commerce and the imposition of taxation, and in as good a guarantee for peace and general security. When he was convinced that such would be the operation of the Bill he should have the greatest pleasure in voting for the second reading; but until then he should continue to be as obstinate and impenitent as he was at that moment. He had stated that the Bill would have the effect of transferring the power in boroughs from the upper and middle to the lower classes. It was admitted that the number of borough voters was at present 440,000; but if from that number the metropolitan and University constituencies, which would be scarcely at all increased under the Bill, were deducted, there would remain only 275,000; to which would be added by the Bill, according to calculations which have been made, about 240,000. Of that number it had been proved by the papers which had been laid before the House of Lords that two-thirds occupied houses of a rental between £6 and £8. How, then, he should like to know, could it be contended that the Bill would not effect in boroughs a transfer of power from those who now possessed it to a different class? In thirty of the larger constituencies the addition would be from 100 to 400 per cent, all of whom would consist of the lowest classes. The difficulty would then be to prevent the matter from going further. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer were correct in saying that on those who exclude from the franchise rests the onus of proving unfitness, how could any one except a ticket-of-leave man be excluded? If they extended the franchise to £6, a man renting a house at £5 10s. might oftentimes with reason urge that he was better educated, that he contributed equally to the revenue of the State, or drank more pots of beer, than his neighbour who possessed the franchise because he rented a £6 house. The whole question was, in reality, one of expediency, and it was from their overlooking this fact that the Gentlemen who argued the matter upon abstract grounds involved themselves in such difficulties. Looking at the question in an abstract point of view he felt disposed to agree with Mr. Mill in his advocacy not only of a manhood but also a womanhood suffrage—he could see no reason why Miss Martineau or Miss Cobbe should not be as competent to elect Members of Parliament as any individual of the present constituencies. Mr. Mill could conceive nothing more abhorrent to his mind than the domination of one class over another, and in order to prevent that domination arising from his proposed extension of the suffrage he had proposed a system of make-weights, balances, complexities, and perplexities, which the country never would tolerate for one moment. He (Mr. Gregory) believed that if they accepted the measure before them they accepted at the same time an almost immediate advance to, an enormous and unrestricted suffrage, and they ought to be prepared to look the result steadily in the face. He was perfectly aware that those who did not approve the Bill were charged with being unwilling to admit the working classes to a share in the representation. That charge, however, was unfounded. He himself could have accepted the pledge of 1859 without the slightest hesitation or misgiving. He was prepared for the extension of the franchise both in boroughs and counties, because he believed that the admission of a considerable number of the working classes would be of the greatest advantage. He believed that they would find among the working classes a greater amount of honesty of purpose, a greater independence of thought, and a greater probability of their being guided in their selection of representatives less by motives of petty self-interest than influenced many among those holding the £10 franchise. He would be quite prepared himself to advocate any measure which after due inquiry would extend the suffrage to the most respected and most trustworthy of the working classes. This was exactly the point, however, for which this Bill did not satisfactorily provide. To call those illiberal in their views who opposed the Bill simply because of that opposition was to do nothing more than to confuse Liberalism with Democracy. Liberalism was a process of the mind, Democracy a form of Government. There might be Liberalism without Democracy, and unquestionably there might be Democracy without Liberalism. He believed if the most enlightened of the working men were consulted as to the manner in which the deserving of their class should be admitted to a participation in the electoral franchise, they would declare themselves in favour of some kind of fancy franchise, though no one appeared yet to have decided what that franchise should be. He was emboldened to make this statement from what had been written by Mr. Holyoake. ["Oh!"] An hon. Member exclaimed "Oh," but it should be remembered that Mr. Holyoake was an out-and-out, root-and-branch, Radical. The pamphlet before him contained numerous allusions to the "serfs" and the "slaves," who at present had no share in the election of our representatives, and the admission which he would quote was therefore all the more valuable. Mr. Holyoake said—

"The National Reform Union of Manchester does propose an extension of the suffrage 'to every householder or lodger rated or liable to be rated for the relief of the poor.' A Bill which included all this would do and would end the agitation. But there is no such Bill drawn. There is no Member who would introduce it. Nor is there any probability of carrying it. The Union gives no sign of preparation or persistency for carrying it. It would require a revolution to carry it. The Union does not mean this. It does not even confront, nor even discuss the grounds of opposition to such a Bill. Its programme runs in the old, tiresome, tame, wearying, struggling, discouraging Radical rut. It proposes a suffrage without guarantees for its qualified action. It gives to the working class the numerical majority. I am not one who believe that the working class would ever vote down the men of property and education. But they might do so. No absolute guarantee can be given that they never would do so, and the men of property and intelligence would have, if this Bill passed, to trust to this event not occurring. They would hold their liberty and interests on sufferance. They would be in the same position in which the unenfranchised now are. Objecting myself to hold my liberty on sufferance, I should be most reluctant to put this risk on the educated and wealthy class. No class ought to be put in this position. No class ought to submit to it. Now, this is the real dilemma which exists. This dilemma the National Reform Union neither recognizes nor provides for. This formidable difficulty no Radical orator meets. This is why the Reform question stagnates and remains where it is. Everybody at times feels this difficulty, yet no one on the side of Radical Reform dares look it in the face, or has the courage to state it, or attempt to meet it. How can it be met except by adopting Mr. Mill's proposal of giving the wealthy and educated classes the protection of cumulative votes? or by acting on Earl Grey's suggestion of giving to the unenfranchised classes a special number of Members who should share in the representation without swamping it? Liberal M.P.'s and the Liberal press appear to have set their faces against such indispensable plans, caricaturing them as 'fancy franchises' as though a vast and protective suffrage, which obviated an overwhelming difficulty, could be so described."

"I know towns where ardent Reformers are themselves afraid of an unqualified suffrage. Good Radicals, the most thorough of their class, have said to me, 'There is a mob in our town (there is in every town), ignorant, selfish, venal, and reckless of principle; had they all votes, our present Liberal Members would be unseated at the next election. They would vote against those who seek to raise them.' This is a general feeling in Liberal boroughs. Now there is no plan of a £6 suffrage which selects the worthy and excludes the base. All £6 suffrage is blind; and hence we have Radicals arguing feebly and fearing much the result of the very measure they plead for. Surely this is political imbecility. This is the real dilemma which ought to be put an end to by adopting a plan of protective suffrage, of which the only opponents are Radicals whose policy has long undergone petresfaction."

In a question of such vital importance as the one before the House he believed it to be necessary to make various inquiries among the working classes themselves, with a view to discover in what manner their wishes would be most satisfactorily met. He believed this could be effected. He believed that a plan might be devised for admitting the best of the working classes to the franchise—he should be glad to see them admitted into that House in the ordinary course of representation. He never did entertain the sentiment so prominent in the mouths of Whig politicians, "Everything for the people, but nothing by the people." For his own part, he would wish to see the representatives of labour confronted with the representatives of capital, and he felt quite sure they would always receive at the hands of the House of Commons that attention to which they were entitled. But he maintained that if this could only be accomplished by the disenfranchisement of proprietors, merchants, bankers, manufacturers, professional men, and the more intelligent shopkeepers of England, the non-admission of some of the working classes was of the two the preferable evil. If the former classes were disfranchised they would be disfranchised for good, whereas the working classes, owing to their prosperity, the enormous rise in wages—the opening of foreign commerce, the opportunities presented to every man of character and intelligence—might, at least in a great number of cases, qualify themselves to become members of the electoral body. He remembered a conversation he once had with one of the most clear-headed men he ever knew—the late Sir Benjamin Brodie—who was what was called an advanced Liberal; but upon this question of the suffrage he was inexorable. Adopting the views of his noble Friend (Lord Elcho) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne, Sir Benjamin Brodie called this a "pot of beer" question, that half the workmen now excluded from the franchise could obtain it by the sacrifice of a few pots of beer during the year, and he maintained that it was for those who sought to gain admission to the franchise to show that they were qualified, and the best test of qualification would be a power of self-restraint. Sir Benjamin Brodie was not of the opinion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the onus of proof rested with those who wanted to withhold the franchise, but that it lay with those who asked for it; and no better proof could be given than that frugality and care which enabled a man to raise himself in the social scale.

There were certain matters upon which all Liberals were agreed, certain great objects which all sought to attain and maintain—among the chief of these were liberty, peace, enlightened views with regard to commerce and the distribution of taxation, and the purity of election. He would invite the House to consider, before they passed this Bill, how these matters stood in countries where democratic institutions existed. First, as to the question of liberty—liberty to think, liberty to write, liberty to speak whatever the mind might suggest. Let them look at the great Republic of the West, and he would ask, without in the least intending to say anything at all disrespectful, whether thought itself there was not paralyzed and utterance checked unless such thought and utterance happened to run on the groove of what was called popular opinion. Take one illustration—during the last few years in America even, imputation which malice could suggest had been unsparingly lavished upon England, and yet the friends of the North in that House had always said that we did not know the real American feeling, and that there was a strong under-current in favour of England. He believed that to be true; but what a comment was afforded upon the want of liberty that existed in that country as regarded the free expression of opinion when it was found that, throughout the United States, not a single man had ventured to raise up his voice and say, "You are traducing and maligning a country which, under the most unparalleled pressure from at home and abroad, has striven to maintain a perfect neutrality." How different was our case during the Russian war. There was no attempt to stifle the expression of opinions on the part of Mr. Cobden and others who opposed that war; but the statement of their views, though utterly opposed to popular opinion, was received with respectful attention. Then, as to the question of peace. His hon. Friend near him (Mr. Baines) said, if the Bill passed the chances of peace would be increased and the dangers of intervention would be lessened. He knew it had been said that wars were entered into for the purpose of providing dignities and advantages for the sons of the upper classes; but he would ask whether as much blood had been poured out and treasure wasted in the whole course of Wellington's campaigns as had been lavished during the last four years of war in America—and yet, according to the dictum of Earl Russell, the war in America was waged for purposes of Empire, and certainly that could not be in any degree imputed to the Duke of Wellington's wars. Let him, however, not seek illustrations from American doings, but from what had occurred very recently at home. When the Polish insurrection broke out meetings were held all over England by the trades' unions, and resolutions in favour of going to war with Russia were passed. He remembered being present when a number of trade delegates met the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) at the head of the Government in the lobby of the House. They came to express the wishes of the bodies with which they were connected, that war should be waged against Russia. The noble Lord asked them had they well weighed the scope of their demands, whether they were aware that war meant increased taxation, diminished employment, disturbance of capital and other serious evils; and they replied that they were quite aware of these things, but that still they desired that we should go to war. He did not mean to deny that if the Government of this country had been exclusively in the hands of the upper classes we might not last year have engaged in a war for Denmark against Germany; but that showed the danger to be in either extreme, and he rejoiced that the Government was neither in the hands of an aristocracy nor of a democracy, but on the broad basis on which it at present rests. Then as to commerce. He would ask those who supported this Bill whether they believed that by extending the suffrage or by transferring power to the working classes more enlightened views would prevail upon the subjects of commerce and the distribution of the national burdens. Why, when in America the Free Trade South broke loose from the Protectionist North, the first proceeding of the latter was to establish a prohibitive tariff of the severest character. The Western States—producing States—agreed to sacrifice their interests to those of the iron manufacturers of Pennsylvania, and all America clothed itself in shoddy for the benefit of the cotton-spinners of New England. He was aware that the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) said that that was the doing of the middle classes in the United States, and that "the commercial classes of America, like the same classes in other countries, from the uncertainty of their possessions and the fluctuations of their interests, are always timid and almost always corrupt." They seemed to have conquered their timidity, but they might have remained timid and corrupt to all eternity, and the prohibitive tariff would not have passed, but for the innate proueness of the multitude to protection in every ramification of the commercial system. What were they to think of the political wisdom of a country in which Mr. Sumner, one of the burning and shining lights of New England, in advocating the repeal of the Reciprocity Treaty, gravely announced that the American producer annually paid as a gift to Canada 17,000,000 dollars, because the Customs' duties on American manufactures came to that amount. But they need not draw examples of the tendency of the multitude towards this short-sighted and selfish policy from America alone. If we looked to our great Australian colonies, where the Government was in the hands of the masses, what did we find? There we have no small boroughs, no restricted franchise, no open voting; it was what the Americans called clear grit, and no mistake. They are the example so continually held up to us. We are told we are in our dotage, and should be guided by our children—and what were they doing? Why, they were making "ducks and drakes" of all those principles which free traders had been urging for so many years. It was no wonder that the Associated Chambers of Commerce were scandalized and astonished, and that the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), to whom they appealed, was equally astonished and grieved. He was informed that a successful endeavour had been made to impose a protective duty upon every article of consumption that was manufactured in Victoria, and so determined were they to maintain a protective system that they would not allow a Bill to pass which was intended to remedy the inequality of the sexes in that colony. Here was an extract from an Australian local paper—

“An effort was made by Mr. O'Shanassy, in the Assembly, to obtain a grant of £50,000 this year in aid of assisted female immigration. We regret to say the proposition was defeated, partly through the opposition of the Government, but chiefly through the selfishness of the ultra-democratic section of the House. It is a fact that the males in our population outnumber the females by no less than 150,000. Of course, good female servants are scarce, and in demand at rates of wages varying from £30 to £40 a year. The want of a continuous flow of immigration into our territory is one of the main causes of those occasional perils of stagnation in trade and commerce of which the mercantile community, both here and at home, have reason to complain. It really seems at present to be hopeless to expect anything like generous, public-spirited, and far-sighted legislation from our Assembly. This is one of the penalties which must everywhere be sometimes set against the enjoyment of perfect popular freedom.”

No doubt some one would say—It is unfair to reason from the acts of people born and bred in a new wild country, a country so backward in its physical conformation that it may reflect some of its own backwardness on its inhabitants. It must be remembered that the men who do these things were born in England, that they have in Australia the same instincts and prejudices they had in England; and the same class in England would exercise their power in the same way as they were doing in Australia. One argument had been used, that though the mass of working men might make bad representatives they would be sure to choose good men. He had a letter from Australia, in which there was the following passage, describing the class of persons chosen in Australia:—

“We have all been aghast, like England, I suppose, at Gladstone's Reform speech. What does he mean by talking of lowering the franchise? If he had seen it work, as we have in these colonies, to our bitter cost, he would not have talked such —.” Here was a complimentary epithet he would not repeat. “We have had our Parliament dishonoured and degraded by the wretched place-hunters and demagogues that a low suffrage has forced into power, and Victoria is trying to retrace her steps and to raise the suffrage again as the only path to legislative respectability and efficiency. We have seen here the best men among us, of position, education, public spirit, stainless integrity, beaten hollow by publicans, railway porters, ex-ploughmen, stump orators, and adventurers of every grade. People in England who do not know the colonies often say or think, ‘Oh, but things are so different in the colonies!’ and picture our ‘best men’ successful diggers, or vulgar rich people but little above what Radicals call ‘the people.’ You know it is not so. You know what sort of men Haines, Sladen, Farie, Sturt, Slawell, Macknight, and others of the same stamp are. Well, under vote by ballot and universal suffrage there is not one of these, except Haines (and some men always get in), that would have the ghost of a chance with the lowest ruffian who had money enough to pay for nobblers, or words enough to tell lies to an ignorant and selfish mob.”

He appealed to the hon. Member for Salisbury whether that was a correct representation of the facts. [Mr. MARSH: Hear, hear!] The Chancellor of the Exchequer said it would be centuries before the English people would act in the spirit of democracy, or would forget the old traditional reverential feelings; but he forgot that, of all the States, Virginia, the first founded, and in which there were some old ties and a local aristocracy, went fastest down the steep when democratic institutions were introduced into America. The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) had argued that the radical differences of opinion were so great among working men that they would perpetually differ among themselves, and that there would be every chance of a Tory slipping in. Certainly, if they looked at what had occurred in the late strike, they would find the working men did differ, but it was the wisest and most moderate of them who were overruled; and when any great class question arose could there be a doubt but that there would be the most complete union among them? On one point they had been distinctly warned—that on one point there would be a complete union among them, and that was the re-adjustment of taxation which had been sketched out by the hon. Member for Birmingham in very clear terms. Here was an extract from a speech of that hon. Gentleman, which foreshadowed that union—

“Every man who goes to your colonies repudiates your policy, repudiates your debts, and thanks Heaven that he has at last found a country where industry can have its reward, and where men calling themselves statesmen are not using every engine of Government to deprive him of the produce of his industry and to diminish the comforts and independence of his family. And you, landed proprietors of England, remember that, however many of your countrymen may emigrate, your acres remain, and you will have by-and-by a different tone in this House after another reform in Parliament. Your succession duties will be overhauled, and will not be got rid of so easily as at present. Your property tax, which you are assisting the Chancellor of the Exchequer to throw over, will come back in an increased proportion. When they have the power, as they shortly will, to lay taxes on those who have spent the money, you may depend on it the poor will not always go to the wall, and the rich will not always escape."

The last point on which he would touch was one on which all Liberals were united—purity of election. Mr. Holyoake said that bribery was the rich man's convenience, and would never be put down by a rich man's Parliament; but here was a spirited description of what happened at an American election which he had cut out of the New York Times—

"Providence, Wednesday, April 4, 1860. Beyond a doubt the continued Democratic and Conservative Republican Ticket is successful in this State. The greatest excitement has attended the election, and every device which party tactics could suggest has been employed by both parties to secure their success. The open purchase of votes has been a remarkable feature of the day. The voters when led up to the ballot-box would with one hand drop the ticket, and with the other receive the bribe. The negro vote rated high, some coloured brethren receiving fifty dollars each. Individuals of comparative wealth declined to vote unless paid to do so. Voters publicly put themselves up for purchase. Bids would commence at ten dollars and run up to fifty dollars. Great goodhumour and merriment prevailed all day. The excitement was intense. Bands of music, banners, decorated waggons, and hired conveyances of every description paraded the streets from early morning till now. The announcement of Padelford's unsuccessful attempt to bribe the town clerk of Cranstone undoubtedly lost him a large vote. In other towns wholesale bribery was even more open and outrageous. Bonfires, cannon, liquor, cash, and excitement abound. The Democrats are rejoicing that, with their registry taxes all paid by the Union party, they will go into the Presidential fight stronger than ever. Good order has been maintained throughout. Everybody drinks, but everybody appears to be used to it."

All these things had been well considered during the last few years and had sunk deep into the heart of every reflecting man. That was the reason why the cry for Reform had fallen cold and dead upon the country. A few honest, well-meaning enthusiasts had been for the last few years flogging the dead horse, but not a stir could they get out of him. Every honest and intelligent member of the working classes knows that he can and will obtain the suffrage, and though he may be anxious to extend it, yet he cares not to lower it to the level of the ignorant and debased. The real danger to the Constitution did not arise from the discontent of those who had not the franchise, but from the apathy of those who had it. They would give up resistance because there was clamour; but it was fear which magnified that clamour. He asked them to call to mind some of the questions on which there really had been clamour in this country. Let them take the Ballot. They remembered when it was the test and stamp of the true Liberal, and that it was actually carried by a majority of the House. What was it now? The subject of one speech each year. The question was always disposed of before dinner time, and even the most advanced Liberals in the House cracked their joke upon it. Then let them look at the Church. Thirty years ago many Churchmen were ready to give the struggle up as lost; pamphlets were written which declared that the Church was at an end, and a large party in the Church were ready for a dismemberment which seemed inevitable. But in what position was the anti-Church agitation now? Why had it failed? Because the Church had struck its roots deep into the hearts and affections of the people. Hon. Gentlemen warned them not to be deceived by the ominous and suspicious quiet which now prevailed, and reminded them of former days—of what happened before the passing of the Bill of 1832. But the House knew perfectly well what was the state of things at that time. Intolerable abuses existed; there were sinecures and pensions; the narrow, jobbing, municipal system which prevailed came home to the feelings of every single individual, and the country was aroused and was thoroughly in earnest. But what was the condition of the country now? There was tranquillity everywhere, and upon every subject, and that tranquillity was due to the conviction that there was a House of Commons able and willing to deal with every abuse and grievance. To talk of the great agitation of 1832, when Birmingham threatened to march on London with "the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill," and to compare that with the cackling of Leeds at the appearance of this young David of Reform who with a few little round pebbles from the brook, offered to give battle to the anti-Reform Philistines, which it was to be presumed the Leeds people felt unable to do themselves. And now when Mr. Mill offered himself for Westminster, even with a certificate from Mr. Beales, he has found it necessary, as it appears, to have it countersigned by Lord Amberley. It is not by duodecimo politicians such as this that organic changes in England's Constitution were to be made. The stern, earnest Reformers of 1832 were different from this. They were something more than catalogues of complaints, encyclopædias of unimportant facts, common-place books of crochets and devices to settle the most momentous questions. Such men as England had in 1832 England always would have when she was aroused; but such men England had not now because she was not aroused; and it was because he believed England would not be roused to the support of such propositions as those contained in the measure now before the House—that she would not endanger the great edifice of social liberty and prosperity which she had reared—that, without faltering, misgiving, or hesitation, he would say “No” to the Motion to read this Bill a second time; but equally without faltering, misgiving, or hesitation, he would say “Aye” to any Bill which would provide for the enfranchisement of those of the working classes who were entitled to the confidence of the country.

SIR GEORGE GREY: Towards the close of the debate on Wednesday last an appeal was made to the Government to state explicitly the course which they proposed to take in reference to the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds for the second reading of this Bill; and also to state their general intentions and opinions with regard to the question of Parliamentary Reform. Sir, the Government are not prepared to dispute the reasonableness of that demand; and they are prepared to give an explicit answer to the appeal which has thus been made to them. A great many hon. Members on the opposite Benches who were here at the close of the debate on Wednesday were not in attendance at the commencement. Had they been here before they would have known that the Motion for the second reading and the Amendment for the Previous Question had not been put from the Chair till an advanced hour of the day; and that after they had been put only three speeches were addressed to the House. It was clear to me through the whole debate that it was impossible but there must be an adjournment. By desire of my Colleagues I had come here, in the absence of my noble Friend at the head of the Government, to take part in the debate;

but I did not think it would be becoming in me to stand in the way of the two or three Gentlemen who were anxious to state their opinions. We are here now, Sir, to answer the appeal which has been made to us, and also to answer the charges which have been brought against the Government for their conduct on the question of Parliamentary Reform. I am afraid that what I have to say will not meet with the entire approval either of the warm supporters of the Bill on the one hand, or of its determined and strenuous opponents on the other. And here let me say, as to those opponents, I think the course which they have taken in reference to this Bill has been not quite as fair and straightforward as might have been desired. Well, what is the question which we have now to decide? On the one hand, a Motion is made for the second reading of this Bill; on the other hand, there is no Motion for the rejection of the Bill, but only an Amendment for the Previous Question, although the spirit of the argument of the noble Lord who moved that Amendment (Lord Elcho), and of my right hon. Friend who supported him (Mr. Lowe), is this—that under no circumstances and at no time are they prepared to extend the franchise by lowering it. But what is the principle of this Bill? The principle of lowering the franchise; and therefore I say that the noble Lord and my right hon. Friend have not taken the opinion of the House in the straightforward manner they might have done. My hon. Friend who has just addressed the House (Mr. Gregory) goes further; for, forgetting that the Amendment was “the Previous Question,” at the close of his speech he said he was prepared to say, “No,” to the Motion for the second reading. I must observe likewise that my hon. Friend and those who preceded him in opposition to this Bill have not stated the case fairly. They assume, without any proof whatever, that the necessary or, at all events, the probable tendency of any Bill to extend the suffrage by lowering the value of the house which gives a right to vote, would be to endanger the Constitution, to imperil the monarchy, and to substitute in the place of that mode and form of Government for which every day we have more reason to be grateful, a system of pure democracy. My hon. Friend who spoke last has assumed that the necessary tendency of this Bill would be to Americanize our institutions, and he referred to the Australian colonies, where universal suffrage prevails, in support of his views. I can only say that if Her Majesty's Government thought that was the necessary or even the probable tendency of the principle contained in the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, they would at once have asked the House to reject it, and I am sure that in taking that course they would have had the hearty approbation and concurrence of a majority of the House and of the people of this country. Let me now say a few words in reply to the charges made against Her Majesty's Government for their conduct in respect to the question of Reform. Let me go back a little further than my hon. Friend went, and let me call the attention of the House to what took place in March, 1859, when the Government of Lord Derby proposed a Reform Bill, and the second reading was moved in this House. On that occasion an Amendment was moved by Lord Russell, who pointed to two alleged defects in the Bill proposed by Lord Derby's Government. Lord Russell's Resolution distinctly asked the opinion of the House on a particular proposition. The first part of his Amendment pointed to the alleged unsatisfactory manner in which the Bill dealt with the freehold franchise as exercised in the counties. With that question we are not now immediately concerned. But the latter part of his Resolution pointed directly to the absence in the Bill of any provision by which the working classes or any portion of them could be admitted to the franchise by a reduction of the amount necessary to confer it. I do not now allude to the county franchise; but the debate on the borough franchise was in substance this:—Shall we attempt to introduce some of these classes by means of fancy franchises—franchises now unknown to the Constitution?—(I do not mean to say anything as to the merits of those franchises now, as that may form the subject of debate at another time)—shall we endeavour to let in a portion of the working classes in this way, or shall we effect our object and admit a considerable number of them by lowering the franchise? On that question, after a protracted debate, the House came to a division, and pronounced a deliberate decision; and that decision was adverse to the Government of Lord Derby. What course did the Government of Lord Derby take? They advised Her Majesty to take the opinion of the country upon the subject. Accordingly Parliament was dissolved, and a new one met in June, 1859. A Speech was delivered from the Throne which held out the expectation of another Parliamentary Reform Bill being proposed by that Government on a future occasion, but stated that such a Bill could not be then introduced on account of the advanced period of the year. The Address in answer to the Speech was moved by the hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Egerton), and no person more fitted for the purpose could have been chosen by the Government to represent them, regard being had to his position and to the fact that he represented a mixed constituency comprising large agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing interests; and coming fresh, as he did, from his election, he may be taken to have fully represented those interests and to have spoken in their name. What did he say with regard to these questions which had been the subject of contention in Parliament before the dissolution—questions upon which this House had entertained and had distinctly expressed its opinion? Why, the hon. Gentleman, who we well know had received information from Government with respect to their intended measures, said, with reference to the promised Bill for Parliamentary Reform—

“I shall not discuss the character of that measure till it is brought forward; but I have reason to believe that there certainly will be in it a diminution of the borough franchise. I do not know what it is intended to do with regard to the counties; but as far as my opinion goes I should wish to have, to a certain extent, a diminution of the franchise for both counties and boroughs. I think the objects of such measures should be as they have been proclaimed before the country, to give the working classes a share of the electoral franchise.—[3 Hansard, cliv. 102.]

The hon. Gentleman made that statement in moving the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne on behalf of a Government which, before the dissolution, had distinctly refused to accept the principle that there should be a lowering of the franchise. But what did the right hon. Member for Bucks say on that occasion? The right hon. Gentleman, the organ of the Government and leader of the House, said—

“The question of the borough franchise must be dealt with; and it must be dealt with, too, with reference to the introduction of the working classes. We admit that that has been the opinion of Parliament, and that it has been the opinion of the country as shown by the hon. Gentlemen who have been returned to this House. We cannot be blind to that result. We do not wish to be blind to it. We have no prejudice against the proposition. All that we want is to assure ourselves that any measure that we bring forward is one required by the public necessities and will be sanctioned by public approbation and support, and therefore we are perfectly prepared to deal with that question of the borough franchise and the introduction of the working classes, by lowering the franchise in boroughs, and by acting in that direction with sincerity, because, as I ventured to observe in the debate upon our measure—if you intend to admit the working classes to the franchise by lowering the suffrage in boroughs you must not keep the promise to the ear and break it to the hope.”

I ask, could there be a more explicit admission that the opinion of the country had been against the then Government as to the question upon which the issue had been taken? Could there have been a more frank or a more unqualified acceptance of that verdict, and avowal to act upon it sincerely? Well, then, if not only this House but the Government of Lord Derby absolutely pledged themselves to the principle of lowering the franchise, is it fair to say that this Government alone is pledged to it, and has abandoned and broken its pledges? The right hon. Gentlemen was dealing with the question of Want of Confidence in the Government, which was moved as an Amendment to the Address. He distinctly admitted that the country had shown its wish that the suffrage should be lowered, and he said he would yield to the desire of the country and give effect to its views if the House would give the Government its support. The House refused to give them its support; it refused to pass a Vote of Confidence in Lord Derby's Government. A change of Government took place, and the present Government came in—and I here admit that they did so on distinct terms. They were pledged, to the same extent that Lord Derby's Government would have been had it obtained a majority, to lay a Reform Bill including the principle of a reduction of the franchise before the Legislature. Well, we did propose a Reform Bill, which was, I contend, a complete redemption of the pledge we had given. We proposed that Bill, without loss of time, on the 1st of March, and the second reading was moved by Lord Russell after giving ample time for its consideration. What took place on that second reading? The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) rose immediately after the Question for the second reading had been put and said, that though objecting to many parts of the Bill—implying that he did not object to its principle—he was not prepared either as an individual or as the organ of his party to offer any opposition to the second reading of the Bill: and after it had been in the right hon. Gentleman's hands for three weeks he was not prepared to move one single Amendment. We had reason, under these circumstances, to expect that the House, accepting the principle of the Bill, would have allowed us to carry it through. But at the next stage, adjournment after adjournment took place in opposition to the repeated protests and entreaties of the Government [Laughter]—I do not disguise the fact—showing that the Government at least were sincere in their endeavours to carry the Bill through the House. Such were the tactics by which the passing of the Bill was delayed; and in saying so I do not refer merely to the course pursued by the Gentlemen opposite, but also by those sitting on this side of the House. After many nights' debate the second reading was at last agreed to without a division. Whitsuntide was approaching—it was necessary to take some Votes in Supply, and the earliest day that could be fixed for going into Committee was the 4th June. On the 4th of June the Motion was made for going into Committee on the Bill for its details to be considered; when those who allowed the second reading to take place without opposition met us with Motion after Motion of a dilatory character, no man venturing positively to oppose it in ignorance of what might be the feelings of the country upon the question. It then being the middle of June, the Government, after several nights' debate, finding that they had not the slightest chance of carrying the Bill, were reluctantly compelled to withdraw it. The hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines), with an innocence for which I should not have given him credit, expressed his astonishment that the Government should have allowed the Bill to drop, and hoped that the Government would not allow this opportunity to pass without explaining their reasons for dropping it. My answer is that the Government used its utmost endeavours to carry that Bill, but that they felt that they should be merely wasting the time of the House in endeavouring to maintain a supposed consistency by carrying on the Bill in the face of those protracted debates and of the manifest determination of the House, while offering it no direct opposition, not to pass it. Now,

I ask whether Government was not fully justified in the course they took in withdrawing the Bill when they did? I ask whether the country expressed any disapprobation of the conduct of the Government on that account? On the contrary, the Government was supported by the House in the course they had adopted, and the House by the public opinion of the country. I hope my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds will be fully satisfied with my reply to his question. The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) singled out the President of the Board of Trade for his severest censure, not only for taking the course he did as a Member of the Government, but also for the reasons he gave in justification of his conduct at a public meeting of his constituents. I think those reasons are amply sufficient to justify our acts, and I believe they have recommended themselves to the country. Believing that the feeling of the country and of this House is not that which my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax considers essential to the passing of an efficient Reform Bill, there not being that persistent and overwhelming expression of the opinion of the country by which alone such a measure could be sustained, we did not, merely for the purpose of maintaining an appearance of consistency, go on Session after Session submitting a Bill of this kind to Parliament with the certainty before us that the only practical result would be that public business would be obstructed, and that the Government would be prevented from discharging the duties they owe to this House and to the country. Sir, I believe that the Government would not have been justified in pursuing that course, and, therefore, I am prepared to defend their conduct, believing, as I do, that it has met with the approbation of the country. Has the country expressed any want of confidence in the Government? Has the House withdrawn its confidence from them? They amply redeemed the pledge which they gave, by proposing a Bill framed in accordance with the opinions which they had expressed, and they only withdrew that Bill when they saw that neither the House nor the country wished that it should be pressed. The hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), whose sincerity as a Reformer no man can doubt, has taken office in the Government. He is a highminded and honourable man, and no one will venture to say that he would have identified himself with the Government if he had believed that they had upon this question broken their pledges and abandoned their principles. But since that period other measures for the extension of both borough and county franchise have been proposed by independent Members. My hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey (Mr. Locke King) has proposed the extension of the county, and my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) has several times proposed the extension of the borough franchise. Government have offered no opposition to the introduction of those Bills. They have thought that, although they did not feel justified in themselves submitting measures to Parliament for those purposes, they had no right to stand in the way of hon. Gentlemen who differed from them in opinion as to the feeling of the country. Nor have we offered any opposition to the second reading of those Bills. We have at all times been ready to affirm the principle that there should be an extension of the suffrage by lowering the franchise to a certain extent both in counties and boroughs. But the House has not accepted those measures, and I think their fate has afforded sufficient justification for the course which the Government has taken in not asking Parliament to consider a general measure of Reform. We are again asked by my hon. Friend to agree to the second reading of this Bill; and how is it met? I put aside altogether the Previous Question, because that is not the real question that we have to decide. We are asked by the recent arguments of those who oppose this Bill to reject the principle involved in it. We are asked, in fact, to say that at no time, and under no circumstances, shall the borough franchise be lowered and the working classes admitted to it. ["No, no!"] Does my right hon. Friend the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) say No? The "Noes" proceed from Gentlemen who most vociferously cheered the able and forcible arguments of my right hon. Friend; but I think that no man who cheered those arguments can say that he is now or, without a great change of opinion, can become an advocate of any reduction of the borough franchise. I agree with my right hon. Friend in much that he said in that very able speech. I agree with what he said about abstract rights to the franchise, and universal suffrage; but those questions are not in debate now. I agree with him that it is desirable that the working men should look upon the attainment of the suffrage as an object of some ambition, and should be induced to deny themselves some indulgences in order to acquire it; but I cannot agree with him in thinking that the amount of £10 which was fixed more than thirty years ago at the time of the Reform Act is an immutable figure. I cannot agree with him that any departure from a £10 franchise in boroughs must necessarily lead to democracy, to the subversion of our institutions, and to all those evils which he so forcibly depicted. His speech was very similar to some of those which were heard in opposition to the Reform Bill of 1832. There are now very few Members of this House who had seats in it at that time, but some of us are unfortunately old enough to remember the debates which took place then, and which, if we did not hear them, we all read with the deepest interest. The very same arguments were then used against Reform as are now urged against the lowering of the franchise. It was then said, "If you place power in the hands of the £10 householders, you have begun a downward course which must land you in pure democracy." No doubt those who expressed such opinions sincerely entertained the belief that the only safety of the country lay in the rejection of that Bill, and that it was a dangerous and revolutionary measure, which would entirely subvert our institutions. But what has been the result? The part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne which I liked best was that in which he enlarged upon the immense advantages which have been conferred upon the country by the Reform Act of 1862—being a falsification of every prediction which was hazarded by those who opposed it. What proof has my right hon. Friend given us, not that universal suffrage would lead to democracy, but that some reduction of the Franchise would? We are not dealing with universal suffrage, and when my hon. Friend who last addressed the House spoke of Mr. Holyoake he should have said that he was an advocate of universal suffrage, and that the Bill prepared by some Manchester Association, and which, he said, would endanger other classes and deprive them of their share of power, was not the measure now under discussion, but a Bill for the establishment of universal suffrage. What we think, and what we thought when we introduced the Bill of 1860, is that, looking at the intelligence of the upper class of the working classes, and at the improvement which has taken place in their habits and character from the education which has been so widely diffused among them during the last thirty years, the time has come when it is right to consider whether a portion of those classes should not be admitted to the suffrage by means of lowering the qualification which now very much confines it to the middle classes. In one breath we are told that a large number of the working classes are admitted under the existing franchise, and in the next that it is unsafe to admit any portion of them. I ask whether in those cases to which the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) has referred, in which a large number of the working classes are included in the constituencies, the result of the elections has been such as to justify the apprehensions which he entertains as to the consequences which would follow if the same proportion were admitted in others? I believe that the idea of a reasonable extension of the franchise in boroughs leading to democracy and endangering our institutions is perfectly fallacious. I believe that it will be safer and wiser to widen the basis of representation as far as we possibly can within reasonable limits, by admitting those who have proved themselves qualified to exercise the franchise. We, therefore, cannot agree with those who propose to reject the Bill because they object to the principle contained in it; and it is a principle which we have always accepted. We have seen no reason to doubt that the course which we took in 1860 was in itself a right course. We have seen no reason to suppose that the number of electors which we calculated would under that Bill be added to the constituencies was an unreasonable or a dangerous number. We believe that that number might have been admitted, scattered as the electors would have been over all the boroughs in the kingdom, with safety to the Constitution, with satisfaction to large numbers of the working classes, and, therefore, with additional security to our institutions. In that view the Government will, as they have before done, with a view to affirm the principle that there may safely be, and that there ought to be, a reduction of the borough franchise, vote for the second reading of the Bill of the hon. Member for Leeds. I wish, however, that that should not go for more than it is worth. If it is intended that the Bill of my hon. Friend—that the £6 franchise in boroughs—should be applied as a political test at the elections which are now not far distant, that is a test which Her Majesty's Government will not accept. We feel that we are not bound, without further consideration, to the adoption of a £6 franchise, although in connection with other alterations in our electoral system we proposed it in 1860. We now only affirm the principle that there may be beneficially and usefully made a reduction of the borough franchise; but to what extent that reduction should go, and with what other alterations in the electoral system it should be combined, are questions which any Government dealing with the subject are bound to take into consideration. I do not reject the £6 franchise. I only say that I, for one, and that Her Majesty's Government, will not go to the hustings at the general election pledged to support a £6 franchise. They are of opinion, with the right hon. Gentlemen opposite, that there ought to be such a reduction of the borough franchise as will in all sincerity admit a considerable portion of the working classes; but they reserve to themselves the discretion, which they would be unworthy of their position as a Government if they did not reserve, of considering when the question comes practically before the House after the second reading of the Bill what the reduction should be, and with what guards it should be accompanied. With regard to the question of Parliamentary Reform generally, I need hardly state after what I have said that we do not go to the country pledged to any particular measure. We must upon this subject reserve to ourselves the fullest liberty to act upon our principles according to the circumstances of the time and the opinion of the country. We are not pledged to, and we do not intend to ask the support of the country as the advocates of, a great measure of Parliamentary Reform. I wish to be explicit. It would be idle to say that we would introduce a certain measure when we do not know what may be the opinion of the next House of Commons upon the subject, or to commit ourselves irrespective of the opinion of the House and of the opinion of the country to propose a large measure of Parliamentary Reform, which the House may be as disinclined to pass as it was before, and which the country may not desire. We should gladly avail ourselves of any such persistent and overwhelming expression of opinion upon the subject as the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) says is essential to the passing of a Bill, but we are not prepared to go to the country as the advocates of a measure of Parliamentary Reform without reserving to ourselves a discretion to act upon that matter, as upon all others, as the interests of the country may require. That appeal is not far distant. We shall appeal with confidence to the general opinion of the country. The country will have an opportunity of expressing its opinion as to how the Government has been conducted by the present Administration. We shall not shrink from that appeal, and by its result we shall willingly abide.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman began his speech by saying he would tell the House what he would do with reference to this subject, and what would be the future policy of the Government in regard to it. Now, I ask is there any Gentleman on either side of the House who, having heard that speech, has any idea what that policy is to be—except a policy which I never expected to hear from any Treasury Bench, and still less from the present one—namely, that the policy would be regulated by their interest in the Government. I am glad that this question has been brought forward. I have always felt that there was little chance of this Bill being carried in the present temper of the House; but I did think it would be the means of raising the whole Reform question before the House. We have the Reform question now before the House, and the chief point we want to know is, not what the Ministers will do in the support of this particular Bill, but to know whether, at the election speedily coming, they are or are not a Reform Ministry? We who are called upon to support them want to know whether we shall be supporting a Reform Ministry. We who sit on this side of the House have a right to know who we are supporting; and the hon. Gentlemen on the other side, who have only recently ceased to be Reformers, have a right to know who they are opposing. What has the right hon. Gentleman told us about that? He repeated the pledge made when the present Ministry came into power in 1860. Are they released from that pledge? I will not attempt to measure the amount of sincerity shown by them or their supporters; but does the fact that they brought forward a Bill and withdrew it release them from the pledge given on this Reform question? Who has the power of releasing them from that pledge? Has my right hon. Friend who sits near me (Mr. Horsman), who was no party to the contract, the right of releasing them from that pledge? Still less the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), for he was one who made it. Can the hon. Members who sit behind the Treasury Bench, and whom my noble Friend (Lord Elcho) was pleased to call the orthodox Liberals—though I am disposed to think that the great majority of the Liberals would not be inclined to accept his definition of orthodox Liberals—can they release the Government from the pledge? No, unless their constituents do. Well, what we want to know when we come before our constituents, and what the constituents wish to know when the Members come before them, is whether, in returning what is called the Liberal party to support what is called a Liberal Ministry, they are or are not supporting a Reform party determined to carry a Reform Bill? I may be told that we need not ask this question; that the country has already decided; that we will hear nothing of Reform at the next general election, and that there will be no attempt to pledge Members to it. Now, is there any hon. Gentleman on this side—are there many hon. Gentlemen on the other side—who do not suppose that the great majority of Members on the Liberal side of the House at any rate will come back after the next election as much pledged as they are at this moment to carry a Reform Bill? My noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) talked about getting rid of what he called the noisy section of his constituents, and he was followed in that by the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory). I do not suppose that there is much noise made in Haddingtonshire on this matter, or in Galway on any subject, except on the Galway contract; and it is therefore safe and very easy for hon. Gentlemen representing distant places in Ireland and Scotland—small constituencies—to make those remarks. But is there any Member for a large and popular constituency, whether of town or country, who does not know that when he comes before them he will be asked why it is a Reform Bill has not been carried in this Parliament, and that he will not be allowed to return to represent the Liberal party until he says that he will go back determined not to be trifled with any longer, and that he will do his best to have this question settled. Of course we cannot tell until the election how far there is or is not a Conservative re-action. I believe it to be immensely exaggerated; but I do not deny the possibility of that position. But if the majority of the country be anti-Reformers, and if we on this side of the House are in a minority—as we have often been before, but only to be in a majority in the end, let it be acknowledged, and let the responsibility rest on the majority—anything is better than allowing the question to be trifled with as it has been. The noble Lord talked in the absence of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham of his efforts to set class against class; but of all the efforts made to set class against class I know of no effort more insidiously made than that made of late in regard to this Reform question of setting the middle class against the working class and telling them that it is unsafe to admit the working classes to power. But I believe, except to a very slight extent, that effort has been unsuccessful. I will not say that it has been altogether unsuccessful, but I am prepared to accept the consequences, and if we should find ourselves in the minority we shall acknowledge it, and we shall let the real majority in the constituencies be governed by leaders who represent their feelings and their views, and not by leaders professing to belong to us. But supposing that the election has taken place, and that, as I say, the large majority of the Liberal party remain pledged upon this question, what is to be done then? Are these pledges to be trifled with again in another Parliament as they have been in this? I think there will be a general feeling on both sides of the House, whatever is to be the decision on this Reform question—whether the admission of a large portion of the working classes to a share in the representation of the country is to be decided in the affirmative or the negative—that the way in which the Government have met it to-night, by saying that they will wait for the popular applause or popular mind to indicate how the country goes, will not be the way in which it will be thought satisfactory to meet it. There will be a feeling, I believe, among all men who wish well to their country that it is necessary seriously, earnestly, and sincerely to debate the question and to bring it to an end in the next Parliament, instead of treating it as we have done in this. I will just give the House one or two reasons why I believe it is not wise to trifle with the working men any longer on this question. The noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire said he knew the feeling of working men very well. I do not dispute his knowledge, but I think it would be very much my own fault if my knowledge was not greater. I have known the working classes all my life; I have known them as a Captain of Volunteers, if there is anything in that; I have been in the habit of conferring with them in deputations; I have been asked to settle labour disputes between them and their employers; for the last twenty years I have sympathized with them in their political movements. I have constantly attended their meetings, sometimes agreeing with them, and sometimes differing—very often the latter—so that I think no person ought to know better than myself what is the feeling of working men upon the Reform question in the district from which I come, and in which there is a good deal of feeling. Comparing their present with their past feelings on this question, I cannot but regard the change with regret. I remember the Chartist time, when there was a very violent disorderly feeling amongst them, and in some respects the present state of feeling is still more to be regretted than it was then. I remember the time when I had the greatest possible difficulty in an open air meeting in Bradford to get the working men to accept a resolution not to use physical force, but I did get them to accept it. But that old Chartist agitation was founded upon that which was perfectly unreasonable, and the workmen found it out. They thought that they would be able by some alteration in the machinery of the Government to increase their own material prosperity. They got rid of that idea. But what is their present feeling based upon? It is a feeling the House cannot afford to look upon with indifference. It is a feeling amongst the best of them that they are excluded from the rights and duties of citizenship; that they are alienated from the Constitution, and by your treatment of them you are making them look to another country as though it was their native country. I have taken a decided view in favour of the North throughout the late struggle, but I regret as much as any man can do to hear the working men looking to America as their future home. I regret as much as any hon. Member can this state of feeling on the part of the working men; but I say that while we continue this policy—above all, if we accept the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne, which seemed to proceed upon the principle that on no conditions can they be admitted, you will have, as it were, two nations in this country—the one consisting of the upper and the middle class, and the other the large body of the working classes—the one proud of its connection with the Constitution, and the other looking forward to how soon they could get away and become citizens of a foreign country. We have been taunted with the indifference of the working classes towards this Bill; but if you force the working men to a working men's agitation it will not be for this Bill—it will probably be for manhood suffrage. If they are excluded as a class and feared as a class, they will agitate as a class and demand admission as a class. Assuredly the wise plan would be to admit the élite among them, the leaders of their movements; for, though they would be generous enough to say that they would not accept such a Reform as the full measure of working men's rights, yet in that way any demand for a greater extension of the suffrage must be put off for a long period—so long indeed as to do away with any arguments for further delay. In his speech last year the Chancellor of the Exchequer said—

“It may be fearlessly asserted that the fixed traditional sentiment of the working man has begun to be confidence in the law, in Parliament, and even in the executive Government.”—[3 Hansard, clxxv. 322.]

Could that be said now? Nothing had happened to shake their confidence in the law; but confidence in Parliament on the Reform question they had not, and that was the reason why they had never taken the trouble to present any petitions in favour of this Bill. As to the executive Government—in the right hon. Gentleman as yet they had confidence—but in the executive Government they had not, and certainly the speech of the Home Secretary would not remove any feeling they might have on that point. What could be more calculated to increase their distrust than the speech of the right hon. Member for Calne? The right hon. Gentleman, at the conclusion of his speech, said—

“I venture, however, to make this prediction—that if they do unite their fortunes with the fortunes of Democracy, as it is proposed they should do in the case of this measure, they will not miss one of two things. If they fail in carrying this measure, they will ruin their party; and if they succeed in carrying this measure they will ruin their country.”—[3 Hansard, clxxviii. 1439.]

against his country—what has occurred to induce him to change his mind? I do not believe that he has changed his mind, for I acquit him of such a want of sincerity and patriotism as to retain office under a Ministry which he believed to be bent on taking a course which would prove ruinous to his country. I believe the right hon. Gentleman held the same opinions then that he holds now—I believe the real explanation of the right hon. Gentleman's conduct to be that he had confidence in the Government of which he was a Member, and he knew that they were not in earnest in seeking to carry a Reform Bill. I am persuaded that if the right hon. Gentleman had had reason to think otherwise he would not have continued in office to be instrumental in bringing about what he conceived to be the ruin of his country. "You must either ruin your party or ruin your country." Better let the party be ruined rather than have measures brought in in such a manner and so treated by the Government. Better let the party be disbanded and re-organized with fewer Members than that it should be false to its own principles. Let the right hon. Gentleman go over to the other side of the House, and take the position of leader of hon. Gentlemen opposite—a position which he is evidently so worthy to fill. Let all those follow him who concur with him in opinion, and let those who remain behind, conscious of the justice of their cause, fight their way, should they be in a minority, until they had placed themselves in the position of a majority. Better far to take that course than to go on under leaders whose action leads to the impression that the Liberal party in this House no longer represents the feelings and wishes of their constituents. It may be said that I am losing sight of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I am not forgetting it, nor will the country forget it, but I cannot lose sight of this—that my right hon. Friend, though the most eminent man in the Ministry, is not the leader of the Ministry, and does not appear in the absence of the noble Lord as the captain of the ship. He is not the first lieutenant, but an eminent officer in the vessel. My right hon. Friend cannot help replying to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne—which he must feel was chiefly directed against himself; and I hope he will answer the question—to which no reply has yet been given, and to which, if no reply be given, will be repeated again and again until the Government will regret that they have passed it over in silence—to what port is the ship going—whether is it the harbour of Reform or not? Putting party considerations aside, the real point at issue is that with which my right hon. Friend (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) so ably dealt last year, when he said—

"The present franchise, I may add, on the whole—subject of course to some exceptions—draws the line between the lower middle class and the upper order of the working class. As a general rule, the lower stratum of the middle class is admitted to the exercise of the franchise, while the upper stratum of the working class is excluded. That I believe to be a fair general description of the present formation of the constituencies in boroughs and towns. Is it a state of things, I would ask, recommended by clear principles of reason? Is the upper portion of the working classes inferior to the lowest portion of the middle? That is a question I should wish to be considered on both sides of the House."—[3 Hansard, clxxv. 324.]

The question now is, and will be at the approaching election, whether this state of things is to be allowed to continue? And how has it been dealt with in the present debate? The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory) has told the House that in many boroughs the effect of the proposed change would be to swamp the present constituencies. That statement will, however, I believe, be found not to be correct. Although some three or four boroughs may be converted more or less into working-class boroughs, generally speaking the constituencies will be very little affected by the operation of the measure. I know we are met by the assertion that it is not so much anything in this measure that would do any great harm; but, say our opponents, we fear the precedent you make for future action; we fear the tendency in which you are going. Now I think it is well that all who support the extension of the franchise should speak out with candour, and I, for one, must honestly acknowledge that I do not fear the tendency of this measure, and that I do look forward to a much greater eventual concession of the suffrage. Why do I look forward to it? I do not wish to argue the question on any ground of a priori right which The Times seems to think that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne has disposed of for ever, but which has long been the subject of discussion, and which is, after all, based upon a feeling in the heart of men of which no speech of the right hon. Gentleman, however eloquent it may be, can get rid. But be that as it may, I would simply, for the purposes of my argument, maintain the policy of the proposed concession on the ground that I look upon it as a just and natural development of that Constitution of which we are all so proud. I hardly like to quote so old fashioned an authority as Blackstone, but it is a fact worthy of the consideration of the House that the opinion of that learned person was that in a free State every man was a free agent, and ought to be in some measure his own governor. Have the supporters of the present Bill, I will ask, advanced any opinion so democratic as that in its tendency? But, be that as it may, what ought to be the tendency of our legislation upon the question of the franchise? In my opinion it ought to be that as education advances so must the suffrage be extended. Let the working classes, in addition to their power of organization and their numbers, but once possess the advantages of education, and no influence in the country will be able—or eventually will, I think, desire to exclude them from the right to exercise the franchise. Not fearing, then, as I certainly do not, the tendency of the Bill, I am under no apprehension of those difficulties which it is said it will bring about between employers and employed in reference to the question of wages. At present we, the employers of labour, have the power of legislation, and what assistance does it give us? Every man who is practically acquainted with the employment of labour knows that the interests of the labouring classes, even though they should be admitted to the franchise, would be so diverse that it is not probable—that it is not even possible—that there could be a great combined movement among the great wage receiving classes of the community to obtain from Parliament some legislative measure for their own interests. In conclusion, I will say that, although my name is on the back of this Bill, I am not a bigoted supporter of its provisions. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary says the Government will not go to the hustings pledged to a £6 franchise. No one wishes to pledge them to the test of a small measure like this. If we could have reason to believe that they were intending to grapple with the whole question of Reform in a fair, candid, sincere, and determined spirit, that is all we want. By voting for this Bill the House will support the only proposition which seems likely to include that portion of the working classes within its scope which every one professes

a desire to include. If there was any other mode by which that object could be effected, let a proposal be made to accomplish it; but any measure of this kind must be a fair and sincere attempt to settle the question, and must not appear to give the working men votes without really attempting to do so. You cannot attempt to extend the franchise without lowering the suffrage, and if it be a sincere and candid measure I believe the working men will be willing fairly to consider it. You call this Reform the progress of democracy. I call it the development of that true principle of liberty which is the basis of our constitution. But take your own word, “democracy.” You may take three ways of dealing with it. You may concede to this democracy by degrees, taking in one section after another as they become educated, this would be the wise plan. Or you may resist it altogether, which I believe would be suicidal policy. But the third course you must entirely avoid, because it will fail in every respect. Do not attempt to cheat it. I must say that many plans which are proposed do look like attempts to cheat it. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) sees through these attempts, and acknowledges them to be ineffectual. You may say to the working men that you consider them as children and not fit to exercise the rights of manhood; but if you admit that they are men you must treat them as men. You cannot thrust half-a-dozen of them together and call them a man. If they are fit for the franchise, the fact that there is a great many of them does not make them unfit. I say if they are qualified the more the better. You have, therefore, to consider whether you will yield to this progress or resist it. To resist, I believe would be suicidal. I was reading lately an article in, what I believe is regarded as the great organ of the Conservative Party, The Quarterly Review, which looked like the first edition of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne. Only the right hon. Gentleman stopped short and said, concession rather than civil war; but the article said No; civil war rather than concession. I do not look forward to anything so terrible, because I know the result will be as it has been. We may be again in a minority—it may be some time before we are able to secure a majority of the constituencies; but we shall eventually, and you who now oppose will be glad when we do. I have sufficient confidence in your patriotism, and you cannot help learning from what is going on around you. You must know that the working men cannot be banished from self-government here, and the same men obtain it everywhere else. Whatever assistance you may get from letters from Tories in Australia, or from parties who it may be have suffered privations from the American war, the fact comes home to you that the man who obtains no share in the franchise here, when he finds himself away from these shores finds himself enjoying the full prerogative of citizenship. Whatever sympathy hon. Members may feel for the one part or the other in the United States, one lesson must be drawn on both sides from the American war, and that is the enormous strength that a country obtains by the united feeling of its inhabitants and by patriotic feelings influencing all the people. If England is to maintain her position as the first Power among nations, she must be first in the freedom of her people. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne may sneer at that freedom as a mere sentiment, but upon that freedom depends the power of the country. If England is to be the first of the great English-speaking countries, which seem more and more spreading over the earth, if she is to be the leader of the Anglo-Saxon race, she must endeavour above all to take care that no commonwealth springing from us shall attain more than ourselves that strength to which none other is comparable—the strength which arises from the nurture and development of the patriotism of her inhabitants through their possession of their rights, their feeling of their responsibilities, and their fulfilment of their duties as citizens.

MR. LIDDELL said, that this debate had presented some rather remarkable features, and one of the most remarkable was that lately presented by a Member of the Government, whose object in rising appeared to be to defend himself and his Colleagues against the attacks of his own party. Of that speech, however, the right hon. Gentleman's own supporters were better judges than himself. All that he could gather from the right hon. Gentleman was that he supported a £6 franchise Bill; but, although he supported the second reading, he said the Government did not go to the hustings pledged to a £6 franchise. It had been said that there was a civil war raging on the other side of the House. Now he did not consider it a civil war, but simply a struggle of prudence against imprudence—a stand honourably taken by sagacious and patriotic men against the laying of a stepping-stone which had been forcibly and expressively described as leading towards democracy. He wished to state the objections which he entertained to the measure. He had heard from the other side of the House truths propounded which he should like to see promulgated in letters of gold and nailed to every hustings, because they exposed the fallacy surrounding the question of lowering the franchise. He should support the objections which he entertained against this measure by quoting from the evidence of those who differed from him in their political views. His first objection was one which had not yet been taken—that to place the possession of the franchise upon value as ascertained for the purposes of local taxation was to place it upon an uncertain, ill-defined, and variable basis; because, in fact, there existed no uniform rule or fixed system for ascertaining the value of property for these purposes. Not only did the mode of assessment vary in different parts of the country, but even in parishes contiguous to each other continual discrepancies would be found to prevail. They had been told before the Committee of the House of Lords in 1860 by eminent authorities that the rate book was no criterion of value whatever; and when hon. Gentlemen had informed the House that their calculation of the number who would be admitted to the exercise of the franchise through the passing of this measure was founded upon the Government Returns, they entirely forgot that the fallacies and inaccuracies of those Returns had been exposed in the Committee to which he had alluded. Before the Committee Mr. David Chadwick, who had been the treasurer of the borough of Salford for sixteen years, and possessed twenty years' experience in the system of rating every description of property for parochial and corporation purposes, gave the following evidence:—

“To show the anomalies which exist in a few of the principal towns in the mode of rating—a house of 2*s.* a week in Liverpool would be considered of the gross estimated rental, or the annual value of £5, the landlord paying all rates and taxes and water rate. The very same house in Manchester, and subject to the same amount of taxes, or nearly so, would be considered of £4 gross estimated value; in Salford, £3 10*s.*; in Leeds, £4 5*s.*; in Bolton, £4 10*s.*; in Bradford, £3 12*s.*; in Halifax, £3 18*s.*; varying in seven different towns between 10 and 30 per cent. The same anomaly exists in regard to all the other weekly amounts, and it shows that there is nothing like uniformity and that nobody can understand it. We, the very officials who have to communicate with each other, are in a constant state of confusion."

Not only did this mode of assessing property for the purposes of local taxation vary in different parts of the country, but in different parishes of the same large town like discrepancies were visible. A case was within his knowledge where, in one particular parish, upon a £6 house, the scale being 1s. in the pound per quarter, a man would pay £1 4s. for his vote, in another parish he would pay 16s., and in a third 12s. Could that be called an equal measure of justice? They would find it very difficult to persuade the artisan or working man that he was fairly dealt with under a system which caused him to pay 100 per cent more for his vote in a poor parish than the resident in a contiguous and wealthy parish. Perhaps he might be told that this basis of local taxation, which he called unreal and ill-defined, was the same that was selected in 1832. He expected that answer. But the basis then adopted was a rough and ready mode of ascertaining the social status of the voter. But were there no differences in the circumstances of the times? In 1832 there were great and acknowledged grievances to remedy; rotten boroughs existed by the side of large unrepresented cities; and the lowest classes of society in some towns enjoyed political privileges which were denied to the middle class. All these grievances were remedied by the Reform Act; but there were other informalities and inconveniences that were not remedied by that Act, and any measure now introduced ought to be directed to supply the deficiencies then left; there were, for instance, the inequalities of the basis of the franchise—but this the present Bill did not attempt to remedy. This Bill, calling itself a Reform Bill, did not even pretend to deal with another great evil of the present system by defective registration. So far from it carrying down the franchise to a lower stratum of society and leaving the machinery the same, it must perpetuate and enormously aggravate the difficulties of registration; but no attempt was made in the Bill to meet so obvious an objection. Yet this was called a Reform Bill. The only thing the Bill did, under the specious name of Reform, was to admit to power an uncertain number of the working classes, of whom he would endeavour to show that a much larger proportion already possessed the franchise than persons generally were aware of. Of the working man individually he entertained no apprehension whatever; there were a considerable number of them whom he believed to be better qualified for the exercise of the franchise than many who now enjoyed it. What he objected to was the indiscriminate admission of the working classes contemplated by the Bill. Hon. Gentlemen when they talked of the fitness of the working man to share in controlling the destinies of the country ought to address themselves to a task more difficult than any they had yet attempted, that of showing the working man to be more fitted for this privilege than the present constituencies. ["No, no!"] He replied "yes," because the indiscriminate admission of the working classes would have the effect of superseding the existing classes altogether. The present was considered a small measure of Reform; it was spoken of, in fact, as an instalment; and on this subject he had often observed that the language used by advocates of Reform in and out of the House was widely different. In the course of the remarkable speech made during last autumn by the hon. Member for Birmingham (who would be admitted to hold a high place among "advanced Reformers") he asked this question—

"Why are you afraid of the unenfranchised millions, who marry, keep house, rear children, and pay taxes? And why do you Tories, and those very wise gentlemen the Whigs, who think like Tories"—(the gentlemen, by the way, whom the hon. Member for Birmingham supports)—"vote for the exclusion of these millions?"

He did not know whether hon. Gentlemen had read the Report of the Employment of Children Commission, especially that part of it relating to Birmingham, where this speech was delivered, but it certainly was a document strictly in point, and it gave a striking and alarming picture of the condition of the very classes proposed to be enfranchised. To quote single cases was always an unpleasant, sometimes an insulting course, but he might state generally that there appeared to be 20,000 young persons between the ages of seven and twenty employed in the most noxious trades that were carried on in Birmingham. These 20,000 young persons—or rather, those who might survive the hard apprenticeship of their youth—the fathers and mothers of future generations of working men, were described as brought up in close, ill-ventilated, unwholesome rooms, where the common decencies of life were neglected, and as labouring at unhealthy trades sometimes fourteen hours a day. The manufacturers did what lay in their power to modify such disadvantages—he meant the master manufacturers who were generally careful of the health and welfare of those whom they employed; the chief evils occurred under the small employers, persons removed, as it were, from human ken—but the inevitable results of the system must be that these young people became physically debilitated and mentally degraded. It could not be otherwise, owing to the parents' anxiety to obtain remuneration for the services of their children at the earliest period. He did not grudge them the amount of wages thus obtained, but practically the children were precluded from obtaining that amount of education which would fit them for becoming valuable citizens hereafter. And it was this low stratum of society with which they were about suddenly to overlap the higher class of mechanics, for there were few of these people who did not live in houses of 2s. 6d. per week, or more than £6 per year. There were 30,000 houses in Birmingham of that annual value, and thus the Bill of the hon. Member for Leeds would treble the constituency of that great town, and that by persons whose condition entirely prevented them from obtaining that education which all sides admitted should accompany political power. What had the present constituency of Birmingham done that it should be so superseded? That was a reason why he was afraid of the unenfranchised classes, and in his opinion it furnished a just ground for alarm. He did not object to the admission of the working man to the franchise; but he did object to the masses being thus indiscriminately admitted. They had heard of a great deal of apathy existing in the House, and out of doors, on the question of Reform. It was, no doubt, great; but it was as nothing compared with the indifference of those who, having the qualification for the franchise did not take the trouble to avail themselves of it. And here, again, a lesson might be learned from Birmingham. The clerk to the Guardians, when examined before the Lords' Committee, stated the number of occupiers in the parish of Birmingham assessed at £10 and over in respect of property within the parish of Birmingham to be 18,574. All these persons were entitled to the franchise; but what was the actual number of voters on the register in that town? Why, short of 6,000! That was to say, not a third of the persons actually qualified to vote took measures to enable themselves to do so. Did not that show great indifference as to votes already? Here they were proposing to extend the circle by giving votes to working men, but those very men would not take the trouble to register themselves—they told them that the working classes were thundering at the doors of Parliament when many of those who were already entitled would not take the trouble to walk in. This was partly accounted for, no doubt, by many of these houses having their rates compounded for by the owners. But in 1851 an Act was passed to protect compounders. That was passed in 1851; but it was not until 1859 that any claims to the vote were made under that Act, when by the exertions of two individuals 1,365 compounders were put on the register. Here, then, was a constituency of 18,000, large enough to satisfy anybody, which would not take the trouble to place themselves on the register by claiming to pay their rates directly. That was a proof of the apathy that existed upon this subject. There were also great objections to unnecessarily increasing large constituencies. The more diluted the power became the less anxiety there was to possess it. There was one point he was very anxious to impress upon the House—namely, that a much larger number of the working men were enfranchised than was generally supposed or believed. The authorities he should quote were worthy of indisputable credence. He found a proof in the evidence of Mr. Henry Ashworth, a gentleman who had done as much as any man to elevate the working man, and who told a Committee of the House of Lords—

He was alluding to the building and freehold land societies by which the working men had been enabled greatly to elevate themselves. Mr. Danger, who came from Bristol, said—

“A very large proportion of the working classes of St. Philip and Jacob Without and of Bedminster are upon the register. I take those as two large parishes in Bristol where the artisans preponderate. There is a very large number on the register, upwards, I think, of 1,500 in St. Philip and Jacob alone, and about 1,200 for Bedminster."

That was a considerable proportion out of the electors of Bristol. Mr. Chadwick, from Salford, said that one-half of that constituency consisted of the superior classes of artisans. These men were the very élite of the working classes, who by their industry, economy, and perseverance had raised themselves to a better position, and were bringing up their children in comfort and intelligence. These men would do honour to any constituency, as they had, by the noblest of all processes—the process of self-elevation—secured the franchise for themselves. Why, then, disturb this, which was one of the most pleasing features of our constituencies? Why, by the indiscriminate admission of a lower grade, cast a stigma upon those who have thus raised themselves? Why destroy this self-acting principle on which, in fact, our Constitution itself is based? He had said this was not a Reform Bill, inasmuch as it did not address itself to any of the great defects which were admitted to exist in our present representative system. The law relating to registration was most uncertain, and the way in which it was administered was equally so. They had not yet even defined what was a tenant or what a lodger, and some absurd notion as to the possession of the key of the front door, or some trifling technicality of that kind, had disfranchised hundreds. These were defects which the Bill did not touch at all; and there were others which, instead of remedying, it only aggravated. To show what was required in a measure of Reform, he would quote an opinion which would be heard with respect by hon. Gentlemen opposite. Mr. John Stuart Mill said—

"In a good half measure of Reform there are at least two essential requisites. 1. It should be aimed at the really worst features of the existing system, since it does not profess to do everything it should do what is most required, it should apply a corrective where one is most urgently required. 2. It should be conceived with an eye to the further changes which may be expected hereafter, whatever change it introduces should be a step in the direction in which a further advance is, or will hereafter be desirable."

One point which had been much argued was the existence of small nomination boroughs. He would express no opinion in respect of them, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer not long ago had expressed an opinion favourable to the retention of those boroughs, and as long as they returned such men as the right hon. Member for Calne, he thought much might be said in their favour. But the hon. Member for Birmingham had often told them that no measure of Reform would be complete without a redistribution of seats. But this Bill did not do that. It would remedy nothing, although it was styled a Reform Bill. It merely proposed to lower the franchise to people who were now acquiring it for themselves. It was based upon an unsound foundation, it only tended to aggravate and perpetuate existing evils, and, therefore, he hoped the House would agree with him that it ought to be rejected.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, he had felt no desire to take part in the debate until he heard the speech of his right hon. Friend the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe); but that ever since he had heard that speech he had much wished to say a few words, not because he had the vanity to suppose himself a fit antagonist of his right hon. Friend, but because he was convinced that, although his right hon. Friend's arguments derived an appearance of strength from the force of his expressions, and the fertility and ingenuity of his illustrations, yet their intrinsic hollowness would become evident if they were briefly examined even by a speaker of far inferior power. His right hon. Friend claimed to speak with peculiar authority on the ground of his extraordinary consistency. But however much he (Sir Francis Goldsmid) might be disposed to admit the great ability of the right hon. Gentleman, it could not be understood why he imagined himself to be consistent. Shortly after his right hon. Friend's speech, he was reminded by the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Bernal Osborne) that he had supported in 1859 Lord John Russell's Resolution, which pointed directly to some such extension of the franchise as was proposed by this Bill. Again, was not his right hon. Friend a Member of the Administration which introduced the Reform Bill of 1860—a measure which, to adopt the phraseology of the right hon. Gentleman, must be called a "revolver," of which the present Bill was a "single barrel," but the contents of every barrel of which were, according to his present views, fraught with elements destructive of the best interests of humanity? He could understand how on minor matters his right hon. Friend was at liberty to sacrifice his own opinions to those of his party or of his Colleagues. But this was not a minor matter, and therefore he felt bound, by his regard for his right hon. Friend's honour, to believe that when he supported that measure he did not hold the views which he now entertained. It was clear, then, that if his right hon. Friend had reflected a little more on his past career, he would not have ventured to say that he never found occasion to depart from a conviction which he had once deliberately formed. But if we cannot bow to his authority, ought we to yield to his arguments? He (Sir Francis Goldsmid) maintained that we ought not. His right hon. Friend correctly quoted the Chancellor of the Exchequer as having last year said, that every man who was not presumably incapacitated by some consideration of personal unfitness, or political danger, was morally entitled to come within the pale of the Constitution. But, although quoting the Chancellor of the Exchequer with perfect fairness, the right hon. Member for Calne exhibited, in attempting to disprove his position, an unfairness which could not be surpassed. After disputing the existence of à priori rights, he proceeded to remark that if such rights do in reality exist, they are as much the property of the Australian savage and the Hottentot of the Cape, as of the educated and refined Englishman. But these remarks had no real application to anything propounded by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because the Hottentot or Australian savage is presumably incapacitated by personal unfitness, and for every man so incapacitated the Chancellor of the Exchequer had carefully guarded himself against being supposed to claim the franchise. Thus, then, the argument of the right hon. Member for Calne, though it was a triumphant refutation, was a refutation of something that was never intended to be upheld by the reasoner whom he was attempting to refute. His right hon. Friend next put forward a most extraordinary proposition, for he went on to say that the theory which armed the hand of the assassin was the same as that upon which this doctrine of à priori right was founded. Now he (Sir Francis Goldsmid) thought this was a most unworthy attempt to cast odium upon principles which the right hon. Gentleman disliked. It was true that assassination had sometimes, though fortunately but seldom, been the result of extreme political opinions working on an ill-governed mind; but there was no pretence for coupling that crime with one class of extreme opinions more than with another, for imputing it to those who raved about the à priori right of every man to the franchise, rather than to those who raved about the Divine rights of kings, or about the just and natural claim of the white man to control the thews and sinews of the black. He (Sir Francis Goldsmid) ventured to remind the House that there was not the slightest reason for supposing that the assassin of William the Silent in the 16th century, or the assassin of Abraham Lincoln in the 19th, was a fanatical believer in the abstract right of all men to political equality. Then his right hon. Friend disputed the propriety of lowering the franchise, because he said that all men who wished to exercise the franchise could get it under the present law. He assumed that those who did not obtain it did not deserve it; and he added that the question was whether the House should drag down the franchise to the level of those who had no sense of decency and morality? When he (Sir Francis Goldsmid) heard this, he almost thought his right hon. Friend had rather perpetrated a bitter joke than made a serious declaration. It reminded him of an anecdote which had been told of a man of exalted rank and great wealth, who, whenever he heard that any of his friends wanted money, exclaimed, "Want money! Why does anybody ever want money? Why do they not sell out of the Three per Cents? I sell out of the Three per Cents whenever I want money." His right hon. Friend in a similar spirit might say, "Want the franchise! Why does not a man take a £10 house if he wants the franchise?" In one respect the person of rank to whom he had referred had the advantage of his right hon. Friend, for he (Sir Francis Goldsmid) had never heard that that personage, when his friends told him they could not sell out their Consols because they had none, turned round and charged them with being devoid of all sense of decency and morality. But was this reply, which it must be admitted was not very conciliatory, founded on truth? He contended that it was not. The right hon. Gentleman was under a misapprehension as to the class of tenements which were wanting in the accommodation requisite for the observance of decency and morality. He (Sir Francis Goldsmid) knew something of the value of cottages, and he believed that the result of further inquiry would show that the houses which did not afford decent sleeping accommodation were not £8 houses, on which the tenants paid the rates, but those tenements for which the poor paid at the rate of 1s. 6d. or 2s. a week, or about £5 a year, and the rates upon which were paid by the landlord. He therefore thought the taunt of his right hon. Friend was as little founded in truth as it was otherwise injurious. He would next pass to the argument of his right hon. Friend and others about swamping the constituencies. On this point his right hon. Friend had not only not proved, he had even disproved his own case. He said that in five towns the constituency would be nearly trebled, and that in twenty-eight it would be more than doubled; that made only thirty-three towns or, allowing two Members for each town, sixty-six Members, making about one-fifth of all the borough Members for England and Wales. The House was therefore driven to conclude that in the remaining four-fifths of the boroughs the constituency would not be doubled, and in many of them they knew it would not be nearly doubled. Then it was suggested that the question was not merely one of numbers; that the class indicated by the rents of from £8 to £10 would attract to them those immediately above them, and the two combined would become masters of the situation, and thus the influence of property and intelligence would be destroyed. Now, that argument was opposed to all experience. Was it meant to be said that at present the result of elections in this country depended simply and exclusively upon the class who had the majority of votes? The very contrary was the fact. There was hardly an heir to a peerage, being a man of energy and talent, who sought a seat in that House without being able to obtain it; and the landowners and large manufacturers had great influence over the elections. If they had such an influence now, although a minority, why should they not have that influence under the proposed state of the law? Of late years especially, our upper classes had exerted themselves successfully to improve the condition of their humbler fellow-subjects and gain their confidence; and he believed they would still continue to do so, with the like happy results, if the franchise were lowered. The right hon. Gentleman had also referred to an argument used by the hon. Member for Huddersfield as being

ignava ratio—a cowardly reason. He (Sir Francis Goldsmid) did not know that the House would be much assisted in arriving at a sound conclusion by bandying accusations of political cowardice; but if such accusations could be fitly made, it would rather be against those who desired to intrench themselves behind existing regulations and feared to commit themselves to the good sense of the constituencies when enlarged by the comparatively moderate addition which would be made by that Bill. For himself, he did not share the fears that property and rank were in danger. He believed in the improvement of the people, and he would point to the contrast between their conduct half a century ago in breaking machinery and burning stacks, during periods of distress, and their endurance during the late failure of the supply of cotton. He believed that the proposed change could not be long delayed, and he viewed that change without apprehension founded, as he was convinced it would be, upon the improved regard of our countrymen for authority well exercised and property well used, founded as it would be upon the increased education and intelligence of the working classes, and upon that which was the inevitable result of increased education and intelligence, enlarged respect for the rights of others as well as for their own. He should therefore cordially support the measure.

MR. BUXTON said, it was not his business to defend the Government from the attacks that had been made upon it; but he did not think that any man of plain common sense would have taken the course which the Government had pursued on this subject. They had fulfilled their pledge by bringing in a Reform Bill; but, through the conduct of Gentlemen on both sides, they found it impossible to carry it, and they were ultimately obliged to withdraw it. Although they had not deemed it advisable to bring forward their own measure again, they had voted for similar measures when proposed by others. His hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) qualified his speech in various ways, but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne gave them a very distinct answer to the question by saying, "Do nothing, but stay where you are." Now, that answer had the merit of being simple and straightforward, but it had the demerit of being entirely impracticable. He (Mr. Buxton) wished to deal with the practical question, what course those ought to take who on the one hand were heartily on the side of progress and reform, who looked with utter aversion on the obstructive policy of hon. Gentlemen opposite, who put a sincere trust in the common sense and patriotism of the working classes, and heartily desired to see them endowed with a fair share of political power; but who, on the other hand, were resolved not to allow the present electoral body to be swamped in a flood of new voters, and who were also resolved not to be made the tools of that democratic party represented by the hon. Member for Birmingham, who wanted, by fair means or foul, to convert the time-honoured institutions of this country into a Republic. Why, the Liberal party would be committing high treason to the principles it had invariably laid down and the professions it had invariably made if now suddenly, at the instigation of his right hon. Friend, it leaped to the conclusion not to admit any part of the working class to the franchise. They had invariably asserted the truth that the most perfect form of government was that in which, not, indeed, every individual, but every class in the commonwealth, should have its spokesman in the Great Council of the nation; in which those who had to obey the laws shared in making them; in which those who paid taxes had some voice in imposing them—in which those who must partake in the glory or dishonour of their country could speak through their representatives on matters bearing on the defence of the country and on questions of war and peace. The Liberal party had always held that the direct exclusion of one class, and that the largest, from the pale of citizenship was an insult to its members, and weakened the nation by dividing it; and that a people could only rise to the greatest height of unity, concord, and power when every class could feel that it shared in determining the policy of the realm. Further, that it was essential to the moral and intellectual elevation of the working class that it should bear upon its shoulders the responsibility of political duties. But, even if they could suffer these first principles of Liberalism to fade from their minds, surely any reasonable man must feel that it would be utterly in vain to resist the demand made by some millions of Englishmen to be no longer stamped as pariahs, unworthy of citizenship, unworthy to take any part whatever in guiding the destiny of their country? He was astonished that any one who came at all into contact with the mass of the people should doubt their resolute purpose to raise themselves out of this degrading position. He was astonished that any one should doubt that it was a mere question of time. Besides all that, surely no man who sat on that side of the House, and earnestly desired to see the triumph of those measures that would still further promote the well-being and unity of the people, could wish the Liberal party voluntarily to commit suicide, as it unquestionably would, were it now to convert its creed on this point into a kind of quasi-Toryism? Nor was it worth while in a practical Assembly like that to call upon hon. Members to break with their political friends, ruin their political prospects, and fly in the face of their principles in order to refuse to the working class that fair proportion of political power to which they had always maintained them to be entitled. Much, therefore, as he had admired the powerful eloquence of the right hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Lowe's) speech, he regretted that it had dealt, perhaps, too much with abstract reasoning, instead of grappling with the practical conditions of the case. There was another side of the question to which they could not shut their eyes. He admitted that it would be a dangerous—a disastrous—thing to transfer the franchise from those who at present possessed it to a vast untried multitude, especially since there was no ground of necessity for doing so. Well, but then, if all this were so, why should they shrink at all from supporting the Bill before them? He, for one, should give the Bill a cordial welcome, and he believed that almost every Liberal would do so, were there any solid ground for hoping that it would satiate the demand for Reform. But in that consideration lay the fatal difficulty. In it was to be found the reason why all reasonable Liberals, including the Government, had become somewhat chilled in their affection for this measure. During the last two or three years the hon. Member for Birmingham and his small but determined band of supporters, while professing to be the champions of this Bill, had not been able to refrain from displaying the hearty contempt in which they held it. They had shown more and more that they looked upon it as a mere paltry instalment, or rather, he should say, as an instrument for obtaining that manhood suffrage on which they were bent. It was plain that they did not care for the Bill, but only for the Bills it might produce. Some philosopher or other had said that the reason why men pay respect to women was not because any particular woman was of any particular consequence, but they revered her as the possible mother of heroes. That seemed to be the democratic feeling with regard to this proposal. What he feared was a geometrical progression in measures of that kind, and it was but too plain to anybody who would not shut his eyes to it, that the more you lowered the franchise, the more inevitable was a wider and still wider extension. Moreover, there was something degrading, something almost revolting, in the feelings that a small body of men, whose principles they hated—men, who like the hon. Member for Birmingham, had no love for their institutions, and who seemed rather to feel shame than glory in the name of Englishmen, should skilfully play them with this measure, in itself so reasonable, with the full intention of landing them in due time far lower down the stream. Now, he cordially agreed with the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) and with the right hon. Gentleman—nay, he might say, with four-fifths of the Liberal party—that it would, indeed, be dangerous and disastrous virtually to annihilate the political sway of the existing electors. Those who now possessed the suffrage had so used it as to have done honour to themselves, and to have raised this country to a pitch of well-being unparalleled elsewhere. No plea whatever for taking their power from them and giving it to an untried class could be found in the allegation that they had misused the trust which during the last thirty years had been committed to them. The actual result of their political sway had been to give this country the wisest and most wholesome legislation, and, upon the whole, the most efficient administration of public affairs of which history presented an example. Those who looked with satisfaction and pride on the legislation of the last thirty years, and who loved the institutions of this country, must surely feel that it would be madness itself to rob this class, in whom the choice of our rulers had been vested, of that high function, and make it over to some millions of new men, who might, no doubt, be equally patriotic and equally prudent, but who had not been trained by any experience to a knowledge of public affairs, who all belonged to nearly the same level, and whose education perforce was of a lower kind than that received by those who enjoyed more leisure and more ample means. Could it be denied that there was grave weight in this argument? How had the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) met it in his able and amusing speech? He had only met it by a second-hand joke from Sidney Smith. But in spite of all jokes, fresh or stale, would it be plain sense—would it comport with that sound judgment which happily was the main trait of the English character, that when a governmental machine had worked admirably well, and had produced in unparalleled quantities the greatest happiness of the greatest number, they should radically change its character upon some vague theory about the rights of man? That theory had been tried seventy years ago, and had turned the fairest realm of Christendom into a hell. It had been tried in the United States, and, to say the least, it had disappointed those who held it. It had been tried in our colonies, and every one who returned from them gave the same account of it as one which he had received only a few hours ago from an Australian gentleman, whose words were:—“The working of universal suffrage is as bad as bad can be; no decent man will have anything to do with politics; the corruption is awful.” Upon the whole, then, there undoubtedly were two sides to this question, to neither of which was it possible to shut their eyes. Then, the question was, what ought they to do? He had no claim, and he certainly had no wish to obtrude advice upon others; but those who felt the force of these conflicting necessities would, perhaps, come to the same conclusion as himself—namely, that on the one hand, both for the sake of keeping faith towards those who had elected them, and because no other opportunity was afforded them of affirming the principle they sincerely held, that the working class must be raised to a fair share of power, they should support the second reading of this Bill, but that in doing so they should call upon the Government no longer to leave this great question to be dealt with by private hands. They should call on the Government to take it into their own, and bring forward a well-weighed, well-adjusted, and comprehensive scheme, by which that principle should ~~be~~ bona fide be carried out, but in such a way and under such conditions as should effect-

tually secure the upper and middle classes from being deposed from their rightful political position by those below them. But, then, could that be done? How could the best part of the working class be thus introduced to power without overwhelming the rest by their mere mass? He should reply, assuredly this could be done. That would not be the place or time to do more than throw out one or two bare suggestions; but undoubtedly that object would be effected if, in the first place, those restrictions were abolished which deprived so many artisans and others paying £10 a year rental from enjoying the franchise, whether because they were merely lodgers, or did not pay their own rates, or in various other ways. By the abolition of those restrictions the highest portion of the working class would be at once admitted. Beyond that he could not discover the practical objection to giving the franchise to those workmen who, by the acquisition of property in the savings' banks or elsewhere, had shown frugality and forethought. His belief was that by such means an excellent and ample portion of the working class could be admitted with perfect safety. But if this were not thought to be enough—if it were thought essential to reduce the qualification from £10 to £6, still the dangers of that course might be vastly diminished if, instead of standing alone, as in the Bill before the House, that measure were accompanied by others tending to preserve a due balance of power between property and numbers. He was not now talking of visionary plans, such as that of Mr. Hare, nor was he even advocating that which at the same time had every merit of justice, simplicity, and reason, but which had the fatal demerit of looking, though it would not really be, invidious—namely, the plan of a plurality of votes—but he referred to other arrangements, such as that of combining all the country towns with the boroughs, so that the constituencies should not consist too much of one class, living all together under the same influences; and, again, to such an arrangement as that boroughs should be divided so that each division should have its one Member, instead of the election of both or all the Members being in the hands of the very same persons. That would not be the place or time to enter upon any discussion of these or of several other precautions that might at the same time be perfectly well taken. One objection, however, had been made to every scheme of this kind, and had been renewed in the course of this debate—the objection that if they adopted this course it would be to give the suffrage to the working classes with one hand, and to take it away again with the other. He emphatically denied that this would be so. Those who took the same view that he did expressly desired to give the working classes political power; they had no wish whatever to make a pretence of giving it to them while really snatching its substance away by a dexterous machinery. The precautions that they wished to take simply tended to prevent that share from becoming an extravagant and excessive one, and to prevent this one class from swamping the others by its mere mass. It appeared to him that it was to the providing of such safeguards that the moderate Liberals ought to devote their energies. It would be neither right nor practicable for them to reject the demand of the working class for citizenship; but it would be, not folly, but criminal lunacy, if they paved the way to republi- canizing our institutions and overwhelming the just influence of property by sheer numbers. There was, then, no alternative whatever, except to face the difficulties that lay in the way, and accompany that gift by such arrangements as would secure to the existing electors, representing the invested property of the country, that ample share of political authority to which no man could deny their claim.

MR. STANSFELD: Sir, I am not desirous to enter into party or personal questions raised on former occasions; I have no letters from America or from the colonies with which to amuse the House; I have no conversations in the lobby to report. I rise for the simple, and I hope legitimate if not very interesting, purpose of supporting the second reading of this Bill. We have heard from many Members who have spoken in this debate exhortations to speak as candidly as we are supposed to do behind the Chair or in the lobby, without having the fear of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire before our eyes. I entirely give my assent to this exhortation, and I think the speech of the noble Lord and those who followed him on the same side, are entitled to the merit of frankness. But it is a totally different question whether their speeches represent the fair and average opinion of the majority of this House—and that is a matter upon which I would beg leave to take issue with them. We have had Reform before this House and the country some thirteen or fourteen years. It has been the subject of several speeches from the Throne, it has been the subject of four Ministerial proposals; and when the Government of the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire fell, it was not because he and his party opposed themselves to Reform, but because the measure they proposed was felt to be not sufficiently liberal; above everything, with reference to the borough franchise, to meet the views of the majority of this House. ["No, no!"] I am speaking of facts. The theory of some hon. Members on this point is very simple, it is this, that during all this period we have been in an atmosphere of illusions, of hypocrisies, and of shams. The right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) put it in the most distinct way when he said that Reform had been the mere plaything and shuttlecock of parties. That assertion of the right hon. Gentleman was more cheered than any other by Gentlemen at the other side of the House; and yet they, too, had their Reform Bill. I am not capable of supposing that their pleasurable excitement at the statement was caused by the contemplation of their own unworthiness; and I think that what they found agreeable on that occasion was the spectacle, by no means without a precedent in this Parliament, and not without its natural attraction for some persons, of Members rising at this side of the House and recanting one by one every tenet that should go to form the faith and justify the title of a Liberal party. Some people are said to be worse than they appear; but I must say that if the House of Commons appears to the right hon. Member for Calne in that light, I do not think it so bad as it seemed in the right hon. Gentleman's eyes. I join issue with the right hon. Gentleman upon his statement in reference to that part of the question, and believe it possible throughout all the period referred to, to trace a common ground of general opinion and current of thought, on which, though party may from time to time have driven some of them on the path of Reform further than their own volition would have led, it ought now to be possible to legislate with respect to the question of Reform. I will endeavour to define what I believe to be that kind of average opinion. But before I do so I wish to say a word in passing on another kind of opinion. Two classes of opinion are to be dealt with, which I may call the inside class and outside class. I must refer to the view which the noble Lord who moved the Amendment took of what he called the apathy out of doors. It is perfectly true that there is no enthusiasm out of doors on this question. There never was enthusiasm on the subject of any of the Reform measures brought before the House since 1852. It was not in their nature to create popular enthusiasm, but that is no objection if they could be shown to be safe measures. If the advocates of Reform were fanatics on this question, there is nothing they would hail more gladly than the contemptuous rejection of proposals like that of my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds; and nothing would delight them so much as speeches like that of the right hon. Member for Calne, because such acts and such indications of policy and feeling are just the elements which go to form broad and bold lines of demarcation between classes of opinion in the country, and tend to a condition of mind favourable for great and revolutionary changes. I distinctly say that to such a policy, which belongs to the past, and which, I trust, none will do anything to revive, I prefer a moderate measure willingly conceded, and therefore I support the present Bill. Now let me refer to the inside opinion—the opinion of this House, and, in fact, of the ruling classes of the country. The general opinion is to the effect that it is advisable that there should be some extension of the franchise. I will go further, and say that the object of that extension is generally agreed upon. It is the admission under conditions of a class that has been hitherto almost entirely excluded—the working class. ["No, no!"] There may be many Members who do not accord with that opinion, but the very great majority—["No, no!"] Many Members even on the other side of the House voted for a measure that professed to have that object. There is an agreement in general terms upon the question as to the extent, but as to the mode and means of admitting the working class there are different opinions, and the matter would, no doubt, be discussed with reference to the fears that the existing constituencies might be swamped by mere numbers, and that the first step would be only one in a facilis descensus averni, leading down to pure democracy and the domination of mere numbers. If that be anything like a fair description of the inside opinion, I ask the House to test by it the Bill which my hon. Friend

! What is the principle of that Bill? The principle of the Bill of my hon. Friend is neither more nor less than this—that you should by lowering the rental qualification in boroughs admit into your ordinary constituencies some portion of the working class of this country. I know that the noble Lord who moved the Previous Question will not object to that definition. That being the principle of the Bill, to what extent would that principle be carried? There is no question about what the figures would be under the Bill of my hon. Friend. I have gone through them, and I think the House will give me credit for some accuracy when I say that the result of those figures is that the whole of the borough constituencies, excluding the metropolitan constituencies, would constitute a new electoral body of which not more than one-third would belong to the working classes. That is the principle and that is the extent to which this Bill would carry it. And here arises the dilemma of which we have heard so much, and it is this — It is said by this uniform lowering of the franchise that you grant too little or too much. I will deal with that difficulty and dilemma. At present you have an obnoxiously uniform franchise—a franchise carried down to the bottom of the middle class stratum in the country; as if on purpose, you have stopped at a point which, with few exceptions, excludes the whole of the working classes. We have heard of a few exceptional cases—there were exceptional cases brought before the Committee of the House of Lords in 1860. Perhaps only in a dozen constituencies are Members returned principally by the votes of the working classes; and is anyone, on looking to these, prepared to say that the Members they return are not fit to take their places in this House? Two amongst those constituencies return Cabinet Ministers. That may certainly be an objection to some persons. I, for one, should not object to them on that account. So much for the uniform lowering of the franchise. Now for the question as to the too little or too much of the franchise. In a limited number of large boroughs the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne told us what the effect would be. I say that would be a good effect. What everybody who desires any extension of the franchise wishes is that there should be some working class representation in this country. It is said that in some of those large boroughs we should have a large influx of working-class voters, who would swamp the present constituencies. Now, I admit that that would be a fair objection, whether in a number of boroughs or in a single borough. To meet this objection, the notion of the representation of minorities has been introduced. I cannot say I like that notion, either as a philosophy or as a system; but I think there may be circumstances and purposes under which the acceptance of that principle as embodied in the Bill of 1854 may be admissible. It is undoubtedly a growing and evil tendency in constituencies which are simply numerous and bulky, that those who are wealthy, educated, and refined should withdraw themselves into a kind of Faubourg St. Germain and not take any part in the elections. That is one great complaint against the metropolitan constituencies. I say that it is an evil, and I would remedy and prevent that evil if I could; and therefore I say that if in the larger towns you find there is a danger of swamping that class, and of keeping them out of their due part of political life, I would accept in those cases the principle and the notion of a representation of a minority. But in the bulk of our towns that is not the condition of things. In the bulk of our towns you would evidently have a subordinate fraction of the constituency capable of being worked up into the ordinary material of your electoral bodies in the country. And I put this question to the House—Is it, or is it not an advantage? because that is the crucial test of the Bill of my hon. Friend. Not only from a Liberal but from a Conservative point of view is it or is it not an advantage that you should admit and work up into the ordinary material of your constituencies some portion of a class which no one desires to see supreme, but which by its moral, social, and educational progress is entitled to its share in the representation. The objections raised to the Bill of my hon. Friend have been, not to the measure itself, but mainly to the self-created fear of an advance towards a pure democracy. We have had one very specific argument against the reduction of the borough franchise from £10 to £6, and that was contained in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne. In that speech he quoted some statements of Mr. Barker, one of the Factory Commissioners, who, speaking of the Freehold Land Societies, said—will of working men is an immensely significant one. All these owners of houses are freeholders, and every man has earned his own freehold from a desire to possess it. While in the same locality, employed at the same work and the same wages, and without any extraordinary drawback, a vast number of those who possess no such properties live on from day to day, regardless of every enjoyment which is not sensual, exhibiting no desire for an elevation of character among their fellow-men, wasting their money in profitless pursuits, or in degrading pastimes, and being for ever unprepared for the commonest vicissitudes which bring such misery in their train."

"I ask the House upon which of the classes here described will the Bill of the hon. Member for Leeds operate? Not upon the provident, but mainly upon the improvident class. For the provident are not only in possession of the franchise—they have soared far above it, and have got into the region of freeholders. It will, therefore, apply to the men who waste their time in these profitless and degrading pursuits, in order, I suppose, that they may be elevated and fished out of the mire in which they delight to grovel, introduced to power, and intrusted with control over the Constitution of the country. . . . The question for you now to determine is whether you ought to bring down the franchise to the level of those persons who have no such sense of decency or morality, and of what is due to themselves and their children—whether you will, so to speak, degrade the franchise into the dirt, imperil your institutions, and put yourselves in danger of their overthrow, or whether you will make this franchise a vast instrument of good, a lever by which you may hope to elevate the working classes—not in the manner in which a mawkish sentimentality contemplates, but really to raise the working classes in the social scale by fixing the franchise at a reasonable level, requiring a little, and only a little, effort on their part to attain."

I ask the House is it true, or is it not true, that to the bulk of the working classes these remarks are fairly applied? Is it true that their lives are spent in drunkenness and in sensual enjoyments, and that decency does not reign in their homes? I quote this statement of the right hon. Gentleman's mainly for the purpose of asking the House to agree in this view—that it is not a sound notion to say you have a right to expect people to shape their expenditure, and to give to this and take from that, and to live in houses more highly rented than those which suffice for their wants, for the sake of obtaining admission to the franchise? I shall pass over the philosophical commonplaces which we have heard against doctrines of the rights of man, and I shall pass over also the objections to what are called the sentimental grievances of exclusion from the franchise, with this simple remark that the greatest questions are not only practical

but also sentimental, and that the same objection might be brought to bear against those who defend representative Government against despotic government, against those who claim religious freedom or even national existence. But at last we come to a positive theory of philosophy of his own, as the right hon. Gentleman told us, and that was that what he called good government was the sole test and the sole object of any constitutional arrangement. Now, that is a very distinct proposition, but it is as unsound—because it is as incomplete—as it appears to be distinct and definite. It is not good government only, but it is security for good and stable government, which is the object of constitutional arrangements. In this country we have always been accustomed to believe that that could only be found in free representative institutions, in which all classes should have their fair share. There is another object of constitutional government which I will mention, though it may expose me to the charge of sentimentalism, and it is this—it is to train up and elevate the population of your country to self-governing powers and habits, to a sense of dignity and self-dependence. That I believe can be best secured by an extension to them—moderately and safely—of political rights. What is it that those who oppose Reform fear in a moderate measure like this? Why should you persist in treating the working classes entirely as a class apart? We know that neither in those boroughs in which they happen to be a considerable proportion, nor in those in which they had even a greater share of influence before the Reform Act of 1832, do they act as a class entirely apart. Why should you doubt the influence which wealth and education and leisure must exercise over the masses of the political community? This is not a Bill calculated to effect any transfer of power from one class to another. There is no intention or notion of transfer of power. ["Oh!"] That was the effect of the Act of 1832; but that Act has done its work. Immense has been the progress of the country since then; and it is because of that progress that my hon. Friend asks you to have faith in your own work and to have some confidence in yourselves and to extend the franchise to those whom it ought to have been the object of all your reforms to fit for its exercise. We have been warned to beware of the bad political economy of the working classes. Bad political economy has been driven out of the country since the Conservative party and the landowners of England were converted to the doctrines of free trade. You have been told to fear the trades unions. Well, if you desire to render them less absolute in their authority give them the suffrage, and you will help to drive out that sectarianism which characterizes the working as it does other classes—you will do something to render less distinct if not to obliterate the broad and offensive line which now separates them from the rest of the political community. I have but a few more words to say and they will be in protest against two theories which have been propounded with the applause of the House. The first is the down-hill theory of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne—the notion that if you take any step it must inevitably lead you down to the evils of the supremacy of mere numbers. Well, I retort his ignava ratio, and say that the argument is a cowardly argument. You ought to have more confidence in yourselves and your country than to accept such a view as that. If you could accept it it would be the doom and the admission of the incompetence of the ruling classes of this country. It would be your doom because you have said that the first step would be fatal; it would be the confession of your incompetence, because you have said that after that first step you were incapable of controlling the destinies or guiding the policy of their country. But if you were to adopt that proposition you would be doing gross injustice not only to the working classes, but to yourselves; because you must recollect that politics are, after all, only part of the life of a nation, that social conditions govern their possibilities, and you know that in this country you could not, if you would, Americanise or colonialise our institutions. The other theory to which I object is the “perfect machine” theory. That is an equally doctrinaire and superficial theory. I should object to it if it came from men who were asking the House to divide out the country by rule and measure into equal electoral districts; I should object to it if it came from those who would construct a system of representing every minority, every opinion, and every crotchet which could find supporters enough to entitle it to one Member in that House; I object to it if it comes from a man who, like Lord Grey, proposes fantastic schemes to make the Constitution work; but, above all, I object to it if it comes from the mouth of those who put it forward as a non possumus against any possible extension of the suffrage. There is, fortunately, in this country something upon which we can depend which is higher and safer than any mere Constitutional machinery. It is public opinion—enlightened and progressive public opinion—which guides and controls that machinery, and which is capable of amending it without danger to the State; a public opinion upon which all of us ought to rely, because it has led us upon paths upon which we have never desired to return, and it has made converts one by one of almost all those who had opposed themselves to the improvements which by its influence have been brought about. Relying upon that public opinion, I believe, despite all these hopeless political speculations, that the time is not far distant when this House will pass a measure of Reform with the simple fearless object of admitting within the pale of the franchise, and to some share of public right and the exercise of public duty, the class which no one asks you ever to allow to be supreme, but which by its progress is entitled to some share of political power and to some consideration at the hands of that House.

MR. HORSMAN: I assure the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli, who had risen at the same time) that I make him every apology for interposing between him and the House; but he can command its attention at an hour when Members less eminent cannot hope to do so; and therefore I hope that he will forgive me if, for a few moments, I venture to trespass upon your patience. Sir, those who have listened to the very able, argumentative, and ingenious speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax, who has just sat down, cannot fail to have been struck by the very marked distinction which is discernible between the small and insignificant and harmless character of this Bill, as described in his speech, and its larger character, and more important and inevitable tendencies as illustrated by his arguments. Ostensibly, it is a Bill to introduce a £6 franchise in boroughs; but, logically and practically, it is a Bill to abolish the £10 franchise established by the Reform Act, and to substitute a new franchise under which the great bulk of the operative population shall be admitted to vote. I am sure that my hon. Friend who introduced the Bill will not object to that construction of it. [Mr. BAINES: I do!] If my hon. Friend repudiates that construction of his Bill he must repudiate the speeches he has himself made in its support.

MR. BAINES, amid cries of "Order, order!" was understood to say, that he had said that only a portion of the operative classes would, under this Bill, be admitted to the franchise.

MR. HORSMAN: The explanation of my hon. Friend drives me for a moment to an entirely new line of argument. I should be extremely sorry to misrepresent him, but I think that by reminding him of his own arguments I need not despair of making him a convert to my construction of them. What has been the burden of his speeches? They have gone to prove that the operative class are, as a class, so virtuous and intelligent that they ought to be admitted to the franchise. [Mr. BAINES: Not universally.] [Order!] If my hon. Friend will be patient, I will remind him of his argument step by step. He gave us, as I am sure he will remember, a great quantity of industrial statistics to prove the fitness of that class; he told us of their material and mental and moral elevation, and enlarged upon the thousands of newspapers they read and the millions of letters they write. He dwelt upon their co-operative societies, their savings' bank deposits, their schools, and institutes; and, on one occasion, he told us that there were no fewer than 3,000,000 teetotallers, principally of the operative class. Now I want to know what could be the meaning of this vast amount of statistical information all about the operative class, and introduced into a speech on the lowering of the borough franchise, except to show that as a class they were fit for the franchise?

And having established that fitness, my hon. Friend then proceeded to develop his great fact, his gigantic grievance, which he brings in this Bill to remedy. "Of all this vast, virtuous, and intelligent class," said my hon. Friend, "so small, so infinitesimal a proportion possesses the franchise, that practically the whole class may be said to be excluded. That exclusion is unjust, it is unwise, nay," he said, in grave and solemn tones, "it is very dangerous; because, although at this moment the excluded masses are peaceable and loyal, they may not always remain so; for sooner or later the blood of Englishmen boils under injustice, and, therefore, as a measure of justice, of policy, and even of safety, I offer you my Bill, and entreat you to accept it as a means of removing discontent and insuring peace." ["No!"] I am sure my hon. Friend will admit that I am not misrepresenting or in any way exaggerating his statements. [Mr. BAINES intimated assent.] I am very happy, that so far, my hon. Friend accepts my description of his language and his arguments. Well, Sir, but when we come to examine the Bill, the mighty instrument by which all these blessed results are to be brought about, what do we find? Is it calculated to effect its purpose? Is the Bill in harmony with the speeches made in its support? Does it materially diminish the injustice complained of, or remove the causes of agitation and disturbance? Nothing of the kind. The great bulk of the operative class are entirely unaffected by this Bill. My hon. Friend has just told me that he only wishes to enfranchise a small and select few. But they are so few and so select that, after the Bill has passed, no less than 95 per cent of this virtuous and intelligent class—we have the fact on the authority of the most reliable Returns—will still be excluded from the franchise. But how do you reconcile that exclusion with your own speeches? Is it right that 95 per cent of the operative class should remain excluded? Can you justify that exclusion? Do you intend to repudiate it? I challenge you to say, in the face of this House and of the public, whether the injustice you have denounced, and the dangers you have foreshadowed, can be materially diminished by this Bill? Well, then, what do you intend to do? Do you intend this Bill to be final? Dare you proclaim its finality on the hustings at Leeds? And, mind you, by finality I do not point to a vague and uncertain future, but I speak of current events, and of the circumstances and changes of the present year. And I ask you this question—"Suppose we pass this Bill in the course of the present Session, how long do you intend it to last?" Remember, you have warned the House that it must satisfy the demands of the non-electors. What are those demands? How far do they go? If they exist at all—and of their existence you have not given us a shadow of proof, nor has a shadow of proof been supplied to you, for when we entered on the discussion last week the most advanced Reformers could not muster a petition in favour of the Bill—I say, if t—

mands exist at all, they go a great deal further than this Bill. You tell us you are the mouthpiece of the non-electors; but where did you get your commission? The non-electors do not ask for this Bill. They will not accept it at your hands; confessedly, it is only offered as an instalment; and I must remind my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary of that fact. When my noble Friend (Lord Elcho) mentioned the word "instalment," he was responded to with loud cheers from this part of the House. Well, then, this Bill is admitted to be only an instalment. That is a great admission. Suppose that we now pass it, can you doubt—do you not know—that another Bill, with a further instalment, will be introduced next year? And when you are asked on the hustings to support it, what will be your answer? Can you refuse? If you do, will not your own speeches be cast in your teeth? Will not you be pelted with your own statistics? Will not you be asked whether all the virtues you have ascribed to the operative class are confined to £6 tenements? My hon. Friend says he only wishes to admit a select few; and the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster) improved on this by saying, "We only wish to introduce the élite of the working class." But will not you be asked what business you have to make any selection at all, and especially a selection that leaves 95 per cent excluded? I must confess that on this point I have been a good deal disappointed by the speeches of the supporters of the Bill. If there is one virtue more than another which we ascribe to advanced Reformers, and upon which they pride themselves, it is their courage and their candour. My hon. Friend (Mr. Baines) said that one great advantage of the Motion and Amendment was that they divested the question of all ambiguity; and my hon. Friend (Mr. Leatham) in a speech of singular ability, told us that the question was now arrived at a point when candour was of more value than statistics. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Forster) said he would state the real case fairly and plainly to the House; and yet all these Gentlemen, with their profuse assurances of candour and non-ambiguity, affect to be surprised and grieved because the House will not fall into the manifest and palpable blunder of discussing and accepting this Bill as a sincere and honest settlement of the question. It is not one of them who is a great deal better than I can tell him, that there has not been for months past a meeting of Reformers—certainly none that has ventured to publish its proceedings—at which this proposal of a settlement by means of a £6 franchise has not been contemptuously set aside as an antiquated and exploded Whig delusion.

No, Sir, the modern school of Reform, well and ably represented by some of my Friends near me, and which is the only school of Reform now in which there is any vitality or logic, glories in a creed more in accordance with an age of enterprise and discovery. They have discovered, or, if they are not the discoverers, they are the first to enunciate on anything like authority the principle that the franchise is the birthright of every Englishman, provided he is a man of sound mind and untainted with crime; though I must confess that I think even that limitation somewhat detracts from the comprehensive liberality of their creed. That is their measure of justice. They will be content with nothing less; and although they are not indisposed to vote for the unsubstantial measure of my hon. Friend, they do so only in the conviction that it carries them so far in the direction in which they wish to go, and is a first, convenient, and irrevocable step towards universal suffrage.

Here, then, is the principle, hardly concealed, of the Bill before us. There is not one of its supporters who will affect to believe that the £6 franchise contains in itself the solid basis of a settlement. The Home Secretary has told us this evening that there is no magic in the figure "10." No, Sir; but is there any magic in the figure "6?" The promoters of this Bill know, and are acting upon the knowledge, that if there is a reduction from £10 to £6, the same facts, the same arguments, the same motives will operate with increased force to compel a further reduction from £6 to £3, from £3 to 3s.; and this first downward movement is but the commencement of a series of descents, with no sound footing or solid resting-place until we touch the bottom of the abyss. Thanks to the statistics of my hon. Friend illustrated by the speeches of his supporters, we are now arriving at an understanding of the real character of the Bill, and of the changes that are likely to follow its adoption. Now, let me ask the House to consider the arguments by which these changes are justified. The franchise, we are told, is the birthright of every Englishman—it is his badge of citizenship—his charter of freedom. The unenfranchised Englishman, we are told, is a degraded being. The Constitution shuts its door upon him. The Legislature owns no allegiance to him. I even heard an hon. Friend of mine say something in this debate about the unenfranchised being hewers of wood, and drawers of water; the non-elect is in fact, a chattel, rather than a free man.

Now, these are the phrases current on the platform—coined and circulated among the masses to instruct them as to their condition and their duty. But is it possible to conceive a string of fallacies more transparent, or a mis-reading of the Constitution more deplorable or flagrant? I join issue with my hon. Friends on their very first point—the basis of their whole creed—the principle of the franchise. I entirely deny that the franchise is, or ever has been in any sense whatever, the right of any man or of any class of men in England. The franchise is conferred by law, not as matter of private right or individual advantage, but as a public trust. It is for the reason that it is a public trust that the Legislature has guarded its exercise with stringent pains and penalties. You punish the elector who sells his vote. Why? Because the vote is not his to sell. You punish the candidate who buys a vote. Why? Because he corruptly contrives to procure the violation of a public trust. That public trust is conferred on individuals and constituencies or withheld from them solely upon considerations of public interest. An individual, therefore, has no more natural or constitutional right to be an elector than he has to be a magistrate, or a Member of Parliament, or a Judge. If public policy requires—and public policy in this country must always be founded on public opinion—that the electoral body should be extremely limited, that it should consist only of the great landowners and the rich mill-owners, with a qualification of many hundreds or thousands a year, that ought to be the law. If, again, public policy, sanctioned by public opinion, requires that the electoral body should be very numerous and very poor—that all the employers of labour should be excluded, as Peers are now excluded, and that ploughmen and artisans should be elected to Parliament, that ought to be the law. There is no rule of law or claim of right as to the franchise, except the security of public

And even admitting for a moment that the franchise can be a private or personal right, even then, the enlargement or abridgment of that right is within the competence of Parliament, to be decided exclusively on grounds of public policy. If that be granted, and I do not think any hon. Member will dispute it—if the franchise be a trust for public purposes, it is manifestly the duty of the Legislature to keep that purpose steadily in view, and to make it the sole aim and end of our electoral system to secure such a House of Commons as shall most effectually promote the national interests, and faithfully reflect the national character. In fact, Sir, the best distribution of the franchise is that which will secure us the best House of Commons; and by the best House of Commons I mean something very different from that which seems to be floating in the minds of some of my Friends around me, whose ideal of a House of Commons is that it should be so accurate a representation of the character and feelings of all classes in the country, that it should represent their weaknesses and vices, as well as their virtues, their ignorance as well as their intelligence. Now, my idea of the best House of Commons is that it should be the best selection and combination which the nation can furnish of those qualities of sound knowledge, high intelligence, morality, and of political experience, and administrative capacity, that are the attributes of a great deliberative and representative Assembly, traditionally honoured and revered as the Grand Council of the nation, the centre of the wisdom and the power which govern not England but an Empire. If, then, it be admitted that it ought to be the sole aim and purpose of a Reform Bill not to admit or exclude any particular class, but to improve the composition and character of the House of Commons, let us try your Bill by that test.

Now, it appears to me that the first and most obvious effect of your proposed legislation will be to introduce a new class of voters, more numerous than all the other classes combined. ["No, no!"] I must confess I was not prepared for these expressions of dissent from my hon. Friends behind me who prefer candour to statistics. The phrase that I used was "proposed legislation," because this Bill is confessedly an instant. ["No, no!"] That ; but from the very name quarter from which cheers proceeded before, when the word "instalment" was mentioned. The Bill is but the commencement of a series. It is Bill No. 1 ; it is what my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) calls a single-barrel Reform Bill, and we know that there is a double-barrel ready charged. Suppose, then, that this Bill No. 1 does not swamp the existing constituencies, we know that No. 2 is ready to accomplish that which No. 1 may fail to execute. Therefore, I say, the first effect of this Bill will be to introduce a new class of voters more numerous than all those now existing combined ; and this new class will have not only a share but a preponderance of political power. The old constituency will be swamped and a new one enthroned. The first question we have to ask is this, will the new constituency be an improvement on the old ? Tried by the standard of intelligence it will not. The existing constituency is composed of a variety of classes with divers degrees of intelligence, but generally of a high order ; but your new constituency will be all of one class, and with a standard of intelligence very far below that of the body they are supplanting.

Strange to say, however, this change is justified on the plea of intelligence. The working classes are so intelligent ! But are the middle classes not intelligent ? What unfitness have they shown, what offence have they committed, that they should be so contemptuously set aside ? You tell us that new classes have become qualified for the franchise ; we do not deny that ; but do you say that the old classes have become disqualified ? You dare not say that, but you do disqualify them, for you swamp them, and swamping is disqualifying, disfranchising, politically extinguishing.

My hon. Friends profess immense respect for intelligence—it is an idol of their worship ; but, mind you, only when it is allied with poverty. They have unbounded respect for the intelligence of the artisan, but they pass by with an indifference almost savouring of contempt the intelligence of the middle-class shopkeeper and employer. But surely you have no right to enfranchise one class because it is intelligent, while, by so doing, you disfranchise another which is more intelligent. I know no stronger condemnation that can be pronounced against your Bill than this glaring injustice on the face of it, that it would deprive a higher class of voters of political

I am aware I may be told, as others have been told before me, that I am disparaging the working classes, that I am not prepared to trust them. Sir, I will trust the working classes exactly as far as I will trust any other class, and no further. I would not give a monopoly of political power to an aristocratic class ; I would not give it to the middle class ; and I would not give it to the working class for precisely the same reasons. I acknowledge—as every observant and reflecting man must gratefully acknowledge—the advancing intelligence and morality of the working class ; but I cannot descend to the hypocrisy of complimenting them at the expense of other classes. I tell them—what they know full well—that intelligence is the result of education ; and in every country the class which has least leisure must have least education, and that is of necessity the working class. Still, I say, we have reason to be proud of our English working class ; and never to my mind has their intelligence been more marked or their character more worthy of respect than when they turn a cold shoulder to those amiable but weak and enthusiastic admirers of democratic institutions who appear to flatter their intelligence only to miscalculate their credulity, while they enlarge upon fancied wrongs and imaginary grievances, the detail of which would have inflamed the ignorant multitude of twenty-five years ago, but are only listened to as matter of indifference, and frequently of entertainment, by the well-informed and well-contented masses in the present day.

But, although I do not approve the provisions of this Bill, I frankly avow that I never wish to see the day when the operative class in this country shall be indifferent to political affairs, and I am as alive as any of my friends can be to the desirability of admitting them to a larger share of political power. But unfortunately the problem has never yet been solved, how to give the masses a large share of political power without giving them a monopoly. I agree entirely with what has been so truly said by the hon. Member for Leeds, that the uniform £10 franchise, substituted in 1832 for the variety of franchises it swept away, was the great defect of the Reform Act ; but that which was an accident in the hurry of revolution would become under this Bill an established rule, determining all future changes in the franchise; every successive change diminishing the influence of wealth and education and establishing the principle of numbers. But the principle of numbers involves the principle of equality; leading to the conclusion that every man is equally fit to choose a Member of Parliament—the ploughman as fit as a Prime Minister, the spinner as fit as the master manufacturer. Is that what you now mean to say? Do you really think that 100 artisans ought to have more political power than ninety-nine employers? Ought 100 labourers and ploughmen to have more political power than ninety-nine squires? You dare not say so in words, yet you propose to establish it by your legislation. These arguments, which might be multiplied and extended indefinitely are, to any man who prefers a Monarchy to a Democracy, condemnatory of this Bill on its merits.

But then another pressure is put upon us to induce us to accept this Bill. The faith of this Parliament is pledged to Reform—the question is one of public character and honour. For six years, my hon. Friend says behind me, has this perfidious Parliament gone on disregarding its pledges and cheating the country; but the hour of retribution is at hand, the sinner is about to die, and so his last moments are disturbed by the spectre of Reform stalking in, personified by my hon. Friends the Members for Liskeard and Leeds and standing by the bedside of the expiring criminal, urging him to repent and confess before it is too late.

Now, Sir, it must be admitted that the occasion, on the eve of a dissolution, is peculiarly fitting for the task of self-examination and confession; and it cannot be denied that the present position of the House of Commons in regard to Reform is so peculiar, so anomalous, and so perfectly unexampled, that before we are dispersed the country has a right to some explanation of these remarkable circumstances of our career either in the way of apology or justification. For, as was ably and powerfully urged by my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham), the one question which this House of Commons was elected to deal with was so well understood, the circumstances under which the last Government was ejected from office were so notorious, the pledges under which the present Government took office were so positive and precise, and their undisputed retention of office, after the abandonment of their Reform Bill, was at first sight so incomprehensible, that I do think we are bound to attempt some answer to the question of the hon. Member for Huddersfield how it is that a state of things so strange and apparently so little creditable to the House of Commons should have been so long tolerated by the country.

Sir, to those who have watched and studied the Reform question long, and anxiously, and deeply, the explanation is not so difficult nor is it, on the whole, so unsatisfactory as it appeared to my hon. Friend. It is well known that all the abortive Reform Bills previous to 1859 were the work of one man. As long as he was a Member of the House of Commons, Lord Russell appeared to have, on the question of Parliamentary Reform, positively a monomania. He had such an agreeable recollection of the plaudits of 1832 that he seemed to think that, whenever the popularity of his party was at a discount, he had nothing to do but to pull a new Reform Bill out of his red box to insure a new lease of popularity and power. Of all the prominent persons with whom he was associated, Ministers and statesmen, he was the only man who wanted these Reform Bills, and he was compelled to abandon them because the country did not want them. Well, when the present Prime Minister was called to the head of affairs he showed himself of a more tranquil and sagacious temperament. He would not move on Reform—he could not be got to move—but when a Conservative Government thought it right to produce a large measure of Reform, and their opponents thought it right to turn them out upon it, then the noble Lord had no alternative. He bent to the storm; and so his Cabinet in 1860 undertook to settle the Reform question, and as their opponents have facetiously reminded them, settle it they did most effectually. But let me ask the House, was that settlement the work of the Government, of Parliament, or of the country? Well, let us be fair and speak out the truth—it was the joint work of all three. The Ministry were not more responsible than the Parliament, nor Parliament more responsible than the public out of doors.

The fact is, the question of the suffrage had never been seriously studied or considered until that Session of 1860. It was then only its gravity was understood. Before that hon. Gentlemen—especially on this side of the House — had been accustomed to deal in platitudes about Reform, without thinking what it really meant, how it was to be accomplished, or to what it was to lead. Extension of the suffrage had been a popular cry, a hustings plaything, a vague fiction rather than a reality. But when the Bill of 1860 was read a second time unopposed, and popular Members were cheered with the glad tidings that their prayers for a large increase of their constituencies had at last been heard, then, for the first time, extension of the suffrage presented itself to their minds as a real business question, and viewed in that new aspect the more they looked at it the less they liked it. And then they began to inquire of one another what extension of the suffrage really meant, on what principle it proceeded, what further changes and consequences it must necessitate; and then they were startled by the discovery that the great problem it involved—how to give the masses a large share of political power without giving them a monopoly—had never been thought out; and then uneasiness grew into alarm, and alarm expanded into panic, as they found how carelessly they had been advancing to the very brink of a volcano; and then the newly awakened conscience of honourable men pricked them in many places; and then arose that strong and general determination, on these Benches as well as those, to postpone, by any and every means, this first, irrevocable, downward step, and gain, if possible, only one year of breathing time for a more statesmanlike and scientific investigation than had yet been brought to bear on this momentous change.

And this feeling in the House was only a reflection of the feeling out of doors. The thought and intelligence of the country condemned the Bill. Among educated men, not avowed Democrats, it had not a sincere friend; and the nation became seriously alarmed as it gathered from the debates in Parliament how little real light was guiding the Government proposal, and that a rash and ill-considered measure was threatening to subjugate the whole State to the dominion of the masses. I appeal to any candid man who hears me for the truth of what I am now saying. And so it was, Sir, that only after the last general election the education of Parliament and the country on the entire bearing of the suffrage question may be said fairly to have commenced. All thoughtful men saw that the nation had had a great escape; there was no inclination to rush into fresh danger; and the Government, wisely observant of this changed state of feeling, and perhaps having themselves acquired some new perception of the great principles and consequences involved, opened the Session of 1861 without a Reform Bill, and boldly challenged the judgment of Parliament on their conduct.

And the challenge was accepted. My hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. White) promptly responded to that challenge. He at least was determined that the Reform question should not be laid aside without some of its loud professing friends making a stand and a protest in its behalf. He adopted the manly course, he moved an Amendment to the Address affirming the necessity for Reform, and by implication censuring the Government for its abandonment.

Now, here was the issue which the Government had invited fairly raised, and if that Amendment had been carried the Government must have gone out. My hon. Friend the Member for Brighton applied a test far better than this which is now being applied on the eve of a dissolution—to the sincerity and consistency of professing Reformers. Would they sacrifice Reform to the Government, or would they sacrifice the Government to Reform? "And what," said my hon. Friend, "what signifies the existence of a Government compared with the fulfilment of the great Reform mission? Do not we all know that great questions have been always advanced by the sacrifice of Governments, and that nothing assists a popular question so much as the sacrifice of an obstructive Government which stands in the way of its advancement." My hon. Friend, therefore, left to the House, individually and collectively, no escape. Those who believed that the Government had done well to abandon a scheme which the apathy and distrust of the country made it impossible for them to carry, voted honourably with the Government. Those, on the other hand, who thought their hustings' pledges the first consideration, who were determined to stand by those pledges, and at all hazards to force Reform on the Government, voted manfully with the Member for Brighton. Now, my noble Friend (Lord Elcho), who moved this Amendment, addressed an important, and as it turned out, rather an embarrassing question to the Member for Leeds on this point. He asked him which of the two contending parties had the advantage of his countenance on that memorable occasion? And I must say that the answer, coming from this great champion of the unenfranchised, was perfectly astounding. He voted with neither party—he was not a supporter of the Government, he was not a friend of Reform. To be sure the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Osborne) rushed to the rescue, and carrying his memory back five years, he told us that the hon. Member for Leeds was very much indisposed on that particular evening. But the indisposition must have been very sudden, because there was no doubt that my hon. Friend was in the House when the question was about to be put. Sir, the hon. Member for Leeds may return the compliment; he may repay the service of the hon. Member for Liskeard, because I am told by those who have looked to the division list that the hon. Member for Liskeard was also absent on that occasion. Now, I may ask, was the hon. Member for Liskeard also suddenly indisposed? The fact was, Sir, that when, with all the dignity of the Chair, you enunciated in authoritative tones “Strangers must withdraw,” a sudden epidemic seized these Benches, and then the Members for Liskeard and Leeds executed a strategic movement, which deprived the hon. Member for Brighton of the flower of his army. And so, being abandoned and betrayed by his trusty allies, he fell an easy prey to the myrmidons of the Government.

Sir, I would not assume to canvass or criticize the tactics of my hon. Members. We know that great heroes have run away from great battles from the time of Homer downwards; but there was one novelty in this proceeding of my friends, for which I can find no precedent in history either ancient or modern—namely, that as soon as the battle was over, the fugitives and deserters should re-appear on the field brandishing their weapons, and exclaiming, “You have had a real fight; now let us have a second, a sham fight, and you shall see how valiant we will be, and how mercilessly we will cut up the enemy.” And then it appears more audacious still, that those who have stood by their colours in the hour of need, should be denounced as traitors and renegades, because they will not parade themselves under the counterfeit banner of these resuscitated heroes, who took good care not to be among the killed and wounded, but were returned next day as “suspiciously missing.” I have said that the Parliament on that occasion absolved the Ministry. One thing, however, remained—to absolve those who had absconded from the division. That, as the hon. Member for Brighton knows, was no easy task, but it was cleverly accomplished. As legislation was confessedly impossible, there could be no harm in introducing a Bill of their own, and certainly never was there a more ingenious device for saving time, trouble, and appearances. Here is the Bill before us, and what is it? Nothing more nor less than word for word the franchise clause of the condemned and abandoned Government Bill, which the Member for Leeds transcribed and handed in with as little thought and trouble as he would write an order for the Gallery. But if the Bill proposed by the Government was objectionable, surely this one naked and unbalanced franchise clause artfully improvised into an enactment was infinitely more objectionable. For a Government Bill can grapple with the Reform question as a whole, and the House can add modifications and qualifications to a measure originally crude, so that any one might very consistently vote for the second reading of a Government Bill with the intention of moving or supporting Amendments in Committee. But this Bill consists of one single naked provision—that the franchise must move downwards, and, affirming practically that the question is one which requires neither thought nor deliberation, nor design, nor statesmanship; it sets the franchise rolling down the hill with as much indifference where it may roll to as a schoolboy chucks a stone over a precipice. You may call this a Bill by courtesy, but it appears to me that it resembles nothing so much as one of Hodge's razors, that were made not to shave but to sell.

I have said that the Ministry were absolved by the House of Commons, but were not both the House of Commons and the Ministry absolved by the country? What happened? We have seen that the Government abandoned their Reform Bill, and retained their places. They not only did that, but they retained the confidence of Parliament, and the undiminished support of the advanced Reformers, who now shower upon them those reproaches which they have suppressed through six long years, during which they have always been ready to give them their good word, and, what was more valuable, their good votes, to keep this faithless

Ministry in their places. But what about the unenfranchised? How did the Government stand with them? We are told that they disappointed and deceived the unenfranchised; but the noble Lord who was the chief of this faithless Government was so little ashamed or afraid of what he had done, that immediately after the abandonment of his Bill he took the earliest occasion publicly and ostentatiously to visit the very constituency that has now become the focus of the Reform agitation, and at the very time when they must have been smarting under a sense of their ill-usage, the noble Lord invited an expression of opinion from the non-electors of Leeds. Now, Sir, do not let us be told that it was within the compass of possibility, that on a question so vital to the masses, on which the country had been excited, the Parliament dissolved, and a Government turned out, an English Minister would dare to challenge a demonstration in the provinces if he had really disappointed and deceived the country. That was manifestly impossible, and I do not expect to hear from advanced Reformers any such imputation on the spirit and character of the masses. Well, then, when the noble Lord was invited and received with enthusiasm at Leeds, when he was subsequently again invited and received with rapturous applause at Bradford—[Mr. W. E. FORSTER: No!] I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon—I say rapturously received by all classes at Bradford—again, when he crossed the Border and received the same enthusiastic welcome from three or four of the most populous and advanced constituencies in Scotland—what did it all mean? It could only mean one thing, that in these great constituencies, the agitators for Reform, those who were disappointed and displeased by the abandonment of the Bill were a small and helpless minority, and that the great majority of these enlightened constituencies—a majority so great as to carry their reluctant representatives with them in doing honour to this faithless Minister—not only took no exception to the abandonment of Reform, but heartily approved of and endorsed it. They knew that the noble Lord at the head of the Government had never affected to consider the Reform cry as anything but artificial and unreal; and that he had rather tolerated than heartily endorsed the large Reform projects of his Colleague; they recognized in that the noble Lord's practical sagacity and intuitive perception of English feelings and requirements, and so they hailed him as a public benefactor who had saved Parliament from an enormous folly, and the country from a very serious danger.

And this is our answer to the promoters of this Bill. We tell you, Reason is not with you, Justice is not with you, Policy is not with you; and, above all, the nation is not with you. Even the unenfranchised stand aloof from you, and disown you—for they, too, have been educated on Reform, educated by discussions at home and by events abroad, and they know that, as a class, they have more to lose than gain by democratic change, inasmuch as, under our present system, theoretically imperfect as it may be, they know that their feelings, wants, and interests are more considered and better cared for, and that they possess a greater amount of liberty and comfort than is enjoyed by their class in any other country in the world, and without one practical grievance to complain of. It must, however, be admitted that this House of Commons has not redeemed its pledges on Reform, and the hon. Member for Leeds affixes that stigma on the Liberal party, before whose eyes he dangles this Bill as a hustings test, but which, I think, is used by some of its promoters less to test others than to whitewash themselves.

Still, it must be admitted, the Liberal party have not redeemed their hustings' pledges on Reform—very much the reverse; but have they really lost character by that? Only, Sir, if they now relapse into their old fallacies and delusions; only if they allow the hon. Member for Leeds to drag them through the mire of used-up pledges, and shifted devices, and exploded electioneering claptraps, then, indeed, there must be discredit and humiliation in the acknowledgment of unfaithfulness in the past, and the renewal of half-hearted utterances as to the future.

But there is another, a far better, a wiser, aye, and a safer course, which redeems the past while it disembarrasses the future. It is to proclaim the truth; that the mind of Parliament and of the nation has changed—that successive Queen's Speeches which, promising large measures of Reform in a downward direction, were a mistake—that the Ministers who insisted on those Speeches have been discredited—that the Liberal party has been damaged by its blindness and inconsiderateness on Reform—and that its recent silence has not been an evasion of duty, but a deliberate policy caused by sincere conviction resulting from improved experience, and enforced by its respect for the unmistakable feeling of the country. That, Sir, I humbly venture to suggest, would be a course more dignified, and I am sure it would be more popular, than for Liberal Members to suffer themselves now to be apparently coerced into the support of a measure which their judgment has notoriously condemned. Aye, and let me say it would strengthen the Liberal party for their true mission of sincere and practical Reformers, ever ready and anxious to extend the true rights and enlarge the real liberties of the country. And it is in that character, in which you yourselves wish to be regarded as the protectors of the rights and liberties of all classes of your countrymen, that I appeal to you now, and tell you that it is your duty as Reformers to reject this, which is not an enfranchising, but a disfranchising measure; which is not an extension, but a diversion of the suffrage; which is less a bestowal than a transfer of political power; which degrades and disqualifies education to give paramount power to numbers, and under the disguise of Reform, blindly, rashly, and senselessly enacts a revolution.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I could have wished, and once I almost believed, that it was not necessary for me to take part in this debate. I look on this discussion as the natural Epilogue to the Parliament of 1859. We remember the Prologue. I consider this to be a controversy between the "educated section of the Liberal party," and that section of the Liberal party, not entitled, according to their companions and Colleagues, to an epithet so euphuistic and complimentary. But after the speech of the Minister, I hardly think it would become me—representing the opinions of the Gentlemen with whom I am acting on this side of the House—entirely to be silent.

Sir, we have a measure before us to-night which is to increase the franchise in boroughs. I object to that measure. I object to it because an increase of the franchise in boroughs is a proposal to re-distribute political power in the country. I do not think that the distribution of political power in the country ought to be treated partially—from the very nature of things it is impossible, if there is to be a re-distribution of political power, that you can only regard the suffrage as it affects one section of the constituent body. Whatever the proposition of the hon. Gentleman—whether abstractedly it may be expedient or not—this is quite clear, that it must be considered not only in relation to the particular persons with whom it will deal, but in relation to other persons with whom it does not deal, though it would affect them. And, therefore, it has always been clear that if you deal with the subject, popularly called Parliamentary Reform, you must deal with it comprehensively. The arrangements you may make with reference to one part of the constituency may not be objectionable in themselves, but may be extremely objectionable if you consider them with relation to other parts. Consequently, it has been held—and the more we consider the subject the more true and just appears to be the conclusion—that if you deal with the matter you must deal with it as a whole. You must not only consider borough constituencies, you must consider county constituencies; and when persons rise up and urge their claims to be introduced into the constituent body, even if you think there is a plausible case substantiated on their part, you are bound in policy and justice to consider also the claim of other bodies not in possession of the franchise, but whose right to consideration may be equally valid. And so clear is it, when you come to the distribution of power, that you must consider the subject in all its bearings, that even hon. Gentlemen who have taken part in this debate, which is one merely on the borough franchise, have not been able to avoid the question of what they call the re-distribution of seats—a very important part of the question to which I have referred, the distribution of power. It is easy for the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Bernal Osborne), for example, to rise and say, in supporting this measure for the increase of the borough franchise, that it is impossible any longer to conceal the anomalies of our system in regard to the distribution of seats. "Is it not monstrous," he asks, "that Calne, with 173 voters, should return a Member, while Glasgow returns only two, with a constituency of 20,000?" Well, it may be equally monstrous that Liskeard should return one Member, and that Birkenhead should only make a similar return. Sir, the distribution of seats—as any one must know who has ever considered the subject deeply and with a sense of responsibility towards the country—is one of the most profound and difficult questions that can be brought before the House. It is all very well to treat

it in an easy off-hand manner; but how are you to reconcile the case of North Cheshire, of North Durham, of West Kent, and many other counties, where you find a few towns, with an aggregate population, perhaps, of 100,000, returning six Members to this House, while the rest of the population of the county, though equal in amount, returns only two Members? How are you to meet the case of the West Riding in reference to its boroughs, or the case of the representation of South Lancashire in reference to its boroughs? Why, those are more anomalous than the case of Calne. Then there is the question of Scotland. With a population hardly equal to that of the metropolis, and with wealth greatly inferior—probably not more than two-thirds of the amount—Scotland yet possesses forty-eight Members, while the metropolis has only twenty. Do you Reformers mean to say that you are prepared to disfranchise Scotland in proportion to the population; or that you are going to develop the representation of the metropolis in proportion to its population and property; and so allow a country like England, so devoted to local government and so influenced by local feeling, to be governed by London? And, therefore, when those speeches are made which gain a cheer for the moment, and are supposed to be so unanswerable as arguments in favour of Parliamentary change, I would recommend the House to recollect that this as a question is one of the most difficult and one of the deepest that can possibly engage the attention of the country. The fact is this—in the representation of this country you do not depend on population or on property merely, or on both conjoined; you have to see that there is something besides population and property—you have to take care that the country itself is represented. That is one reason why I am opposed to the second reading of the Bill—because it deals partially with the subject, and not completely and comprehensively.

Sir, there is another objection which I have to this Bill brought forward by the hon. Member for Leeds, and that is that it is brought forward by the Member for Leeds. I do not consider this a subject which ought to be intrusted to the care and guidance of any individual Member in this House. If there be one subject more than another that deserves the consideration and demands the responsibility of the Government, it certainly is the re-construction of our Parliamentary system; and it is the Government or a political party candidates for power, who recommend a policy, and who will not shrink from the responsibility of carrying that policy into effect if the opportunity be afforded to them, who alone are qualified to deal with such a question. But, Sir, I shall be told—as we have been told in a previous portion of the adjourned debate—that the two great parties of the State cannot be trusted to deal with this question, because they have both trifled with it. That is a charge which has been made repeatedly during this discussion and on previous occasions, and certainly a graver one could not be made in this House. I am not prepared to admit that even our opponents have trifled with this question. We have had a very animated account by the right hon. Gentleman who has just addressed us as to what may be called the Story of the Reform Measures. It was animated, but it was not accurate. Mine will be accurate, though perhaps not animated. I am not prepared to believe that English statesmen, though they be opposed to me in politics and may sit on opposite Benches, could ever have intended to trifle with this question. I think that possibly they may have made great mistakes in the course which they took; they may have miscalculated, they may have been misled; but I do not believe that any men in this country, occupying the posts—the eminent posts—of those who have recommended any re-construction of our Parliamentary system in modern days, could have advised a course which they disapproved. They may have thought it perilous—they may have thought it difficult—but though they may have been misled I am convinced they must have felt that it was necessary. Let me say a word on behalf of one with whom I have had no political connection and to whom I have been placed in constant opposition in this House when he was an honoured Member of it—I mean Lord Russell. I cannot at all agree with the lively narrative of the right hon. Gentleman, according to which Parliamentary Reform was but the creature of Lord John Russell, whose Cabinet, controlled by him with the vigour of a Richelieu, at all times disapproved his course; still less can I acknowledge that merely to amuse himself, or in a moment of difficulty to excite some popular sympathy, Lord John Russell was a statesman always with a Reform Bill in his pocket, ready to produce it and make a display. How different, says the right hon. Gentleman, from that astute and sagacious statesman now at the head of Her Majesty's Government, whom I almost hoped to have seen in his place this evening. I am sure it would have given the House great pleasure to have seen him here, and I certainly did hope that the noble Lord would have been enabled to be in his place and prepared to support his policy. According to the animated but not quite accurate account of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, all that Lord Derby did was to sanction and humour the caprices of Lord John Russell. Now, I must remind the right hon. Gentleman that he has forgotten the history of the subject, recent though it be. It is true that Lord John Russell, when Prime Minister, recommended that Her Majesty in the Speech from the Throne should call the attention of Parliament to the condition of our representative system. There is no doubt about that. But Lord John Russell unfortunately shortly afterwards retired from his eminent position. He was soon after succeeded by one of the most considerable statesmen of our days—a statesman not connected with the political school of Lord John Russell, who was supported by a whole staff of eminent statesmen who had been educated in the same school and under the same distinguished master. This eminent statesman, however, is entirely forgotten by the right hon. Gentleman, although he took office with every advantage. The right hon. Gentleman overlooks the fact that Lord Aberdeen, when Prime Minister, and when all the principal places in his Cabinet were filled with the disciples of Sir Robert Peel, did think it his duty to recommend the same counsel to Her Majesty. But this is an important, though not the only important, item in the history of the Reform Bill which has been ignored by the right hon. Gentleman. But is this all? The time came when Lord Aberdeen gave place to another statesman, one who has been complimented to-night on his sagacity in evading the subject—as if such a course would be a subject for congratulation. Let me vindicate the policy of Lord Palmerston in his absence. He did not evade the question. Lord Palmerston followed the example of Lord John Russell. He followed the example, also, of Lord Aberdeen, and recommended Her Majesty to notice the subject of Parliamentary Reform in the

Speech from the Throne. What becomes, then, of the lively narrative of the right hon. Gentleman, and the inference, and conclusions which he drew from it? Not only is his account inaccurate, but it is injurious, as I take it, to the honour of public men. Well, now you have three Prime Ministers—not one merely from caprice or personal littleness—bringing forward the question of Parliamentary Reform; you have Lord John Russell, Lord Aberdeen, and you have even that statesman who, according to the account of the right hon. Gentleman, was so eminent for his sagacity in evading the subject altogether. Now, let me ask the House to consider the position of Lord Derby when he was called to power—a position which you cannot rightly understand if you accept as correct the fallacious statements of the right hon. Gentleman. I will give the House an account of this subject the accuracy of which I believe neither side will impugn. It may not possibly be without interest, and will not, I am sure, be without significance. Lord Derby was sent for by Her Majesty, an unwilling candidate for office—for let me remind the House that at that moment he had an adverse majority of 140 in the House of Commons, and I therefore do not think that Lord Derby was open to any imputation in hesitating to accept political responsibility under such circumstances. Lord Derby laid these considerations before Her Majesty. I speak, of course, with reserve, yet really say nothing now which I have not said before in the discussion of these matters in this House. But when a Government comes in on Reform and remains in power six years without passing any measure of the kind, it is possible that these circumstances, too, may be lost sight of. Lord Derby advised Her Majesty not to form a Government under his influence, because there existed so large a majority against him in the House of Commons, and because this question of Reform was placed in such a position that it was impossible not to deal with it, and he did not wish to deal with it. For it should be remembered that Lord Derby was a Member of the famous Cabinet which carried the Reform Bill in 1832. Lord Derby, as Lord Stanley, was in the House of Commons one of the most efficient promoters of the measure. Lord Derby believed that the Bill had tended to effect the purpose for which it was designed; and although no man superior, as he is, to prejudice could fail to see that some who were qualified for the exercise of the franchise were still debarred from the privilege, yet he could not also fail to perceive the danger which would arise in a country like England from constantly tampering with the franchise, and that therefore it was inexpedient to deal with the question. On these grounds Lord Derby declined the honour which Her Majesty desired to confer upon him. Her Majesty was then left without advisers, and the appeal to Lord Derby was repeated. Under such circumstances it was impossible for any English statesman to hesitate. But I am bound to say that although there was no contract or understanding further than that which prevails among men, however different their politics, who love their country and wish to maintain its greatness, still there was an understanding at the time among men of weight on both sides of the House that the position in which the Reform question was placed was one embarrassing to the Crown and not creditable to the House, and that any Minister trying his best to deal with it under these circumstances would receive not a pledge of support to his measure—that would be impossible and preposterous—but would be insured the candid consideration of the House. It was thought, moreover, that the time had possibly arrived when both parties might unite in endeavouring to bring about a solution to the advantage and benefit of the country. Under these circumstances Lord Derby gave his mind to the measure. And yet, says the right hon. Gentleman who has just addressed you, it was only in 1860 that the portentous truth flashed across the mind of the country that the question of Parliamentary Reform was this—was it possible to admit a portion of the working classes to the enjoyment of the franchise, without impairing the constitution of the country—it was only in 1860, after so many Ministers had been dealing with the question for so many years that this real state of the question flashed upon the conscience of the country. All I can say is that this was the question, and the only question, which engaged the attention of Lord Derby's Cabinet in 1858. The question was, whether they could secure the franchise for a certain portion of the working classes who, by their industry, their intelligence, and their integrity showed that they were worthy of such a possession, without at the same time overwhelming the rest of the constituency by the numbers of those whom they admitted. That, Sir, was the only question which occupied the attention of the Government of Lord Derby; and yet the right hon. Gentleman says that it was only in 1860 that the attention of the public was first called to the subject, when, in fact, the question of Parliamentary Reform had been before them for more than ten years, and on a greater scale than that embraced by the measure under consideration this evening. I need not remind the House of the reception which Lord Derby's Bill encountered. It is neither my disposition nor, I am sure, that of any of my Colleagues, to complain of the votes of this House on that occasion, nor to indulge in reproaches against any of its Members. Political life must be taken as you find it, and so far as I am concerned not a word shall escape me on the subject. But from the speeches made the first night of this debate, and from the speech made by the right hon. Gentleman this evening, I deem it my duty to vindicate the conduct pursued by the party with which I act. I say we were perfectly well aware of the great question which it was our business to solve, and I say this now which I would not have said under other circumstances, that I believe that the measure which we brought forward was the only one which has attempted to meet its difficulties. Totally irrespective of other modes of dealing with the question, there were two franchises especially proposed on that occasion which, in my mind, would have done much towards solving them. The first was the franchise founded upon personal property, and the second the franchise founded upon partial occupation. Those two franchises, irrespective of other modes by which we attempted to meet the want and the difficulty—those two franchises, had they been brought into Committee of this House, would, in my opinion, have been so shaped and adapted that they would have effected those objects which the majority of the House desire. We endeavoured in that Bill to make proposals which were in the genius of the English Constitution. It is easy to speak of the English Constitution as a mere phrase. We did not consider the Constitution a mere phrase. We knew that the Constitution of this country is a monarchy tempered by the authority of co-ordinate estates of the realm. We knew that the House of Commons is an estate of the realm. We knew that an estate of the realm is a political body, invested with political power for the Government of the country and for the public good; therefore a body founded upon privilege and not upon right. It is therefore in the noblest and properest sense of the word an aristocratic body, and from the first the estate of the Commons has had that character. From that characteristic the Reform Bill of 1832 did not derogate; and if at this moment we could contrive, as we proposed to do in 1859, to add considerably to the number of the constituent body, we should not change that characteristic, but it would still remain founded upon an aristocratic principle.

Well, now the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State has addressed us to-night in a remarkable speech. He also takes up the history of Reform; but before I touch upon some of the features of that speech it is my duty to refer to the statements which he made with regard to the policy which the Government of Lord Derby was prepared to assume after the general election of 1859. By a total misrepresentation of the character of the Amendment proposed by Lord John Russell, which threw the Government in 1858 into a minority, and by quoting a passage from a very long speech of mine in 1859, the right hon. Gentleman most dexterously conveyed these two propositions to the House—first, that Lord John Russell had proposed an Amendment to our Reform Bill, by which the House declared that no Bill could be satisfactory by which the working classes were not admitted to the franchise—one of our main objects being that the working classes should in a great measure be admitted to the franchise; and secondly, that after the election I was prepared, as the organ of the Government, to give up all the schemes of those franchises founded upon personal property, partial occupation, and other grounds, and to substitute a Bill lowering the borough qualification. That, in the first place, conveyed to the House a totally inaccurate idea of the Amendment of Lord John Russell. There was not a single word in that Amendment about the working classes. There was not a single phrase upon which that issue was raised; nor could it have been raised, because our Bill, whether it could have effected the object or not, was a Bill which proposed greatly to enfranchise the working classes. And, in the second place, as regards the statement I made it simply was this. The election was over—we were still Ministers; and still acting according to our sense of duty, recommended in the Royal Speech that the question of Parliamentary Reform should be dealt with; because I must be allowed to remind the House that whatever may have been our errors, we never paltered with the Reform question—we proposed a Bill which we intended to carry. And having once taken up the question as a matter of duty, no doubt greatly influenced by what we considered the unhappy mistakes of our predecessors, and the difficult position in which they had placed the Crown, Parliament, and the country, we determined not to leave the question until it had been settled. As Ministers of the Crown we felt it to be our duty to recommend to Her Majesty to introduce the question of Reform in the Speech from the Throne which opened the Parliament of 1859. And how were we, except in that spirit of compromise which is the principal characteristic of our political system—how could we introduce a Reform Bill after that election, without in some degree considering the possibility of lowering the borough franchise? But it was not a franchise of £6, but an arrangement that was to be taken with the rest of the Bill, and if it had been met in the same spirit a measure might have been passed. But, says the right hon. Baronet, pursuing his history of the Reform question “when the Government of Lord Derby retired from office, we came in and we were perfectly sincere in our intentions to carry that Reform Bill to which we had pledged ourselves and by means of which we had driven the Government from office—but look at the opposition we received—there never was such opposition. There was the right hon. Gentleman,” meaning myself—“he absolutely allowed our Bill to be read a second time.” That tremendous reckless opposition of mine which allowed the Bill to be read a second time, seems to have laid the Government prostrate. If I had succeeded in throwing out the Bill, we should have relieved the new Government from great embarrassment; but, their Bill having been read a second time, the Government were quite overcome, and it appears have never recovered the paralysis up to this time. The right hon. Gentleman was good enough to say that the proposition of his Government was rather coldly in his side of the House. “He” “only spoke against it.” “He” “spoke against the Bill or” “I remember some remarkable speeches from the right hon. Gentleman's friends against their measure. There was the great city of Edinburgh represented by an acute eloquence of which we never weary, and which again upon the present occasion we have heard; there was the great city of Bristol, represented also by a devoted supporter of the Government, and many other constituencies of equal importance. But the most remarkable speech—the speech which “killed Cock Robin,”—was absolutely delivered by one who might be described as a Member of the Government—the Chairman of Ways and Means, and who, I believe, spoke from immediately behind the Prime Minister. Did the Government express any disapprobation of such conduct? They promoted him to a great post, and sent him to India with an income of fabulous amount. And now they are astonished they cannot carry a Reform Bill. If they remove all those among their supporters who oppose such Bills by preferring them to posts of great confidence and great lucre, how can they suppose that they will ever carry one? Looking at the policy of the Government, I am not at all astonished at the speech which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State has made this evening. Of which speech I may observe, that although it was remarkable for many things, yet there were two salient conclusions at which the right hon. Gentleman arrived. First, the repudiation of the rights of man, and next, the repudiation of the £6 franchise. The first is a great relief; and, remembering what the feeling of the House was only a year ago, when, by the dangerous eloquence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, we were led to believe that the days of Tom Paine had returned, and that Rousseau was to be rivalled in a new social contract, it must be a vast relief to every respectable man here to find that not only are we not to have the rights of man, but we are not even to have the £6 franchise. It is a matter, I think, of much congratulation, and I am ready to give credit to the Secretary of State for the honesty with which he has expressed himself; I only wish we had had the same frankness, the same honesty of expression, arising from a clear view of his subject, in the first year of the Parliament as we have had in the last. I will follow the example of the right hon. Gentleman and his friends and be frank. I have not changed my opinion upon the subject of what is called Parliamentary Reform. All that has occurred—all that I have observed—all the results of my reflections, lead me to this more and more—that the principle upon which the constituencies of this country should be increased is one not of radical, but I would say of lateral, reform—the extension of the franchise, not its degradation. Although—I do not wish in any way to deny it—we were in the most difficult position when the Parliament of 1859 met, being anxious to assist the Crown and the Parliament, by proposing some moderate measure which men on both sides might support, we did, to a certain extent, agree to some modification of the £10 franchise—yet I confess that my present opinion is opposed, as it originally was, to any course of the kind. I think that it would fail in its object; that it would not secure the introduction of that particular class which we all desire to introduce, but that it would introduce many others who are unworthy of the suffrage. But, Sir, I retain these opinions—I think it is possible to increase the electoral body of the country, if the opportunity were favourable, and the necessity urgent, by the introduction of voters upon principles in unison with the principles of the Constitution, so that the suffrage should remain a privilege, and not a right—a privilege to be gained by virtue, by intelligence, by industry, by integrity, and to be exercised for the common good. And I think if you quit that ground—if you once admit that every man has a right to vote whom you cannot prove to be disqualified for it, you would change the character of the Constitution, and you would change it in a manner which will tend to lower the importance of this country. Between the scheme we brought forward and the measure brought forward by the hon. Member for Leeds, and the inevitable conclusion which its principal supporters acknowledge it must lead to, it is a question between an aristocratic Government in the proper sense of the term—that is, a Government by the best men of all classes—and a democracy. I doubt very much whether a democracy is a Government that would suit this country; and it is just as well that the House when coming to a vote on this question should really consider if that be the issue—and it is the real issue—between retaining the present Constitution—not the present constituent body, but between the present Constitution and a democracy—it is just as well for the House to recollect that the stake is not mean—that what is at issue is of some price. You must remember, not to use the word profanely, that we are dealing really with a peculiar people. There is no country at the present moment that exists under the circumstances and under the same conditions as the people of this realm. You have, for example, an ancient, powerful, richly-endowed Church and perfect religious liberty. You have unbroken order and complete freedom. You have landed estates as large as the Romans, combined with commercial enterprize such as Carthage and Venice united never equalled. And you must remember that this peculiar country, with these strong contrasts, is not governed by force; it is not governed by standing armies; it is governed by a most singular series of traditionary influences, which generation after generation cherishes and preserves because they know that they embalm customs and represent law. And, with this, what have you done? You have created the greatest Empire of modern time. You have amassed a capital of fabulous amount. You have devised and sustained a system of credit still more marvellous. And, above all, you have established and maintained a scheme so vast and complicated, of labour and industry, that the history of the world offers no parallel to it. And all these mighty creations are out of all proportion to the essential and indigenous elements and resources of the country. If you destroy that state of society, remember this—England cannot begin again. There are countries which have been in great danger and gone through great suffering; the United States, for example, whose fortunes are now so perilous, and who in our own immediate day have had great trials; you have had—perhaps even now in the United States of America you have—a protracted and fratricidal civil war which has lasted for four years; but if it lasted for four years more, vast as would be the disaster and desolation, when ended the United States might begin again, because the United States then would only be in the same condition that England was at the end of the War of the Roses, when probably she had not even 3,000,000 of population, with vast tracts of virgin soil and mineral treasures, not only undeveloped but undreamt of. Then you have France. France had a real revolution in this century—a real revolution, not merely a political

but a social revolution. The institutions of the country were uprooted, the orders of society abolished—even the landmarks and local names removed and erased. But France could begin again. France had the greatest spread of the most exuberant soil in Europe, and a climate not less genial; she had, and always had, comparatively, a limited population, living in a most simple manner. France, therefore, could begin again. But England—the England we know, the England we live in, the England of which we are proud—could not begin again. I do not mean to say that after great troubles England would become a howling wilderness, or doubt that the good sense of the people would, to some degree, prevail, and some fragments of the national character survive; but it would not be old England—the England of power and tradition, of credit and capital, that now exists. It is not in the nature of things; and, Sir, under these circumstances, I hope the House, when the question before us is one impeaching the character of our Constitution will hesitate—that it will sanction no step that has a tendency to democracy, but that they will maintain the ordered state of free England in which we live. I do not think that in this country generally there is a desire at this moment for any further change in this matter. I think the general opinion of the country on the subject of Parliamentary Reform is that our views are not sufficiently matured on either side. Certainly, so far as I can judge, I cannot refuse the conclusion that such is the condition of hon. Gentlemen opposite. We all know the paper circulated among us before Parliament met, on which the speech of its author, the hon. Member for Maidstone (Mr. Buxton), this evening is a comment. I quite sympathize with his “Liberal Dilemma”; it was one of the most interesting contributions to our elegiac literature I have heard for some time. But is it in this House only that we find these indications of the want of maturity in views upon this subject? Our tables are covered at this moment with propositions of eminent Members of the Liberal party—men eminent for character or talent, and for both—and what are these propositions? All devices to counteract the consequences of their own Liberal Reform Bill, to which they are opposed; therefore, it is quite clear, when we read these propositions and speculations, that the mind and intellect of the party have arrived at no conclusions on the subject. I would not speak of these projects with disrespect. I am prepared to give them grave consideration; but I ask whether these publications are not proofs that the active intelligence of the Liberal party is itself entirely at sea on the subject? I may say, there has been more consistency, more calmness of consideration on this subject on the part of Gentlemen on this side than on the part of those who seem to arrogate to themselves the monopoly of treating this subject. I can, at least, in answer to those who charge us with trifling with the subject, appealing to the recollection of every candid man, say that we treated it with sincerity—prepared our measure with care, and submitted it to the House, trusting to its candid consideration. We spared no pains in its preparation, and at this time I am bound to say, speaking for my Colleagues, in the main principles on which that Bill was founded—namely, the extension of the franchise not its degradation, will be found, we believe, the only solution that will ultimately be accepted by the country. Therefore, I cannot say that I look to this question, or that those with whom I act look to it, with any embarrassment. We feel we have done our duty; and it is not without gratification that I have listened to the candid admissions of many hon. Gentlemen who voted against it, that they feel the defeat of that measure by the Liberal party was a great mistake. So far as we are concerned, I repeat, we, as a party, can look to Parliamentary Reform not as an embarrassing subject; but that is no reason why we should agree to the measure of the hon. Member for Leeds. It would reflect no credit on the House of Commons. It is a mean device, and I think the House will best do its duty to the country if they reject the measure by a decided majority.

WAYS AND MEANS.—REPORT.

Resolutions [May 5] reported.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he believed this Resolution related to the renewal of £1,000,000 Exchequer Bonds. They had been lately doing a good deal in the way of reducing the National Debt, and he trusted that they were not going to renew these bonds again.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could not give a positive answer, as everything would depend upon the money market and the state of the finances of the country.

CLERICAL SUBSCRIPTION

Clerical Subscription considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

SIR GEORGE GREY rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law as to subscriptions and declarations made by the clergy of the Established Church. The right hon. Baronet was about to state the main objects of the Bill, when an hon. Member moved that the House be counted.

Notice taken that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members not being present:

Mr. Speaker resumed the Chair:—House counted, and 40 Members not being present:

House adjourned at One o'clock.
